* knowing that King Henry, not long before his death, had intended the Crowne to him: to controue therefore his appetites, with bounty, and munificence, and to take away all murmuration in him, for want of Princelike competencies, King Richard did as it were share the Realm with him, giuing him fixe Earldomes, Cornwall, Devon, Somerset, Nottingham, Derby, and Lancaster, besides Castles, Honours, Manors, Forests, and much other riches, and finally, the Earldome of Gloucester, with the Heire of that Countie to be his Wife, though the Arch-bishop of Canterbury forbad the Nuptialls, alledging there was within degrees of consanguinitie.

(10) But lest, through cault nature or aduise, Earle Iohn should conuert those so great gifts to the subuersion of the bestower, Hee entrusted him with no part of the Regall power, as the Key, and iocret of his proper iustice: but laide the maine burthen of Government vpon William Langbeche Bishop of Ely, * chiefe Iustitiar, and Lord Chancellor of England, and Papall Legate, (a person out of all suspicion for aspiring to the Crowne) wherby was conferred vpon him, whatsoever either King or Pope could grant, for accomplishment of his authoritie; so that he might well be stiled * Princed and Prins of England; as hee was one, the most powerfull subiect for the time, that perhaps this Realme hath had: for, though the King had (as it were) ioined with him in Communion, one Hugh Bishop of Durham, for the parts of England beyond Humber; yet, as it * happened in the Consultation of Casir and Bahaine, that nothing was reported of Bahaine, but all of Casir, so did Langbeche in a short time callie make himselfe sole and absolute, his way harving in silence, the name, and endeauours, of his Colleague.

(11) Thus the summe of command, or the Sovereigne power it selfe, was in the Chancellor as Viceroy, but for defence and preservation of his iustice, hee * did subordinate or associate to those Bishops, William Earle of Arundell, Hugh Bardolf, William Marshall, Geffrey Fitz-Peter, William Bruner, Robert de Wharfield, Roger Fitz-Steufrey, wherein hee did shew his lone and care of the English Nation, as also of Iustice it selfe: for that many of these, were of the most honourable Peeres of the Land (not men bred-up or formerly enured to make Iustice, or their owne Tongues venall, for a fee:) honour being the rule of their proceedings, and strength of priuate fortunes, with their Princes honour, the pillar to susteine that honor.

(12) There remained to provide for (before hee left England) the neighbour-hood of Scotland and Wales, which might otherwise make vie of his absence to his prejudice: But Rhesis of Glouceter of whom there is extant a short but elegant Panegyric Prince of South-Wales (being already in amitie) came as fast as Oxford toward him; but because the King (who was there) came not in person to meete him (as his father King Henry had done) the Prince (notwithstanding Earle Iohn the Kings only brother, had conducted him from the Marches with speciall honor) took it in so high scorn and indignation, (for even the meane, from whom service or lone is expected, will againe expect regard) that hee forthwith returned into his Countrey, without once saluting the King; who by this neglect, lost Rhesis loue, as, vpon the like omission, and vnexpectuence, Aurilime (the too supercilious Monke) did lesse the affections of the Monkes of Bangor, Rhesis owne countrie-men, in another part of Wales.

That he should have all such decedes, instruments, and charters, made by him to the late King Henrie, which had by constraint or default been obtained: and himselfe to be freed from all encombrances, claimes, or pretensions whatsoever. 3. That he should have all such dignities, as his brother Adalmon held in England, (for which King William did there make false) and all such Lands as his Ancestors did hold of the English Crowne.

(14) The Seate of England being thus in the maine, and other meane points established, King Richard croft the Seas into France to Philip king thereof, according to appointment, that from thence, with minds & forces united, they might set forward vnder the Ensigne of the Crofley which after some tyme (occasioned by the death of the French Queen) they did, vpon their Christian and friendly trinites:

1. That each of them preserve the others honour, and beare faith to him for life, and member, and earthly dignity. 2. That neither of them shall faile the other in their affairs; but that the King of France shall helpe the King of England to defend his land, even as hee would defend the City of Paris, if it were besieged; and Richard King of England, shall helpe the King of France to defend his land, even as he would defend his City Reau if it were besieged.

This being fairly engrossed, and afterward ratified with oath, and sent by the kings themselves in person, the Earles and Barons were in solemne manner, that they would not trespass against their fealty, nor flatter any warr in either of the kings Luminions, so long as they were in that pilgrimage: on the other side, the Arch-bishops and Bishops did firmly promise (in verbe veritatis, in the word of truth) that they would accure and excommunicate all such as did transgresse this agreement.

(15) Thus (after some necessary staies) these two the greatest Monarks of the West, set forward oner land (toward the publique service of Christianity) with such numbers as themselves thought best; which were so great, that hailing adomned (not without some little losse of people by the fall of the Bridge over the river Rhen at Luans, which brake by reason of the throng) beyond the said violent fireme, they parted company: Philip passing over the Alpes into Italy, and Richard to the Sea-side at Messina, there to meete with his Navy, which being composed of all the chiefe Ships in England, Normandy, and other his French Dominions, was there appointed to attend.

(16) But the voyage being very long, and King Richard comming to the Port before his Fleet, after eight daies expectation there, waxing impatient of delay, imbarke himselfe in twenty three Gallies, and ten great hulkes or Bussies (a kind of shipping as it seems peculiar then to the Mediterranean sea) and let saile toward Messina in Sicilie, the Residence of both the kings and of their Armies: in which passage, lying at Anchor (on occasion) in the mouth of the river Tyber a farre from Rome, the Bishoppe of Haghe repaired unto him, desiring him in the Popes name, that hee would visite his Holinesse, which the King denied to do; saying the Popes charge many shamefull matters touching the Bishopps Simony, and Conventualities, with many other reproaches, alleging that they took 7000. Markes for consecration of the Bishoppe of Mans, 1500. Markes for the Legatine power of William Bishop of Ely, but of the Archbishop of Bardeaux an infinite somme of money: whereupon he refused to see him. This (albeit sundry accidents and commings on land) hearing that his Navy was safe, hee staid for them by the way, and then came to anchor not long after (to wit, 23. of September) before the City of Messina, with so great a shew of power, and found of Warlike Instruments, and other signes of Majesty, in the sight of Philip and his

French, and of many other Nations there assembled, that it stroke horror into the Inhabitants, (such Havens) and moved no small eny in the hearts of his confederates.

(17) From this time forward, as it may seeme (the Enemy of Concord feeding the malcontent passions of men with perpetual matter of debate) the king of France was next truly king Richards friend in heart, but vpon the same day (whether frightened in propositions or otherwise) hee left the king of England, but by contrary wind was driven backe before night, where (after many troubles and quarrels betweene the English and Sicilians) the two kings peaced againe, and leaved a new & as firme a league, as they could, during that martiall pilgrimage.

(18) Tancred was at that time king of Sicilie by usurpation, after the death of William, who had married Isabel sister of king Richard, whom (at that time vpon displeasure and quarrell being prisoner) Tancred set at liberty, sending her in honorable manner to her brother, and did yield to sundry Articles, and also present payments of ample summes. Feare wrought on both parts, for Richard being among strangers, and not very sure of the French fidelity vpon a strength of the Griffins (people much redoubted in those parts, till the carruall of the English) & in tumult tooke the City of Messina it selfe, where hee displaced his Ensignes, till for the French Kings love hee was content to disavowance them, and to entrust the City to the Knights Templars and Hospitallers, vntill Tancred had fulfilled all such things as Richard did challenge to be due, being many.

(19) Vpon great deliberation thereto, the Sicilian King made answer, that hee had already paid to his sister, late Queene of that land, a very great quantity of coine in recompence of her Dowry or louncture, and would satisfie all his other demands (concerning the Legacies intended by his Predecessor king William, to the Father of king Richard) as far as hee ought according to the custome of that kingdom, and thereupon gaue vnto him for the quiett claime of his sisters louncture, twenty thousand ounces of gold: and farther to bee acquired of all other claimes & pretences, as also in consideration that Arthur Duke of Brienne, nephew & next heire of king Richard, (if Richard died without issue) should take to wife the daughter of K. Tancred, he paid him other twenty thousand ounces of gold, and of his owne accord, and for King Richards loure, and for the loure of the English Nation (which, such our Author, was then in great reputation through the kingdom of Sicilie, as also to be the more allured of performance, he gaue him other twenty thousand ounces of gold, besides afterward four great Ships, called Vyslers, and fifteen Gallies.

(20) King Richard on the other side, not to be wanting to any matter, which in honor and equite might be expected of him, besides letters Patentes, hee put in vpon their Oaths for his officers, two Arch-bishops, and two Bishops of his owne there present, and twentie great Lords, and principall men his subjects, whose names because many of their posterities doe yet stand) are here inserted out of the faide letters Patentes, as they are vpon record in Haynes.

(21) Moreover for finall assurance, hee offered that Pope Clement should vndertake for performance of his part in the said agreement; and that the said Clement would accordingly vndertake, hee requited him by most officious letters, giving him leave without any relaxation) to put his dominions (upon any breach) under severall censures.

(22) This peace accord being happily thus concluded, King Edward (having most royally and lovingly sealed the King of England for three daies and three nights in a Castle of his) discovered, upon the way at Tavernham in his returne, a foule and vnpurposely conspiracy of Philip (whome one of our Writers calls the un-purposus King) against the head and safety of King Richard; which coming to be known betweene the two Kings, the French charged the English with picking of quarrels, and added, that valiant Richard married his sister Alice, according as hee ought, having beene contracted long before together, he would be his enemy while he breatheth, whereunto King Richard (being pressed) did replye: That his sister during the time of her abode in England, had a child by his Father Henry King of England, which he was ready to prove by many witnesses there present: so that King Richard had farre more cause then a suspicion of dishonesty (which some write) to refuse the marriage. This falling out so shamefully, Philip (upon certaine conditions betweene Richard and him) left him at liberty to take a wife where he thought good, but never (as it may seeme) forgave him his cull will while they two lived together.

(23) And because acts of Christian remorse and humility are too rare among the Great ones of this vaine world, it was a crime to pretermitt the exemplar humilation of this famous General K. Richard, at this time, who to vie my * Authors words) suffered with damus grace, and studying to fite himselfe for the great accept he had in hand, was stung at the foule wch he felt compunction for his sinnes, that calling before him his Archbishops and Bishops into a Chappell at the house where he was lodged without the walles of Melfiana, hee blushed not to make a penitent confession of his manifold excesses, humbly praying God of mercy, and them (as his subordinate Ministers) of Abolition; & God (saith Homerus) respected him with eyes of Mercy, and gave him a penitent heart, so that from thenceforth hee proved a man fearing God, & shewing out, and doing good. * O felicitas illam, &c. O happy he who so fast, that he may rise more strong: O happy he, who after penitent griefe, is left not into fault and ranc.

(24) Whereupon adding his mind to diuine contemplations, & mediation of the christian Church, whose Champion now he was; he desired conference of one Isachia (a Cistercia Abbots) whose great learning and deepe understanding in the Scriptures, with an opinion of a Prophetically inspiration, made him so famous oer the world, that King Richard sent for him, being then in Calabria neer Sicilia, whom at his coming he heard preaching and expounding the Apocalypse of S. Iohn, touching the afflictions of the Church, and of Antichrist, which (saith hee) was then borne, and in the City of Rome, and shall bee advanced to the See Apolliticus, of whom the Apofle said, he should extol himselfe aboue all that is called Gods; and that the Ierem Cryes were the Kings and Princes of the earth which physed him. Surely, neere about this very time hapned that in Rome, which might seeme to give great probability to that Abbots opinion, especially, if Emperours and Kings bee truly called * Gods, oer whom Antichrist also should extol himselfe: for in the same moeth that Richard left Melfiana, was the Coronation of Henry the Emperour, and his Emperesse Constantina in S. Peters Church; where Pope Celestine, the very next day after his own consecration to the Papacy, (sat in his Pontifical chaire, holding the Imperiall golden Crosse betwixt his feete and the Emperour (as likewise the Emperesse) sleeping low reclined on his head the Diadem from the Popes feet; and presently againe the Pope drave the Emperour crosse with his foot, and dafte it to the ground; signifying that hee had power to throw him (upon his demerits) out of his Empire: but the Cardinals catching up the crosse, put it againe on the Emperours head.

(25) The same day in which Philip & his French Forces fell out of the Hancen of Melfiana, arrived Alicia King *Richard*s mother, accompanied with Berenyria his new intended Spouse, daughter to * Sanchus King of Nauarre, whome afterward hee tooke to wife in Cyprus; but his Mother after a short stay returned by Rome into England, leaving the young Lady with Isabel Queene Dowager of Sicilia, both which accompanied the King toward the holy Land, his whole Naue being one hundred and fifty great ships, and fifty three Gallies well appointed for the warre, and * many other Sailes and Vessels: and not to omit the same because it is recorded as a singularity he had among all these, * threene Baces or Baces, which had each of them three course of Sailes to saile with: but no Writer (so farre as we yet find) declares what numbers of Souldiers were in the English Armie.

(26) This Naue roiall betweene the Isles of Rhodes and Cyprus, (for the honor and good of King Richard) who scattered by God with a terrible tempest, some one or two of which sufficed to wreck vpon the Isle of Cyprus, whom * Carsac (or as other call him Isakus, Emperour of the Grifons) being a tyrant did spoile, and contrary to Christian Religion, (which was his profession, though some mistake) and all honour and humanity, he would not (among other his vnpurposely, or rather barbarous behaviours) suffer the Kings sister, and Lady Berenyria, with other of that tender societie, to come into harbor, to their great discontentment and perill, a * Shippe or two sinking there: but neither would God, nor King Richard forgive it him.

(27) For the said vnworthy Prince having thrice refused to make restitution of his vnlawfull seizures and prisoners, was eured vpon by the English, drisen from the shores with great dishonour and slaughter, the City Lemesia left for a prey to the victors, and himselfe beaten againe out of his Campe, and taken, and after an eacie made by him, his onely daughter and heire yielding her selfe, and her Father lastly coming againe of his owne accord (as despairing to see had) vnder custodie, and thrust into fetters of gold and siluer, the whole Land (with all the people, strength, and riches thereof) became subiect to the King of England, and both Father and Daughter led away into captiuitie.

(28) There arrived at Limesia, to salute and honour King Richard within three daies after his first victory, Gudo King of Ierusalem, Geoffrey de * Leuisant his brother, Ramond Prince of Antioch, Earle Barmond his sonne, &c. offering their seruices, and swearing to bee his against all men; with whose priuiey King Richard sealed the flourishing and spacious Ile of Cyprus, by antiquity celebrated as the very Ile of Venus, which that it might be proue to himselfe in the ioyous moeth, hee solemnly took to wife his beloued Lady Berenyria.

(29) The person of the Emperour (for by that Iofy title Writers call him) was sent to Tripolis in Syria, vnder the custody of Ralph Fitz Goffrey, Lord * Chamberlaine to King Richard: his daughter was committed to the two Queenes Berenyria and Isabel: the Ile and isle was entrusted to Richard de Camille, and Robert de Tornham his Viceroyes, with competent force and provisions, and the Islanders suffered to enioy all such lawes and liberties, as they held in the time of Manuel the Emperour of Constantinople, or (as now they call it) of Stamboli.

(30) This fame of Richard was much enlarged by his conquering a mighty * Argolice, called a Dromond, wherein were aboard one thousand and five hundred Saracens (though disguised vnder French Flagges) furnished, besides all other provisions, with live-workes, barrells, or cages of venomous serpents, and the like, for the vse of the Saracens at Aem (anciently called Pleminia, to the siege whereof he was then failing,) threene hundred persons, but now it was a probable with relation to Isaacus. A.D. 1192. The King of France was (saide) for the Holy Land.

(11) Philip King of France hope perhaps to conquer Acon before the English could arrive, and to win thereby that glory incite came safe before that City in Easter weekes, but as yet had not forced the fame: at which time (that the Reader may observe the generall disposition of the western Christians in thole dayes) there engirded Acon (omitting the many great Prelates, Princes, Earles, and Honourable Chieft) these Nations following, the Genoises and Venetians, the English under Hubert Bishop of Salisbury, afterward * Archbishop of Canterbury, Flemings, Almaines, Danes, Dutch, Frislanders, Pisans, Lombards, besides the Knights Templars (collected out of all Nations) and beside the aides of the Astors: all which lay quartered at the Siege in order, as here they are placed, at that time in which the King of France arrived. But Richard King of England with his victorious and triumphant Naue (which when it went out of Cyprus, being much belike augmented * did containe 254 tall Shippes, and about 60. Gallions) brought terror & dismay to the besieged, and comfort to the Christians, * upon the Sunday after Pentecost, being about the middell of June.

(12) The Siege was so vehemently plied, that (notwithstanding sundry dissensions between Philip and Richard, the two competitors of glorie in this voyage) after severall breaches and assaults, the last whereof was made by the Pisans and English, upon the twelfth of July following, many offers of composition made by the Saladine, being utterly refused, the City of Acon was rendered to the Christians upon these conditions. 1. That Saladine (Prince of Miscreants) should by a certaine day restore the holy Crosse. 2. That he should let at liberty fifteen hundred Christian Captives. 3. That the City with all the things contained therein should remain and be to the Christians. 4. That the Turks or Sarazens should have their lives once only saved, if these conditions were performed. 5. That they should pay twenty thousand Bazans (pieces of gold) toward the charges of the Kings. To take possession for the French, there was sent in Drogon de Merleu, and one hundred men of Armes, and for the English, Blond de Gornay with the like number, who equall parted the City, goods, and people, betwene them.

(13) And euennow Philip King of France, as well because the Earle of Flanders died at the siege without succour, whose countries hee long had coveted, as for euill will to Richard, whose noble Acts so farre outwent his, and because, as some write, hee had taken bribes of Saladine, to mediate nothing but return, asking licence of King Richard to depart, being then but the tenth day after the Cities surrender, so badly his enuious eyes could, as it seemed, endure the splendor of this companions glory. The chiefe commanders of his Army hearing this, shewing themselves true French-men, and sensible of their obligation to God and honour, with many teares besought him not to forsake that holy affaire, as impudent, so shamefully. In what Prince would not this haue kindled a desire of a better resolution? But impotent passions carrying him, and mis-carrying him, he perswaded to get leave of Richard, who but two dayes before, would haue had him sweare to a stay of three yeares longer in that seruice, but hee who had other cogitations farre more vnworthy of a King, would needs depart, giuing his oath upon the holy Gospels, without which oath King Richard would not permit his good will. That he would well and faithfully keepe the lands and subiects of the King of England, and neither doe damage nor grievance to them by himself, nor suffer it to be done by others till his returne.

(14) The King of France thus leauing Acon, in the Caille wherof King Richard, his Queene and Sister were lodged, and the Duke of Burgundie remaining behind with the French host, (to whom King Philip not without sundry secret insinuations, had with it committed a great part of his treasure) King Richard in the same day set forward upon a new enterprise; but it is true which one writes, * that by reason of the dissention betweene the Kings, which of them should secure the greater, little or nothing prospered; and ill cause had King Richard to complaine in * his letters, that Philip to the eternall reproch of himselfe and Kingdome, had fouly forsaken his purpose and vow unto God.

(15) But when the Saladine could not by any means obtaine a longer day for performance of the said Articles of composition, hee cut off the heads of all his Christian Captives; in reuenge wherof King Richard brought out his Turkish Captives, (being about two thousand and five hundred) and in the light of the Saladine host caused their heads to be chopt off; the Duke of Burgundie doing the same to the like number, next unto the walls of Acon, seven onlie being kept alive by the Christian Generals, wherof Kerstien Saladine * foster Father was chiefe. But Richard proceeding in his vnderaken action, and in his march to Ioppa, being let vpon by Salut Saladine (who had put the Duke of Burgundie to flight, and slaine the valiant Jahques de Armur, who only with a few in the Regard made resistance) so courageously encountered him, that the Saladine with the losse of three thousand his choicest Souldiers was glad to turn his back and flee: whiles therefore this Champion is thus imploied in the Holy-land, let us looke backe a little how the affaires of his Kingdome are managed at home,

(16) John the Kings brother, making vse in England of such discontentments, as the incredible insincerity, and insupportable pyramides of the Chancelour (who carried himselfe both like a Pope and a King) had bred among the Nobility and people, to advance thereby by his own edgelings, furred against him (though strengthening himselfe like a General in the field,) to powerful opposition, that in the end, (upon warrant of a new * Commission sent from the King his Brother) hee with the rest of the Peeres suddenly thrust him out of all command, and shortly after most reprochfully (as it happened, for he fled, and was taken in a Curtesians attire, ill becoming a Popes Legate) out of the Kingdome also, upon occasion, as of other foule demerits, yet particularly of a sacrilegious and barbarous outrage, committed by the Chancellours command, upon the person of Geoffrey Elect Archbishop of York (natural brother to King Richard, and the Earle) on pretence that hee entered England contrary to his oath giuen to his brother King Richard, where as he then came to take possession of his See, to which hee was advanced by the Kings owne procurement, and by Queene Eleasens owne traualle to Rome in his behalle. And albeit this punishment & shame deservely followed the Chancellors pride and oppression, yet in one maine point of opposing the Earles Ambition; (who sought to assure to himselfe the remainder of the Crowne, which in right of blood belonged to his Nephew Arthur) his seruice to the State had beene very commendable, if it had proceeded from loyalty of affection, and not from a surrelling desire of greatness, which he hoped still to enjoy, if Arthur (a child) should succeed in the kingdome, whereas he knew Earle John advancement could not be without his apparent ruine.

(17) But Philip King of France in all places labouring by a wrongfull and vnprincipally aspersions to deface the renouwe of King Richard, though finding small credite to his words (because the man had done nothing himselfe) deuised after his return bow to trouble and endamage his friends dominions, and had effected it, if the Lordes of France whom he solicited to that wicked worke, upon pre-tenace of the composition made with King Richard at Mitthe, had not to their immortal glory) refused to fulfil him therein, till Richard returned, as well in regard of their own oaths, as because the sentence of excommunication was denounced against all such as did attempt to endamage him in his absence.

(38) King Richard notwithstanding that the relation of these things greatly troubled him, gave not over as yet, but afterundry other matters of importance performed, did march up within the sight of Jerusalem, where he skirmished with the enemy, & overthrew the Conoy or Caravan of the Saladins, which came laden from Babylon, guarded with ten thousand men: whom King Richard valiantly encountering with five thousand selected souldiers, put most of them to the sword, and took three thousand Camels, and four thousand Horses and Mules, besides those that were flaine, and so gained the rich spoile of all the Carriages.

(39) Afterwards, many other worthy things done, as the rescue of Tappa, and repulse of Saladin from thence, &c. the King indefatigable in his brave attempts, desirous to regaine Jerusalem, and the City Barruck, was abandoned in that enterprise by the Duke of Burgundie (who is said to have beene apparently corrupted with gifts from Saladin, and the regiments of French under his conduct) whereupon he was the rather persuaded by the Knights Templars, and chieftes of the Christian host, not to refuse Saladin offers for a surrender from hostility, considering that hee had a purpose to returne with reinforced numbers and meanes; that his present powers by dilutions, by sickness, by battales were wasted, and that the dangerous estate of his owne Dominions did require his presence, (the greatest motive, for he had supplies of money for his souldiers wages from Pope Clement) by reason of some vndue practices at home, and therencout of King Philip his vnreconcilable aduersary abroad. Whereupon a truce was taken for three yeeres, and Saladin repaid such charges as Richard had been at in fortifying Akkalon, which was brought to the same estate, as in which King Richard found it.

(40) But the King of England, though hee had very far excelled all the Christian Princes in great exploits at that iourney, because he had neither conquered Saladin, nor Jerusalem, did mourne, and parted penfise. In the holy-land hee left Henry Earle of Champaigne, (who upon taking the said Barruck was to have beene crowned King of Jerusalem, which Guido had resigned) and hee left Guy de Lusignan (the late King of Jerusalem in Cyprus, to whom hee had passed it, in exchange for the other, to aduance his kinsman the said Earle of Champaigne; which, upon his Title, the familie of Lusignan for many de-centes after did possesse and enjoy. Thus Richard having ordered his affairs in the East parts, set sail homeward. The Queene Berengaria his wife, and Joan his sister, with the Captiue Lady, Daughter of the Cypriot Emperour, vnder the conduct of Stephen de Tornhem (hearing of the Kings most heuie fortune) sojournd at Rome about fixe moneths, for feare of Richard's enemies, & afterward came safe by Marsilius in Poitieu.

(41) God, whose cause was onely pretended in this voyage of the Christians, did not seeme to approue the said truce; for hee scattered the English with a terrible tempest, and the opportunity of Conquest was so lost, that hitherto it could neuer bee regained, and the King of England letting it slippe when God had almost put the same into his hands, did miserably fall into the enemies hand. Certainelie, the name of Richard was at that time growne terrible to Saladin, who had recoiled diuers losses, foiles and overthrowes at his handes: Moreover, the Saladins whole estate being endangered by such of his own fact as repudied him a meere vipers, hee could not long withstand the double impression of the Christian Crueltie, and of his owne Allies and Countreymen; as indeed not long after he died, leaving his Empire forly, but iustly, distracted by ciuill confusions: whereas by this Truce the crafty Turke made the world see, that the powers of two so potent Monarkes had in a manner effected nothing; & Richard could neuer haue time to return for accomplishment of his designs; for which all Christendome hath at this howre reason to bee sorrowfull, and heroe himselfe was very sensible, so that hee would oftentimes crie out, that hee was not alwayes wise, allying to this occasion lost.

(42) But the noble King, hoping to pierce with speed through Germany in disguise, tooke to him the name of Hage a Merchant, the haire of his head and beard growne very long, being the fitter to conceale him; but in his iourney ouer land, was neere to Vienna happlly discouered by the profoussence of his expens; when hee law he could not escape them, in contempt of his fortunes, he put on roiall garments, and refused to yeeld but onely to the Duke himselfe, who came with ioy as to a prey which heeore longed for: but the rascall multitude cried things worthy of themselves, calling him (O barbarisme) Traitor, and some saying, stone him, some cut off his head, & others hang him: and because the inhumanity of this rage may be suited with times as rude and ragged, you shall in such heere the cause of this Arch-dukes malice growing first at Acre, where the Author speaking of King Richard saith;

*He gate it done with his great Ordinance, And on the waller his banners full high set,
The Kings Armes he set up also of France, And King Guyes Armes of Ierusalem well bet, The Duke of Oylster Limpold without let,
Set up his Armes after aboue them all, Which King Richard did cast downe from the wall.*

(43) And though it is certaine that this Author faimes not this fact, for that some such matter (and told by some with more disadvantage to Richard's cause) is by others related; yet the grauell Authors agree (that next to the common enuie at this vertues) the greatest pretence was the murder of the Murquell Conrad committed at Tyre, by two cruel Assassins, as certaine sect in the East, living under a Senior or Ruler, whom they know as a Prophet by whom they are sent forth to murder such Princes as fauer them not, promising themselves the reward of immortality by obeying him in all things, though with the losse of their owne liues. Of which barbarous fact Henric the Emperour, and Leopold the Arch-duke (whose neer kinsman Conrad was) would seeme to beleue that Richard was the Author, though therein they touch his princely reputation and integrity, a most iniuriously, for that the chiefe of that sect by their owne publike letters (written with the blood of the first-fall called Murex, wherewith Scatlet tied to be dyed) acknowledging the fact, declared the true cause thereof, which was a particular Act of iniustice in Conrad himselfe: There wanted not sundry other pretences, as in such cases is usual, as that Richard had entered league with Tancred King of Sirida the Emperours enemy, and that hee had thrust the Cypriot (their kinsman) out of the Empire, and kept his onely daughter Captiue. But this booty being too great for a Duke, the Emperour got into his custody, meaning to coine much gold and silver out of his most vniust affliction, by sharpe imprisonment, which could not make him in any act or speech, or gesture of his, shew beneath the Maieutie of a victorious Prince and King of England.

(44) The diuinall newes thereof flying through the world, presently disclosed who were found or vnfinie, sorrow and dismay was euery where among his owne: His carefull mother and other his faith friends friends I swear the same to be true to King Richard, watch the coasts and provide for the security of the State with singular vigilance, assuring the Cities & good Townes with Bulwarks, Wallies, and Munition. On the contrary, Earle John being (by the cunning insuigling and suggestions of his brothers professed foes) just onely put out of all hope of his releasement, but also incited against him for intending the Crowne to his Nephew Arthur, entered in to an unthought attempt against his Soueraine Lord the summe whereof, take in the words of Thomas Fitzpatrick, who said, that John with promises allured many to him through the whole Kingdom, did carefully and speedily fortifie his holds in England, and passing the seas, entered into league with the King of the French, that he might venter put his Nephew Arthur, Duke of Brittain from that hope, which the Brittain had conceived of his promotion. The Germans giving any way to his disloyal practices, hee swears fealty to Philip King of France (his brothers most mortal enemy) and also that he would take to wife the Lady Alice King Philip's sister, though polluted by his owne Father, and for that cause rejected by King Richard. Out of Normandy he posts into England, solicits Peeres and people, and was loyally refused: but hee not quieted so labours to stirre the Scot and Welsh to joine in an insurrection with him: the French and Flemings assuring them that his Brother King Richard would never be set at liberty: but William King of Scots would neither give assent, nor countenance to such vndutiful practices, or rather madnesses.

(45) In this most perillous time the valour and loyalty of the City of Rouen (the choicest of Normandy) did most clearly shew themselves to the everlasting commendation thereof: for Philip coming before it with a puissant Army solicited the revolt, promising mountaints. In stead of answer: they set open the gates, telling him that hee might enter if he would, for no man hindered him: but the vaine-glorious King being better advised (for the inhabitants, yea & the damsels of the City, whose heads were polde like as mens powdered molten pitch, and such like matter vpon the heliers) retreated from the wallies, and marche away confounded: and being certainly aduertized that the Emperour and King Richard were agreed, hee sends out to Earle John, bidding him take to himselfe, for the Diuel was now let loose. Hee thereupon crost over the seas to Philip, who excited him to vsurpe the Kingdom of England.

(46) Neuertheless by Queene Eleanor's negotiation (who in person traueled to the Emperour) the King her sonne was come to be assured of his liberty vpon these conditions. 1. That hee should pay to the Emperour one hundred thousand Markes sterling. 2. That hee should pay fifty thousand Markes of like money to the Emperour and Duke. 3. That hee should marry his Niece, (sister to Arthur Duke of Brittain) to Duke Leopold sonne. 4. That the Emperour should secure him, till hee were vnder safe with a fore-wind. 5. That hee should let the Cypriots person at liberty, and deliuer his daughter to the Duke of Austria, who was her vncle, and should deliuer 67 hostages for assurance of all.

(47) But to colour this vnreasonable and vnprincipled extortion, the Emperour by his Imperiall Charter gaves vnto King Richard, France, and sundry other ample territories, containing 5. Archbishopsricks, and thirty three Bishopsricks: (some time parcel of the Empire, but both then and a long time before out of possession) & thereto crowns him King, writing magnificent letters into England, with such like offices.

(48) Now when King Richard (who had wonne to himselfe wonderful honour and respect, even of the courteous Emperour, by the proofe of his innocency and by his most noble and constant carriage) did expect his liberty at an assembly or diet, where the greatest Princes and States of the Empire were in person, to wit, The three Archbishops of Mentz, Cologne and Salzburg. The three Bishops of Truier, Spire, and Leips. The three Dukes of Saxe (the Emperours brother) Austria, and Lusatia: The Count Palatine of Rheine, &c. which had undertaken for the Emperour, whole officers had already received the greater part of the ransom: behold mee then the Emperour shewes a willingness to breake off, producing the letters of Philip King of France, and of John Earle of Artois, in which they offer an huge summe &c. too impious and dauntles to speak of: but the Princes who had undertaken to King Richard for good dealing, went to the Emperour reproaching him for his avarice, who would so dishonourably trauele and start backe from the agreements: vpon the fourth of February therefore being Friday, the Archbishops of Mentz and Cologne restore him, after siterene months imprisonment, to Queene Eleanor his mother, free from the Emperour, all that were patient weeping thereat for ioi.

(50) And indeed it was Gods Angell did it: for after all this, whilst the King staid for a wind, and other preparations at the Sea-shore, the Emperour repenting him of his release, sent speedily guarders to apprehend him againe, vowing he should neuer be freed from bonds whilst hee liued: but some secreete message (as Princes Courts neuer want Spial) speedily premonished him, and so he vye little time he preuented his pursuers, landing happily at Sandwich, in April the Sunday after Saint Georges day: where in stead of all other triumphes, or particular of ioy for his returne, wee will content our selues with onely one, as signe of the rest. When the King drew nere to Rochester, the venerable new Archbishop of Canterbury Hubert (who had bene with him at Acre in the Holy-land) went ioyfully forth to meet him: whom when the King saw, hee dismounted from his horse, and hauing bowed his knee, fell vpon the earth, in like sort the Archbishop lay right against him: at the last both of them rising from the ground, they ranne into each others arms, comforting themselves with mutuall embraces & weeping with ioy.

(51) The iustice of a true history will not suffer vs here to forget, in what sort the iniustice of this vnobscure captiuitie of Richard King of England, was punished by God, and on Gods behalfe. The Duke of Austria Countrey, and people, being visited with these five plagues, Fire, Water, Barrennes, Wormes, & Pestilence: the Fire, casually burning his Towne, the Riuer of Danubius drowning ten thousand of his Subjects, in an overflow; the earth waxing drie and leaze; the Wormes destroying such fruit and graine as grew; and the stroke of Pestilence killing the principall Nobles and Gentlemen of his Dominions: The Duke for all this continued obstinate like another Pharae, swearing to cut off the heads of King Richard's hostages, unless all his Coenantes (though extorted by cruell Daresse) were exactly and speedily performed. Baldwin de Betun (one of the hostages) is sent to the King with this bloodie message, but before his returne, vpon 5. Stephen day in Christmas, the Duke's surring his horse in sport vpon a Castle of snow among youters, which were counterfeiting a siege, and an assault, with the slip of his horse, brake his foot in such sort, as it came to be cut off, and within a while feeling himselfe perishing vpward, so that his death was certaine, could not bee absolved of his Bishops from the sentence of Excommunication which had by the Pope bin denounced, till hee and his Lords had sworne to release all the land matters betweene the King of England and him; but his sonne after his death refusing the performance, his Fathers body lay stinking about ground eight daies, for that no clergy man durst burie it, being but conditionally abolished, till the son did yeeld to the performance; yea if some may be credited upon his bare word) the sonne did voluntarily condiscend, and not upon this compulsion.

(53) But albeit the Emperour * to declare himselfe wounded with some remorie for his vngodlie violence, or to engage others in the impietie, gave three thousand Markes of King Richards ransom to make silver Censures through all the Christian order, who generally refused the gift, as parcel of an accursed spoile; for as for those security thousand marks, which hee forgave to King Richard, with as bad a purpose (being to hinder peace betweene him, and the French) as he had taken the other violently, they are not to be accounted as restitution, but as the wages of sinne;) revenge forsooke him not, being pursued by his owne wife (the Heire of the Crowne of Sicily) in revenge of some cruelties done to her Countinens and after reconciliation with her, falling dangerously sicke, he died at Messina, excommunicated for King Richards cause. And albeit hee had in his life time lent his Chancellour out of purgation, of purpose to offer King Richard recompence for the injuries he had sustained, and although Constantia the Emperesse had sent the Archbishoppe of Messina (while the Emperours body lay about ground without buriall) to Pope Celestin in humble manner, praying Christian buriall, yet * unless the money which hee had extorted from the King of England were restored, hee could by no entreaties obtaine it: which accordingly was promised.

(54) Neither were the King of Englands afflictions unprofitable unto him, for they gave him occasion to reforme his life, taking home to him his Queene Berengaria, whose society for a long time hee had neglected, though she were a roiall eloquent, & beauteous Lady, and for his love had ventured with him through the world.

(55) King Richard after his ioyous returne Into England, having at the Abbey of Saint Edmunds, in performance of his vow (as may seeme) offered up the rich Imperiall Standard of Cyprus, Emperour of Cyprus, which hee tooke among the spoiles of the Christian Campe: thence hee marched, and tooke in by surrender such Castles as the servants of his brother Iohn (believing that the King was not returne ned) held against him; but Henry de Pomeray, who had fortified Saint Michaels Mount in Cornwall, hearing for certaine that King Richard was come, fled for very feare. And now, forty daies of summons being expired, which were allowed to Eustace Iohn, & Hugh Bishop of Coventry, for making their appearance, to answer to such heinous matter as was prepared, and they not appearing, Iohn was adjudged by the Peeres and States of England, to have forfeited all that hee might foresee in the Realme, and the Bishop to be punishable by the Ecclesiasticall censure; as hee was a Bishop, and likewise an Officer of the King, by the Laitie. Richard afterwarde bestirres himselfe to draw in money more greedie, then did become to great a Maiesty, wherein yet (saith one) hee was rather to be pardoned then accused, for that hee was precisely to lead a mightie Armie against the French.

(56) But first of all, to wipe away both the sinnes and contumelie of his late restraint, for a better fortunes beginning, he caused himselfe to be crowned againe at the City of Winchester, which ecclesiastie was honoured with the presence of William King of Scotland, who bare sword before King Richard: betweene which two Princes, there followed great amity and tendernesse of love; then being granted to him, and his successors Kings of Scotland, a certaine pension, with sundry other allowances, and princelie attendances, from the first day of their friendlie entrances at any time Into England, till their returne.

(57) The King likewise caused a new broad Seale to bee made, requiring that all Charters granted vnder his former, should be confirmed vnder this, whereby he drew a great masse of money to his Treasurie, substituting such reward Charters thus: This was the tenor of our Charter vnder our first Seale, which because it was lost, and in the time of our being captiv in Almaine was in the power of another, wee caused it to be changed. Or Some have observed that as this Richard was the first of the English Kinges who bare Armes on his Seals, as appeareth by the former: was bee the first who carried in his shield, three Lions passant, borne cutt after for the Regal Arms of England. And whereas wee see here the Moone in her fall, which in the other was bot a Crescent, (which is the Turkish Ensigne,) it may seeme to be done Emblematically in that sense, as wee read of another Prince (who going against the Turkes) gave a Crescent with this word, Plenior realdo, I will returne more full. The true draught of this second Seale we have here annexed.

(59) Neither was his clemency lesse then his courage, whereof needs no greater testimony, then when vpon Earle John's dutifull submission, & his mothers intercession, he so freely forgave him, as that he calmly said, It would that thy fault may so be forgotten of me, as that thy selfe might keep in memorie what thou hast done. and afterward restored his possessions vnto him; the Earle from that time forward becoming his true Knight, & doing him very noble seruices, (especially against the French who had seduced him) as a loving brother, & faithful Liegeman, whereby he made amends for his former excesses, and fully recovered the hearty affection of his Lord and brother.

(60) There were after this sundry skirmishes, rakings of Prisoners and Townes, and conferences betwene the French and English, moued betike, by such as religiously tendered the effusion of Christian blood, so as no great matter was yet effected; that which was, being rather by Seratzings and flarts, then by battle; but within thirty euen daies after the French mens flight from Vermand, King Richard (in reuenge of that defolation which the French King had brought vpon the City of Breux, where he neither spared age, sexe, nor Church) coming to Vendome, with purpose to surpris the King of France; had the spoile of the French Campe, their King (a thing almost incredible) now the second time flying without battle. Many of the French were slaine, and taken, together with much treasure, the Chappell roall, the Indentures of such as had left Richard to serue King Philip, and all  tents, carriages, and other furnitures for warre:* and from hence marching in Patience and Engulisme, hee had such successes (howsoeuer the silent partialities of forraign Writers smooother them) that himselfe wrote ouer to his deereft Hubert Archbishoppe of Canterburie, That by Gods fauour, who in all things considers the right, hee had taken Taisburg, Marfise, and all the other Castles of Geoffrey de Barone, the City of Engulisme, and all the Castles and Territories of the Earle thereof, and almost three hundred Knights, or men of Armes, and about forty thousand armed Souldiers.

(61) We will not here ouerpasse, that which Houedon reports, (being an example of Christian repentance in Princes) of a poore Hermit coming to this noble Monarch, and preaching to him the words of eternall life; and bad him bee mindfull of the subseruion of Salem, and to abstaine from things vnlawfull, wherevnto (saith he) the deferred vengeance of God will come vpon thee: The Hermit being gone, the King neglected his words: but not long after falling sicke, hee more seriously bethought himselfe, and afterward waxing sound in soule, as well as body: his daily exercise was to rise early, & not to depart from the Church till diuine seruice were finished: whereupon (saith Houedon) how glorious it is for a Prince to beginne and end his seruice in him, who is beginning without beginning, and ending the ends of the earth. Moreover, hee bountifullly releued every day much poore both in his Court and Townes about: and restored gold and siluer vessels to such Churcher, from which to pay his ranfome they had bene taken away.

King Richard
M. Paris. 1. 2. 1. 1.

(62) After this passed sundry interchanges betwixt the French and English, sometimes of warres, with walls and spoiles, sometimes of truces with interuiewes and Parties; in one of which, the Lady Alice, (cause of much mischief) K. Philips sister, was restored (according to the contract of Melford) to her brother, who forthwith bestowed her in marriage, vpon John Earle of Penfith. In the mean while the Kings fought to make friends vpon all sides: but King Richard by his munificence, and other means, drew from King Philip a mighty party of his neereft neighbours:  Baldwin Earle of Flanders, Raymond Earle of Toulouse* to whom also King Richard gaue in marriage, his sister Isabel Queen of Sicily; the Chastipans and others: so that Philip was faine to trust wholly vpon himselfe: for whereas hee had lately married the sister of the King of Denmarke, of purpose to vntie the Danish shipping against the English, that affinity proued enmay: for the next day after his wedding, hee put her away, pretending (besides other things) that hee was of too neere a propinquity of blood albeik most vntuall, as her brother, the King of Denmarke proved before the Pope, though he could not be heard, the King of France more pretending, rather by feare or fauour.

(63) About this time, John the Kings brother & Markedy Capitaine of the Strabeners, called the  Reuertes*, had made an incursion vnto Beauvais, where the Bishoppe, being also an Earle of the Roiall Blood, and the eleventh Peere of France, valiantly fighting, was taken in the skirmish, armed at all points, and brauely mourner; on whose behalfe the Pope (vpon the Bishops humble suite, pleading the Clergies immunity) wrote somewhat earnestlie to King Richard, to let his seruice cease, for so hee called the Bishop, at liberty: The King in a kind of pleasant earnestnesse, caused the Habergeon and Curaces of the Bishop to be presented to the Pope, with this question (alluding to that of  Jacobs* children to their father, concerning Iosephs garment,)  Vnde an tunicis suis tui sumus, Scit whether it be thy fathers coat or no.* Whereupon the Pope replied, that  he was neither his sonne, nor the sonne of the Church, and therefore should be ransomed as the Kings will please: but hee was rather iudged to be a seruitor of Mars, than a Souldier of Christ.* Whom the King of England (in a reuenge of many euill offices, especially in the time of his captiuitie with the Emperour) handled harshly. The Bishop at length waxing impatient, writes a passionate letter to the Pope; whose answer in parts here set downe, for that it notably defends the King of England. If (saith the Pope) thou hast had ill successe, it is no maruaille, for putting off the peaceable Prelate thou didst put on the warlike Souldier, and rashly too, lest a shield in stead of a cope, a sword for a Stole, a Curace for an Albe, an Helmet for a Miter, a Lance for a Bishops staffe, perverting the order, & course of things: neither meant you (as you alledge) to repell violence but vertue, nor did you fight for your Country, but against it: for of your France we can now publicly pronounce;  vnto to that land whose King is a Child.* For your King was strictly bound by oath orall oath to the King of England, not to damage his territories, &c. at least wile till his returne from the journey of his Pilgrimage: nevertheless, contrary to his faith and oath, hee without all shame seized by force the good townes of the said King, and cruellie wasted his Dominion with hostile hand: but that King returning at last out of captiuitie, manfully encountered your King, not reposing his hope in mankind, but in Almighty God, &c. Humility therefore against pride: right and equity against wrong, measure and modesty against intemperance and arrogancy, haue certainly hitherto fought for the King of England, &c. Wee haue notwithstanding directed our supplicatorie letters to him on thy behalfe, &c. for in such a case we neither can nor ought command, &c. Meane while beare your bands and sorrowes patientlie, &c.

(64) While thus sundry warlike matters passed betwene the English and French, the King of England encreaseth his side with new associates, Arthur Duke of Britaine, the Duke of Louens, the Earles of Gynes, Saline, Perre and Blais with others: and  Houedon* recites three severall times within a short space, in which the King of France was driuen with losse loffe and dift honour out of the field by King Richard, beſide the loffe of Saint Omers, of Air, and of other Townes wonne by Baldwin Earle of Flanders, and beſides the waite of the French Dominions by many inſaſions. But the greateſt of the three victories was the ſecond, which King Richard gained at the baſtelle betweene Crecy and Ghyers, where the K. of France himſelfe fell into the river of Biſe, the bridge breaking vnder him, with the throng of people which fled for their lives before the Engliſh Li- ons: neither was hee eaſily ſaved (twenty of his men of Armes being drowned by that ruine) but before he could be drawne out, water had gotten into his belly.

(64) This was a famous victory, for beſides a long Catalogue of great names extant in Authors there were taken by the Kings Armie, 100. Knights and Seruitours on horſe-backe, and footmen without number, beſides thirty men of Armes, and other inſcouriſh Souldiers not countable, which Marſhaldey (Generall of the Rowtes) had for priſoners. There were alſo taken 200. great horſe, whereof ſeuencore had barbs, and caparions armed with yron. King Richard in his owne perſon did moſt nobly for with one ſpeare he threw to the earth. Mathew de Beaumercancie, Alan de Ruſei, and Fulk de Ciferuall, &c. took "them. So haue we vanquiſhed the King of France "at Ghyers (ſaith the King) howbeit we haue not "done the ſame, but "God and our right by vs: and "in this fact we did put our owne head and king- "dome in hazard aboue the counſell of all that were "ours. Howſoeuer therefore the French or others may ſhubber ouer ſuch a noble Journey, we haue not doubted vpon ſo good warrant to record the ſame.

(65) The warre continuing ſtill, many vertuous men laboured to make a ſinall accord; and the new Pope innocentius the third, biniſſing proclaimed a new vndertaking of the Holy-writer, ſends a Cardinall Deacon to atone the two mighty Kings of France and England. At length Armes of peace were drawne, but Richard (being farre before hand) was nothing haſtie to conclude, and therefore put it off, till his returne from Faldou, whether hee went to chaſtiſe his rebellſhough "one ſay, hee did then conclude the peace.

(67) At this enterview or treatie, Philip King of France, (the ſwearer of ſtriſe, though he ſought peace) ſhewed to King Richard a deed, in which Earle John newly yeelds himſelfe Liegeman to King Philip, againſt his brother. A wonderfull thing (ſaith Houſe- hold) that Richard ſhould beleene it (being perhaps but a Copie of that deuce or trickie, if it were a deuce which they once had jointly put vpon the ſame John, as in the end of King Henry the ſecond you heard) who therupon forthwith diſſiſſed the Earle his brother euenly where. But the Earle hauing ſearched and learned the cauſe of the Kings ſudden diſpleaſures, (whoſe loue hee had before redeemed with many ſmall ſeruices) He ſends two men of Armes to the French Court, who ſhould on his behalf, in what ſort ſwore defend his honour and innocencie, againſt any his accuſers: but there was no man found in that Court, neither King nor any other, who would undertake the proſe or maintenance thereof in ſerueſon euer afterward Richard held his brother more deare, and gave little credit to King Philip words.

ative royall, or elſe miſſiſſing that the Vicount ſhould make the partition) came with a power to a Caſtle of the Vicounts called "Chalons, where hee ſuppoſed the Riches were; the Garriſon of which place offered to yeeld the ſame, and all therein, if onlie their lives and limbs might be ſaved: but hee would not accept of any condicions, bidding them defend themſelves as they could, for he would enter by the ſword and hang them all. It grieues me to thinke that ſuch a Prince ſhould ſo forget himſelfe: but be- hold the ſeuerty of Gods iudgement. An Archbuiſher (or Archbiſhop) ſtanding vpon the wall, & ſeeing his time, charged his ſteele bow with a ſquare arrow or quarrell, making fiſt his prayer to God, That hee would dreſſe that fiſt, and deliuer "the innocency of the beſieged from oppreſſion. Whereupon diſch- tring it, as the King was "taking a view of the Caſtle within the danger and diſtance of ſuch an Engin, & the King (vpon hearing the howle goe off) ſtooping with his head, was mortally wounded in the left ſhoulder; the anguiſh & perill whereof was extremely augmented by the becherly and vniſkillfull hand of the Surgeon, who hauing drawne out the wood and not the "enormous yron, "mangled the arme with cruell incisions before hee could preſerue the paine whereof halſand his end.

(69) Concerning the name of this tragick Archer, there is ſo much variety, as that we could willingly take the uncertainty for a warrant to ſilence it: being loath to enuoble him with our pen, it being a thing worthily puniſhable with verſe obſaie, to haue ſhed (though deſervently or but caſtally) the blood of ſuch a King. Mathew Paris in calling him Peter Raſſis, ſeemes to allude to ſome ominous conceit in Raſſis (which with the Greeks ſignifies a King): him Thomas Walsingham follows therein, as Mathew Paris followed: another there want not "ſome who alſo gine him a third name; but Houſehold who diſ- uers this accident, as all the reſt of this Kings life, in the moſt probable and fullſt manner, calls him Bertram de Gorſum, applying vnto him certaine "verſes of Lucan, in commendation of his vnappell'd conſpi- cy, when he came before King Richard: where then ſaith perhaps (for ſatisfaction of thy mind, with be- holding ſome reuerence) deſire to know what became of the Actor. After that the Caſtle by continuall aſſaults was taken, and (by the Kings command) none left alive but he (as being referred perhaps to ſome more ſhamefull death) the king vpon a chriſti- an magnanimity) forgaue him the fact, which the party without thew of diſmay did neither deny nor excuſe, but alledged the neceſſity of his caſe, and the iuſtice of Gods worke in it, for that the king had ſlaine his Father and two Brothers with his owne hand: being herupon ſet at liberty and one hundred ſhillings ſterling ginen him by the king: Mar- ſhaldey (Captain of the Mercenary Rowtes) after the king was dead, tooke him, ſlewd him quick, & then by hanging ended his life.

(69) King Richard feeling the approach of certaine death, diſpoſed his worldly eſtate, thus: to his brother John he gave the kingdome of England, and his other dominions, with three parts of his Treſure, commanding ſuch as were preſent to ſwure him fealty: to his Nephew Ortho king of Amaine, he be- queathed (as it ſeemes) all his goods and chattels, money excepted, and the fourth part of his ſaid treaſure he gaue to his ſervant, and the poore. And hauing thus diſcharged his laſt cares toward the world concerning his tranſitory ſtate, he prepared himſelfe for the preſence of God, ſtrengthening his ſoule "with hartie contrition, confeſſion, and participation of the holy Sacrament: commanding further, that when he was dead, "his bowels ſhould be buried at Charrou, among the rebellious Preſ- byterians, as thoſe who had only defaced his worſhip: but his Heart to be enterr'd at Ram, as the City, which for her conſtant ioyalty had merited the ſame, and his Corps in the Church of the Nunniack at Fent-

*Font-Elvardin Galesigne, at the feet of his Father King Henry, to whom he had been sometime disobedient: and God affording him gracious leisure till hee had thus disposed of all; the venemous vapour ascended to his heart, and draue the spirite forth, with whom (say * Authors) the glory and honour of Military skill enjoyed.*

(70) There hath been an opinion, or fancy, that this King was called Cardelus, because hee encountered a Lynx in prison at the Emperours Court: but (saith * one very truly) these are fables imagined by English tale-tellers to aduance their King Richard, as the Britaines, by the like, aduanced their King Arthur. The like druce (though more lofty and Mathematicall) may their seeme, who coniecture, hee was called so of the famous * Starre called Cor Leonis. But how the conceits of killing of a Lynx should come vp, as it is not worth the while to enquire, so certainly, Hugo de Noule (one of King Richards speciall familiars) is recorded to haue slain a Lion in the holy-Land, druing first an arrow into his breast; and then running him through with his sword: whence perhaps that achievement is transferred from the man to the master; and the story applide to the by-name of King Richard, whereof the true reason is that which * Thomas Walsingham mentioneth, saying; That for the magnanimity of his heart, proffusum in proflans, saith an * other, meaning, as it seemes, that his materiall heart is self, was bigge and massive, which another also saith was inexpugnabile: this King was both by the English & Normans called Cor de Leon.

His Wives.

Alien the daughter of Lewis the fourth, King of France, by Queene Alice daughter of Earle Thibault of Champaigne, is by * some reputed the first wife of King Richard, though indeede she were * onely contracted to him (being both children) and committed to his Father, but when he demanded her, his father refused to deliuer her, or she to com to him, or both: Wherefore being King, conceiuing displeasure against King Philip her brother, and more then suspecting her concency with his owne father (by whom hee alledged she had a child) he refused to take her: yet * gave a hundred thousand pounds to Philip pro quaerenda Alimonia, to be quite freed from her. She became the wife of William Earle of Penhryn, and had issue Queene Joan of Castile, the mother of Queene Eleanor, wife to King Edward the first.

Beatrice the second wife of King Richard, was the daughter of Sanches the fourth of that name, King of Nauarre, issue of King Garcie the fourth: her mother was Beatrice daughter of Alphonse, the fourth King of Castile, called the Emperour of Spain. She was conceiued by Alphonse the kings mother vnto the king in Sicily, and married to him in Cyprus, whence she accompanied him to the Holy land, The king (vpon what cause we find not) neglected her company for a while, but vpon more sordid thoughts, he resumed her againe to his loue and society, but had no issue by her.

His naturall issue.

Philip, the naturall son of King Richard, seemeth to haue been begotten, while he was Earle of Paynes, of a Gentlewoman Paynes, and to haue had of his fathers gift a towne in Paynes named Samar, to haue taken also his surname, and title of the same towne; and to haue been the Progenitor of a familie of Gentlemen of the same surname & title, in the same Country.

Isabel (by * some who mention not Philip at all) is reputed the Naturall daughter of King Richard, (whose mother the Author nameth not) and that she was married to Leoline Prince of Wales.

Three other Daughters, (Ballards no doubt) he is said to haue of whose names and matches wee will report as we hode recorded. Whiles hee was in France imployed in his warres against King Philip, Isabel a French Prieist, came vnto him, telling him he had three very bad Daughters, which he willed him to bestow away from him in marriage, or else Gods wrath would attend him: when the king denied, he had any daughter, yet quoth the Prieist thou cherisht three daughters, Pride, Auetyousness, and Lechery. The king apprehensiu of his meaning, called his Lords there attending, and saide: My Lords, this Hypocrit hath found that I haue three Daughters: "which I maintaine, viz. Pride, Conuotusnes, and Lechery, which he would haue me bestow forth in marriage: and therefore (if any such I haue) I haue found out most fit husbands for them all. My Pride I bequeath to the haughty Templers & Hospitallers, who are as proud as Lucifer himselfe: My Conuotusnes I giue to the whate Monks of the Cisterce Order, for they conet the Diuall and all: But for my Lechery I can bestow it no where better then on the Prieists and Prelates of our times, for therein haue they their most felicity. Doubtlesse these marriages proued so fruitfull, that their issue hath now ouerflowed all kingdomes of the earth.

calamities met,) had from his infancy been fedde with high and royall hopes, as being his Father's only darling, from whom hee had the possession of the Irish, and intendment also of the English Kingdom: and in his brothers time (whose return from the holy warres all men depai'd) had by gracious deputation towards the Subject obtained an oath of Fealty to himselfe, in remembrance in case his brother should be chas'd off: having now therefore the way to those his designs made smoother by the last Will of King Richard, and allegiance of his Nobles then attending (for these courtiers may facilitate, but not make a right claimer) wee may not thinke, that either hee was cold now, for the accomplishment of that, which so hotly hee had before purposed, or so nice, as to neglect a Kingdome, vpon scrupulous points of Titles and Right. Propinquity of Blood pleaded for John, as Lineall descent for Arthur, the Kings Brother being nearer then his Brothers sonne; but John, who knew that the weaker vie to argue their Titles, whiles the stronger hold the possession, resolved to trie the strenght of his claime by no other Law then of Armes; and therefore, being at time of King Richard's death in those forraign parts, hee makes it his first care to returne to himselfe, by present large, and large promises of forraign fauours, (the usual Rhetoricke of Competitors) all the secondary Souldiers, and other Scutellers of his dearest Brother. To winne himselfe the like assurance aboue at home, and to settle (if it might be) an unquiescent quiet, he forthwith depesched out England (there to concurre with Queene Eleanor, his experienced mother) three of the choicest men of the State, Hubert Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, William Marshall a potent Peere, and Geoffrey Fitz-Peter the great Iusticiar, by whose severall intercesses, the three States of Clergy, Chivalry, and Commonalty, might bee thereby assured to him by fauours, or awed by feare; himselfe, the whiles passing to London, where King Richard's great Treasure was kept; as knowing that hee should hardly get or keepe a Crowne by Forces or Friends; if hee wanted Coine & Crowns, to winne and hold such needfull Ayders.

(3) The Treasurer, though humble with his Stone, Castles and Fidelity, thus assured to the Earle, had yet a powerful Nephew, the Castellan of Angiers, who dedicated to Duke Arthur, to whose vie hee yielded up that City and Castle, with whom also joined the Nobility of Anjou, Maine, and Touraine, surrendering those large Territories, as to their Lord, jointly avowing it to be the Law and Custom of those signiories, that the heritage which was to succeed to the elder Brother, if hee had furnished should descend unto his Sonne. But Constance Arthur's mother, uolente desirous to be Regent to a King (for her son was but twelue yeeres young) then Queene Eleanor disdainfull to goe belowe a Dutchesse, did not care to build her high hopes on so low grounds, for that such subordinate Princes as fauoured her cause, might easily be corrupted by faime means, or crasht by force: and therefore vpon newes of King John's successes in England (for with general applaude and homages hee was now proclaimed King,) distracted with violent and Woman-like Passions, Ambition of her sonnes Right, Rage for his wrongs, feare of his Safety, and (not the least) Emulation that Queene Eleanor (whose Prudence and Grace with the English, had swayed exceedingly) should effect more in a wrong, then her selfe in a iust cause; these lies to Turne to the French King Philip, (to seeke a Wasse to whom shee might commit her Lambe;) to whose Protection those who fully surrenders his Person, his Cause, his Countries, Philip pretending (as Princes vie) a tender care of his Neighbour Princes state, but meaning indeede out of wilful pride, to raise advantage to his owne, forthwith without regard of Truth, or True service to King Richard receiveth Arthur's Cities and Castles with his French Garrison; some of which had scarce put their foot into Manz, but King John was at their heeles, to provide them their last lodging, lacking that Citie, and demolishing it to the ground, for a terror to all others, which after feare once sworne unto him, (as they had done) should dare to revolt.

(4) Queene Eleanor, who having fedd England in Peace, was now come out to forward her sonne in the Warres, and was pretext for the surprising of Manz, is construed to haue too much sharpened her edge against her Nephew Arthur and his friends, out of her implacable dislike, and Enue to towards Constance her Daughter-in-Law, and appears no lesse for the King passing thence into Anjou, left there his Captaines and Forces with his mother, who made Angiers participate the Fortunes of Manz, the City ruined, the Citizens captivated, whiles himselfe committing to Reas, was there by the hands of Walter the Archbishop, in the Cathedrall Church with great pomp on Saint Marks Festival, girt with the Ducall Sword of Normandy, and crowned with the Coronet of Golden Roses, (taking his Oath for faithful administration in that Dukedome) which was the pledge or earnest of his unquestionable admittance to the English Diademe, which every day now expedit him. Neither yet may wee thinke, albeit King John's mature & experienced age, his homebred, and well knowne education, his rearing of Irelande Kingdome to England, made his person more gracious then Arthur's, that yet his Agents all this while in England found no rubbs in their way, before all the Barres, Barons, Burgeses, or Freeholders could bee induced to disclaime Arthur's apparent Right, and to swear fealty to King John as if it were law; yea, many of the English Peeres (who through their last Kings alience, and others conueniencs, had habituated in them a conceit of unconquered Greatnes, which they mistakelie Liberties and Rights, vnder vayne whereof, they after drew, not only vnder vnderstandings vpon the Regalitie, but also infinite calamities and misallures on the people, whose good they pretended in the great Assembly at Northampton, yielded only to swaie a Conditional Fealty, to keepe a Faith and Peace to King John, if hee would resort to every of them their Rights: which was the first seed of disloyalties, which after grew to so great a height. Thus howeuer, all domestick difficulties ouerblowne, and Queene Eleanor left in Aquitaine to provide against Forraigne, King John arrived at Sherrham, and the next day comes to London, preparing for his Coronation to bee at Westminster, the morrow following being Assheton day.

(5) Strange it was to consider, (if ought bee strange in State-plots) how men, otherwise very prudent, transported once with Worldly and seeming-politicall respects, can so willfully cloud their Reason, as to attempt those things, which leaue both a present stain on their Soules, and a lasting disreputation both of their Integrity and wisdom, wherein so much they glory. For what else did Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury, the man so a famous for the Pillar of the Common-wealths Babellion, & incomparable for deep-reaching wisdom, when in that sacred and celebrated Assembly of all the States, addressing for the roall Inauguration, hee added to those Lay-Peeres Conditionall, his Clergy-Synophimes, and second Serde-plot of Treason performing them by a cunning, but disloyall speech (which yet some by transforming, haue more deformed) that the English Crowne was merely Arbitrary and Elective at the peoples deuotion? That they all in discretion were to know, how that no man hath right in any other fore-Tile to succeed another in a Kingdom, unless first with annotation for Grace and Guidance of Gods Holy Spirit hee be by the Body of the Kingdome thereunto chosen, and hee indeed some choice man, so picked out for eminence of his vertues; by the President of Sancti, the first Anointed King, whom God made Ruler over his very people, though neither the Sonne of a King,

(8) The breach betwixt these two great Kings, was the more irreconcilable, by reason of the hatred betwixt King Philip and the Emperour Otho, King Johns Nephew, whose advancement to the Empire (himselfe perhaps aiming to it) Philip still endeavoured to impeach, * not regarding that the Pope, whose power Kings then regarded only, while it made for their purpose, had thundered his Anathemas against all his opposers: and Otho in gratitude to King Richard, who procured him the Diadem Imperial, and in tender regard of his uncles honour, sent him aid, * not to lessen any fauall assistance with the French King, for that himselfe would bring him his strongest Imperiall assistance. Notwithstanding, by the Cardinals-Legates assiduous interceding, a Truce was concluded till the Feast of Saint Hilary: at which time, the Kings comming to a Treaty betwixt Wallon and Bataune Castles, * it was agreed that Lewis the Heire of France should marry King Johns Niece, Blanche, Daughter of Arthurs King of Castile, that King John should give for Dowry the City and Countie of Exeter, with sundry Forts in Normandy, and thirty thousand Markes in silver; vowing also not to aide his Nephew Otho with men or means to attain the Emire: & further, promising to leave off the dispoition of Guyenne Lewis at the Territories he held in France: all which Articles were formerly engroffed, but finally concluded betwixt Bataune & Galesnes (the one, K. Johns, the other, King Philips Castle) the * Oligates of Saint John Baptists, when, these Counties were actually surrendered to Philip, the Lady Blanche espoused to Lewis his son, Duke Arthur (Philip once vowed, but now vnusd charge, yeilded ouer, and made a Sergeant and Menager to K. John for his own Dukedom, whom yet his vncl was content to leaue with King Philip, who had now so left him, and erst had vpheld him, only as the baite of his owne aduantage. If Princes can bee thus vnprincipally degeenerous, what trust can men repose in safer vassals? King John hereupon proued much more heedfull to Philip, then either Philip was to him, or himselfe to Otho the Emperour, who sending his two Brethren Henry Duke of Saxony, and William, surnamed of Winton, to demand the Counties of Torke and Poitou, with the Treasure and Jewels which King Richard bequeathed him: King John denied to yeild thereunto, * only in regard of his Oath which hee had paid to Philip, to yeild no land of aise to the Emperour. And further to redouble, (yea further then he ought) his faithfull meaning to perseuer inire this amity with Philip, * by his aduise he disordered Margarets his wife, sister * more of blood, by leuence of the Archbishop, and Bishops of Bourdeaux, Poitiers, and Xanten, and by the Archbishops hands espoused Isabell, Heiretice of Arthurs Earle of Angoulême, a faire yong Lady, but * de- destined to another bed.

(9) This Final Concord (so called, but not prouing so) with Philip, who now acknowledged Johns the * righteous Heire of King Richard as Crowne, gave him more leasure, to receiue peaceably all * Submitters, and bring in forcibly all * out-landers of those his transmarine Dominions, and after to look home to the affaires of his Kingdome, from which hee had bene (and we there following him) too long absent. Yet in the heate of those forraign imploiments, hee on occasions had his recourses hither to settle his Seate-affaires, and * Crowne-Renewers, to enact whole some laws for forraigne and domestick Commerce, to collect an Ayde for his Nieces great Dowry, and Maritall vices, which later (being three shillings on every Carrucage,) though his first and only Subsidie since his comming to the Crowne, caused much heart-burnings especially by means of his own brother Griffy Archbishoppe of Torke (touching whom the King was * forewarned, that hee would bring a Sword, & not Peaceable England) who bearing himselfe too bold on his blood and place, * forbade the Collectours of that Aide in his precincts (though it were granted to the King generally for all England) and also being required by the King to attend him into France, to conelde the Peace, and his Nieces Elpousall, he very vndoily denied his errand. The King iustly moued with those his dilloyalties, cauled all his Temporallities to bee seized on by his Sheriffe, whom therefore Griffy (adding fresh fuel to the fire) did solemnly excommunicate, cauled the Kings Officers to beate blowes, and interdicted the whole Priuities of Torke. So partiall, and vnhistorically, is the report of one, (a Stranger by birth, but more strange for bold venter) who faines the only incentive of such indigination in the King, was that Prelates reprehension of his Rapines on the people. For (to give a further taste of that Authors vehement fond malice, justly foisted) what ancient Iudicious Writers call an * ad needessary for Warres, that hee entitleth R apines and Spoiles, where they make John his Brothers Heire by Will, hee makes Arthur, they say hee was a valiant man, hee saith he was a Coward, where they make him a pursuer, and Philip flying, hee chargeth him to haue made easily plants, when he should haue drawn sword: where they charge the Peeres for * drawing backe from his Warres, hee maketh them the only floungs, and John the Hinderer: briefly, if at first-flounging hee appeare above, it portends Heuens fury on John: if the * many Element overflow, it bodes Iohns fury on his Land. But surely that pare thereof, which fell on Griffy, it was (you see) not vnderfused: notwithstanding, vpon the Kings returne into England, and Griffys to his more loyall carriage & submission, his Peace was made, at the very time, & for the more celebrity, of Queen Isabels Coronation, with whom the King himselfe was * again crowned at Westminster by Archbishop Hubert.

(10) The Pompe of that solemnitie ended, the King resolved of ending a long depending controuerse with King William of Scotland, who formerlie (before Iohn was proclaimed King) had challenged, as * his patrimonial Right, the Counties of Northumberland and Cumberland, and afterward seeing hee got but words and delays, was ready, (King John being then in France) with an hotter and more forcible argument, to winne, what hee could not craue: but being in dark * deuotion all Night at Saint Margarets Heafe, the fill true * Kingly-hearted Queen perswaded him by a Dreame (for certainly it was no other) took to infill England her native soyle, who thereupon sent backe his Army. But oow hee commeth with a more friendly traine, vpon King Johns sending to him, in Honourable Embassage, the Earles of Huntingdon and Hereford, King Williams Brother and Nephew, his three Souldiers in Law, Lucy, Esey and Rex with others, to desire him to giue him meeting at Lincoln, where accordingly they both meet with kingly curtseys, and the next day, King John to aspicure his Temporal affairs with Spiritual deuotions, (and yet to what what hee thought of some superstitious follies of those times) went * suddenly into the Cathedrale Church, being much dis- tressed by many for Mouth impurities perswaded many it was very ominous for a King to enter thar, and certaine * other places; and there offered a golden Chalice on Saint Johns Aize, which no King be- fore him durst doe. Where his Deuotion performed, the two Kings (in presence of * three Archbishops, thirteene Bishops, the King of South-Wales, with a multitude of English, Scottish, French, and Irish Princes and Peeres, ascending the toppe of that conspicuous & high * hill, on the North side of the Cicle, did there in glorious solemnity, sweare amitie and faithfull loue, * upon the Crozier of Archbi- shop Hubert.

(11) That Spectacle so roial to the beholders, was seconded with another no lesse Honourable to K. John, (for Humility in such great Occasions is more glorious then their glory,) when the King hauing latelie left Hugh Bishop of Lewes (called the Saint, for the opinion of unfained integrity, though¹ blemished with some obliquities, and furcharged with Legends of² fained Miracles) at London very sick (where himselfe with gracious care³ went to visite him and both confirmed his Testament, and promised the like for other Bishops after,) now hearing hee was dead, and his Corps then bringing into the gates of Lewes, hee, with all that princely Train, went forth to meete it the⁴ three Kings (though the Statute was to depart that very day) with their roiall Allies, carrying the Hearse on those shoulders, accustomed to vphold the weight of whole kingdomes: from whom the Great Petres received the same, and here it is the Church Fort, where the three Archbishops and Bishops consulted it to the Quier, and the next day (sit there lying the meane time open face, naked, and in all Pontificall Ornament, with Glories on his hands, and a Ring on his finger) interred it with all solemnities answerable. Yet here the King refused not to give proofe, in so great a height of his lowly mind, and then benigne (how true afterw⁵ asserted) to the Clergy, when twelve Abbots of the Cistercian Habit (whole⁶ whole Order had dispensed him, by refusing to give Aid towarde his great payment of thirte thousand pounds) came now to Lewes, and all prostrate at his feet, craved his gracious favour, for that his Forerethers had driven out (for so the King had given command) of his Pastors and Forerethers all their Cattle, wherewith themselves, and Christs Poore were sustained. The King touched with remorse on so venerable a troope of Suppliants, (though so great offenders) commanded them to rise, who were no sooner up, but the King inspired with divine Grace, fell flat on the ground before them, desiring pardon, adding, that hee not only admitted them to his love, & their⁷ heads to his Pastors, (a speciall favour which Kings had granted that Order,) but would also build an Abbey for men of their sort, (if they would desire some chaste seat) wherein himselfe meant to be entombed. Neither did hee promise them more then hee performed, nor were thole who the Humiliates regarded of choosing a delicate plotte for the purpose, where hee built a goodlie Abbey of their Order, decreedly for the piousness of the place, named Beaulieu, and of⁸ rich Revenue, and excellent Fruitfulness; continuing long of great renowne, as a Castle of refuge inviolable: our Ancestors thinking it most haitious sacrilege, thence to draw any, though willfull Murderers or Traitors: wherein the Founders of such vnchristianized Sanctuaries, & Completes of Mercy (so they called the) through this Kingdom, seemed rather to take Remission for their President, than to graunt favour to casuall Murtherers, yet⁹ commanded willfull Murderers to be drawn from the Altar to the slaughter.

(12) By what degrees, men not only of such reputed religious habit, but also of the Secular Clergy, fell afterward more and more from such fauour of the King, and hee from theirs, a man that will not purposely winkle, may easily behold, both sorts standing to liue on their persons, and their possessions Exemption from Regall command, that whilst the¹⁰ Pope could liue all for any superfluous employment, the King could get nothing, though his Kingdoms were in hazard, as you heard by the disloyall obliquities both of the Archbishop of York, who denied the King his personal attendance, and those Cistercian Monks, whose Coasters were thus locked against him. The like pretended Exemptions of their Clergy-Precursors (as well as of their Persons and Purse) wrought also like offences, both with former Kings, and now with King Iohn, who on the death of Bishop Hugh, refusing to conferre by gift, (as his¹¹ Ancestors did, and¹² himselfe likewise lately had that See, on some whom either merite or affection had endeared to him, the rather, because¹³ men of thole places, in those dayes, were vitally their Soueraignes befoom-

Counsellors)¹⁴ hee was with peremptory affronts withstood by the Cannons there, who very bolde on the Popes vpbearing, rectly very slenderly their Princes displeasing. It is not vnlikely that Archbishop Hubert (left Canterbury might be thought inferior to Turke in daring boldness, his being Papal Legate, in secret bolliuing them had a hand, though closely carried in gloine: for that the man, who lately, gloried the King was wholly his, now finding hee had not the sway hee expected, and thought hee deferred (by obliigation of his first Agency about the Crowne) not only studied to make vpp that by his Legatine Glory which hee wanted by his Princes countenance, but further, (as one who thinks hee extolles his vertue, paints forth his disloyalty) hee repeated now, more then any thing in all his life, that hee had advanced King Iohn to the Crowne. Certes, about this time, hee showed slender respect to his Soueraine, (for as God is in him, so are Kings dishonoured in their Ministers disgraces) when being prohibited by Fitz-Peter, the Kings great Iusticiar and Minister (in the Kings absence) of regall command, & from holding a General Council of his Princes, (neuer vied to be held, but by Soueraine permittance) his pleasure forsooke to take any countermand, but from him especially, who, in calling his inferior, by¹⁵ ioynt defers towards the King, but his Equall, was now, in needfulness and falseness to the King, become farr his Superior. But what speake I of confronting a subordinate power did hee spare to out-beard his Soueraine himselfe! It seemes no, For having notice, the Feast of the Nativity now approaching, that the King intended with his Queene at Guilford, to keepe that festiuitie with great magnificence, hee whole Pallace ordinarily, for splendour, multitude of Attendants, and sumptuous intertainment did strow with the King (as one of his own¹⁶ Successors auows) thought this a fitting time, to shew, both his great state and little regard of his Princes discountenance, by¹⁷ paralleling to the King, his owne sumptuous preparations, with rich attires, and costly gifts for his Attendants at Canterbury. The King (as Kings brooke not to be braued by Subjects, nor is it wisdom for disfauourites to doe it,) moued¹⁸ with great indignation, thought the man had too much riches, & too little Discretion (which seldom lodgeth in the braine, where Pride dwells in the Heart,) and therefore to abate somewhat the one, and learne him more of the other, hauing first bene in the North parts to gather money for his better vyle, hee meant not to lauish it in keeping his Estate, which hee chole rather to doe at the cost of Hubert the Bishop, & not to spare him, who spared not himselfe, hee there incurrall that great expence with a greater, of His, and his Queenes solemn¹⁹ crowning againe on Easter day, in the Cathedral Church; where, in lieu of his expence, Hubert had the formall honour to sit on their Crowns, but yet not the grace to sit neere the Kings Heart.

(13) Such being the first courtesies of hart-burings betwixt the King and his Clergy, after by addicament of daily furling, braut forth into a more fearefull flame; the Lay-Petres were so farr from labouring to quench it, that they made it the fiercer: for their Bellowes of Rebellion, which before their Homages did condition for their Rights & Liberties, were not all this while spiring of their breath, to inflame other Nobles with the like heat of fury. Hell it selfe (whence all Rebellions spring, and thither fall againe) could not with a fitter occasion to broach and aduance such a mischief. For the²⁰ Poymons with King Philip continuance, (taking aduantage of King Iohns absence, and Springs approach) were vp in Armes, dilodged his Garrisons, beleagured his Castles, & tidings whereof recalled King Iohn thoughtres from his Domesticke Pompey, to his Transmarine Affaires; for the present, hee gaue command to his²¹ Seneschall of Normandy, mandy to attempt on them some Counter-ſervices, to withdraw the Seigers, (whom alſo King Philip, hearing King Iohn was in perſon coming over with an Army, forthwith recalled, and publiſhed his general ſummons, that his Earles, Barons, and all that held by Knights-ſervice, ſhould be ready at Perſmouth with Horſe and Armes, on Whitſunday then inſtante, to croſſe the ſea with him. The tumultuous Earles knowing, that the King then needed their preſent hopes, and therefore might be forced to any Capitulations, in a conſentive held at Lewes, by a ſeigne conſpiring, ſent an audacious meſſage to the King, that they would not attend him, unleſſe hee would firſt reſtore their rights, with which diſloyall reſuſal, the King luſtily incensed, by ſome meaneſt precipitate aduſe, conſidering the hazardous time which needed a ſaſe rather than a coaſive, ſeized into his hands ſome of their Caſtles, to prevent their further attempts, of ſome he tooke their children for pledges, and others, whoſe Purſes were likely to doe him truer ſervice than their owners, hee^a releaſed upon payment. At which prefixed time, he diſpatched before him William Earle of Pembroke, and Lord Roger Lacie with 7 two regiments to ioyne with Normandie ſcencall. Whate^a a grace Author iudged of thoſe bold Barrons here, and otherturbulent Great-ones then abroad, may be gathered by this, that as ſoone as meſſage fell in of theſe refractory Lords, he ſtraight fell off, to ſhew bow in that very year, Pope Innocent then reigning in Rome, ſetting out the ſermon in Jeruſalem, a Alexander the Patriarch in Conſtantinople, for to hee-yeerth thoſe three together, with ſome others following them, the great Doctors preached, that there was the time (as prophesied by Satan Iohn) when after a thouſand years reſtance, the Diuell was left loſt, to ſeducethe Nations like a Serpent, and trouble the world like a Dragon: which how true it proved in this our Nation and Iſle: World, (in whole Tragedy the Diuell alſo, amongſt the firſt named Actors, comes now to play his part,) the Diabolical enſuing practices, both of fraud and fury, will hereafter demonſtrate.

to ſerue himſelfe into King Iohns good opinion, (the ſureſt way to overreach another in any commerce) by intricacy obtained his company, firſt to S. Denies Palace, where hee entred with the pompous Proceſſion of the Clergy, and lodged with royall entertainment by the King, and the next day, to Paris, where hee was received with^a very rich Prefents of the City, and great applauſe of all ſorts, to ſee ſo noble arguments of affection betwixt two ſo great princes, lately ſo mortal enemies: where the French King betaking himſelfe to a more priuate manſion, left his owne palace to accomodate and honor Englands King. After ſome daies there beſtowed in princely delights, and entertainments, King Iohn conducted forth of the City by King Philip, and parting with mutual atteſtations of ſloue neer to be parted, tooker his journey towards Normandy, in full hope to enjoy thence forward the contentment of quiet to himſelfe, and peace to his Dominions: but thoſe windy hopes ſoone changed with his change of the aire.

(15) For whiles at Chinon hee was royally entertaining Queene Berengaria his ſiſter (whom^b hee there alſo bounteouſly ſatiſfied in performing the Ioynture promiſed her by King Richard, gaining her the City and Signiory of Bain, two Calles, and their Demaines in Anjou, with a thouſand Markes yeerely for ſcarce of life,) and at^c Argentan in Normandy, where hee kept his Chriſtmas, was ſolacing himſelfe with his faire Queene Iſabel, the Earle of March, Engliſh, ſurnamed Le Breue, a Peere of great power and alliance, to whom Iſabel was firſt promiſed (though for her^d vnripe yeares he neuer bedded her) enſlaved with loue of her, who was now thought worthy to bee a Queene, drew on other Franciſme Nobles, to thinke that hee was unworthy to bee a King, who wrongfully had taken her from him, and would, if not prevented, doe the like in time with them. So, once againe young Arthur, whole former hopes were all cold, is re-kindled by theſe fire-brands, and ſerue by their malice, to ſupplant his vncl, but by Heaues Decree, to overthrow himſelfe how ſoever the Britiſhes, then ſatiniated with his ominous Name, dreamed that the ancient Great Arthur was riſen againe in him, and that the Tranſlation of the Engliſh Kingdom was now by him to be effected. Neither was the^e French King, for all his late painted pretentions of loue, deale to their ſuggeſtions, who laboured to incenſe his hatred againſt Iohn, whereto hee had theſe further inducements; that King Iohn might quicke waxe too potent a Neighbour in that Continent, if his quiet and power were not timely related; that now the means to worke it, were more then before, the^f Engliſh Peeres being alienated in affection from him, for denying their claimed Liberties; but chiefly, that the^g proſpire (ſuch baſe ends can ſome propoſe of ſo Noble a Band) which hee hoped for by his amity (being the^h enſuring of theſe Signiories in the Conſent, if hee durd ſee Iſabel) was now in a manner cut off. Queene Iſabel beginning to pine apparant hopes of ſome faire fraite from ſo faire a ſtemme. Thus whiles Earle Hugh of his loue, Duke Arthur out of Ambition, King Philip out of Auarice, (ah that the nobleſt perſon ſhould haue the baſt end,) but all out of Harred, were contriuing King Iohns ruine; hee was fartheſt from ſuſpicion, when necerſſ his danger, and yet they, who thus were forwardſt to vndermine his Greatnes, were themſelves formeſt to bee cruſt with the weight thereof.

tion of some fruits of those lovely courtships which their last meeting seemed to have engrained; he there found that this last winter had nipt all those faire blossomes. For Philip, forgetfull of all former Compaſſion, and pretending some imaginary wrongs, in outrageous manner required him without delay to redeliver into Arthur's hands, all his Transmarine Dominions, Normandy, Tourayne, Anjou, Poitou, or otherwise as Lord Paramount of those Countreys, which John held by Homage, he peremptorily cited him personally to appear in Laſter Terme at Paris, there to answer what should be laid to his charge, and to abide the Arrest of his Court of Justice. The colour on which he thus did cite him, was (say I some) King John's sharpe repressing of some rebellious attempts of Hugh le Desp' the former year, whereof the Emle complained to King Philip, as to the clerke Lord. King John much amaled to see, not only how looſe diſtemperd into gall, but the French King also turned into an Apparator, disdained both his Citation and Command, as very vnnoble for England's King to accept, or the French to offer; neither indeed did Philip thus put the matter to deying, as intending any such legitime proceeding, but only to make his adversary secure of any other assailes, then by Petty-forgers. For whether it be true or no, what King John for his non-appearance, was by sentence of the French Peers adjudged to loose all his Territories in the Continent: certain it is, that so soon as the Conference with indignation broken off, but Philip (hee had before prepared to effect what hee had prockited) with power and fury assailed Bataigne, Calles, whose Turners (high-reared by King Richard) hee beleaguered with the Foundation, and thence sodainly like a flash of lightning beganne to invaule the neighbouring partes with ravaging and rages, till giving an assaile, (which had held him eight dayes) to the Castle of Redepont, King John coming to the rescue, forced him with flames to speed away. To repaire which dishonour, and to empaire the English forces by distraction of imploiment, returning to Paris, hee there appointed for Arthur (to whom hee had now affianced his younger daughter) both certaine selected Nobles to bee protectors to secure and guard his person, & also bands of Soldiers to attend his command, amongst which were 200, the choice Knights of France, all which in a very pompous traine followed him, (with Philip's directions, and also supply of great sommes of money) into Poitou to reduce those partes to his Allegiance, which was no hard matter to effect; the greater part of Commanders there (being fore-wrought) expecting nothing more, and the better part suspecting nothing lesse, then these perfidious assailes.

(17) Queene Eleanor Regent of those provinces, attended with a very slender guard, yet strong inough for daies of quiet, (which both her Age did now desire, and her Homage done to Philip, and Philip's faire shewes to her did promise) having no speedier notice of those incursions, then the unpleasing effects thereof, (for on Arthur's good success, as K. Philip proclaimed him Lord of those Dominions) be tooke her selfe into Malbrace, one of the most re-nable townes in Poitou, sending to King John, (whose forces were then in Normandy and Mayne, repressing or preventing Philip's attempts) for pre-furtaids. Which yet could not so speedily come, but Arthur (who knew that upon failure of such a prize as Eleanor, hee might draw her sonne to any conditions) had prevented them, besieged her, and possessed himselfe of her to wive, though not of her person, as some by mis-understanding have mis-related. For the retiring into the Castle, made it good against her Grandchild's incessant batterrie: about which, whiles he, with his continuall supplies of Poitwine and Ambuscades, was industrially besieged, King John's Army neere at hand (for his expedition both by day and night to his mothers recue, is recorded as a mirabile) brought the newes of their owne approach; which caused the great Army of the Leagers so indolent before to im-peach others, so lesse sollicitous now to defend themselves. Both Armies martially ranged, & Arthur's Battalions not only undauntedly, but also very pompously coming on to the shocke, the fight proved most fierce and terrible, each side refusing, by reason of both the Competitors preference in the field, that the End and vphot of all their designs, depended on that dayes successe: which in the end by the fortunate prowess of King John and his English, fell diallaurle on Arthur, his French, and other Assitants, who after a great slaughter made amongst them, turning their backs to him, from whom they had before turned their Faits, tooke their flight towards the Towne, to shelter their lives within those walles, which so late the Seat of their triumphs, became now the cage of their captivation, and the Tumbler of all Arthur's ambitious hopes, though himselfe so vnhappy as to survive them: for together with the tumultuary flyers, the victorious King & his Armie entered, renewed a most bloody fight, repulsed the Towne, freed his mother, enthralled his Enemies, and recovered all the provinces which had revolted.

(18) This victory was so glorious to King John, and so dreadful to his Enemies, (for King Philip too chiefe confederates, Arthur and Hugh Brant, Raymond, Father to Guido the husband of Constance, all the Peeres of Poitou and Anjou, about 200. French Knights and others of command, besides the vulgar multitudes were taken prisoners) that both then King Philip, though very hote in the siege of Argos in Normandy, presently cooled and confounded with newes thereof, brake vpp his footmarches siege, and returned home, and since, the French fawning fauourites, and King John's maligners have sought to exasuate the matter, assering against all truth of record, that it was exploited before the French were come to Arthur's aide, and when all his Souldiers were both unarmed and overpowered. But, as others highly extolling King John's valour herein, interpret those fore-doomes of Merlin to have bene ment of him, that hee should be crowned with the head of a Lion, should cut out the tongues of Babel, and lay iron chains on the backs of roring Beasts; and indeed hee chained them hand and foot, and so vanquished the way in Cart, a kind of riding till then vnusall with them, so King John himselfe, duely acknowledging the greatness of Gods goodness therein, sent his Letters to all his Barons wheresoever (thereby to encourage the loiall, and hold in awe the tumultuous) inciting them to render all praise unto God for so admirable a worke, and to gratias assest: and loone after hee dispersed his nobilit Captives into sundrie Castles in Normandy and England; Arthur's sister Eleanor, called the Damoyselle of Britaine, being committed to Bristol Castle, where hee long lived with a very honourable usage. And though the kings displeasure was justly incensed against her brother Arthur, for so frequent wauering in his faith, yet meaning to trie all means of winning him who had thus lost himselfe, hee sent for him (being then at Falaise in the custody of a Hubert L. Chamberlain) and entreated him very gently, promising him all honourable respects, if (as yet) he would refuse to forsake the French King's army, and frame both his mind for hearty love, and his Actions for peaceable observance towards him, his owne and Legall Lord. Which exceeding clemency, the ill-advised young Gentleman (for what wildomere it is to these pride where we need mercy, and to gie threats beyond possibility of performance) required only with arrogant and disdainfull language, furiously rebroiding the king with violent and fraudulent detention of the English Crowne, which menacingly he there required of him, and all other King Richards Countreys, as his lawfull inheritance.

his arrival, (which was at Portsmouth on Saint Nicholas day in December) when by laying to the charge of his Barons and Barons, that in his warres they suffered him to be destitute of requisite aid, and had left him in the middle of his enemies, by which their defeats, he was thus defeated of his Castles and Countries; thereupon, by a suite of Hubert Lord Archbishoppe, and Lord Fitz-Peter Chief Justiciar (who knew there were no forged callations) he put them and other delinquents to their Fines, (for his Warres made him desire their money more than their lives) wherein these two great Counsellors were overseers for the record, the one for the Clergy, the other for the Laity) of both whom they received no lesse summes of carter, then of Come. The like repining among the people, (who judge of the goodness of a King only by sparing their purses) enlured on the grant of a large Subsidie (two Marks and halfe of every Knights Fee) in a Parliament presently after held at Oxford, where the King & Peeres convening about redresse of those remedies mischiefes, the issue (as is termed) was, that Ambassadors should be addressed into France, two Prelates, Canterbury and Norwich, with two Earles, Marshal and Leicester, to treat from the Body of the Kingdome, touching those Prouinces, which being incorporated with Englands Souverainety, could not without apparent iniustice, be abstracted from a Nations common interest, vpon coloured pretences against any particular Philip, having vpon King Iohns departure thence used his whole Forces and wittes, to weary, or to winne diuers other Cities & Forts which had till then stood faithfull (for which purpose he also employed sundry instruments, themselves first corrupted, that they might corrupt others to defection, with great rewards and greater promises.) hee meant now to re-commence Questions of Right, having already neere decided that point by the point of his sword: yet because hee was to deale with a mighty Nation, hee would not abruptly refuse to capitulate, and yet againe by propoall of conditions exceeding either Reason or Possibility, hee damned vp all passages to peaceable agreement: his demands were to haue either Arthur, whom hee knew to be dead, redelivered into his hands alive, or else, his Sister Eleanor in marriage with all those Countries in that Continent: but those Statesmen easily perceived that Philips heart aimed farther then his tongue, and that with Eleanor hee hoped to purchase a higher dowry, euen the English Diadem, whose claim guided down from her brother to her: which pretence was the secret ground of his Oath, that hee would neuer linne to pursue that quarrell, till hee had deputed King Iohn of his Kingdome.

(26) This Ambassage was not onely thus issuelesse, but produced also effects tending to further irritation: for this formeth to be the time when Philip sent a brauing Champion, to insulte by Defie before the States here in England, what his Maister had done in France against their King in open warre, and though it was not deemed expedient to leopards Title of such weight on the Armes and Fortune of one man, yet it was resolved the Challenger should not passe vnanswered, whereto none was held fitter then Iohn Carey Earle of Essex, (for rebellion and denying his homage to the King, condemned to perpetual imprisonment in the Towre,) a man of Giantlike limme and strength, and of some dispositions not despicable, if they had not beene furnished with a too carelesse rudenesse: which appeared not onely in his wild speeches, touching the Kings misusage of his Nephew Arthur (which some by error alledge as cause of this indurant durance,) but euen now, when the king demanding him, whether hee would combat in his quarrell? Na, (quoth hee) not in thy quarrell, nor for thy sake, but for the Kingdomes right: I will fight to the death. Against which day, whilst hee repaired with large diet his impaired limmes and sinewes, the Frenchman hearing of his excessive feeding, and strength answerable thereto, rather fearing hee had beene some Monster of Nature, rather then a man, hee secretly insinuated away into Spaine alarmed to lew his lace in France againe: Carey finding the King gracious, was heretofore released, and is said (if this bee not to digresse) to haue crossed the seas for Ireland fifteen times, and euenmore beaten backe to the shore: acknowledged himselfe herein fully punished of God, neuer againe to see his owne feet, for displacing God out of his, when hee commended the Church of Brendan in Dean consecrated to the blessed Trinitie, into an Abbey of Monks, to the honour & name of Saint Patrick, whose Image was erected in a stately seat, wherein before the Trinitie was deposed, which was thence reelected into a priuie Chappell. The Irish relate, that the two Kinges being afterwarde together (belike when they made the next turre in France) King Philip hearing Carey to be in the English Campe, intrusted to see some experience of his so much feared and reported strength: where a Helmet of excellent proofe full faced with Mayle, being set vpon a great wooden blocke, the Earle lifting his trusty Skene, first loosing round about him with a dreadful aspect, defied so deepe quite through the steely resistance, into the knotty wood, that none there could draw it out but himselfe, who did it with ease, and being asked by the Kings, why hee frowned so irefully before the stroke, hee told them, that hee then intended it hee had failed of his blow, so haue killed them all, both Kings and others the lookers on.

(27) But what Philip could not in England by one Champion, he accomplished in Normandy by many; where hauing a mighty power attending him frō City to City, yet hee thought faire wordes would bee for himselfe both cheaper and safer, and with the Frenchmen more forcible then force it selfe; especially, where such troupees of armed Orators were at hand, and where golden preparations had made way with the chieft. Philip tolde them, their late Lord had quite forsaken them, that therefore himselfe, as their supreme Liege came to prouide that his owne Countries might bee indemnified, desiring, them loosely to admit and embrace him as their Lord, sith now they had no other to protect them from feare; but menacing withall, that if they forced him to violence, they should die no other death then hanging, or to be head aliue with which fawnings and tears, though many well munished places were fished off without any resistance, those Captaines violating their oath to carry fauour with the French; yet soon, the place euen honoured for fidelity to the English Crowne (and therefore worthily selected by King Richard to be the Shrine of his Leuaine Heart,) was better fortified both in affection and munition, then to wane vpon parties. Which neglect incensed Philip to turne his Oratory into Battery, (in being the chiefest City, and therefore of greatest consequence for confirming his victories,) which hee continued in a most fierce & horrid manner of siege, the space of two monethes, but finding it to be with small advantage, hee fell againe to golden Eloquence, attracting some in speciall with present pay, and all in general with promises of future insuing all their wanted Leues, and liberties without impairment of any other commodities whatsoever: aduiling them not to reject those preferred conditions, which ere long they would gladly get, when they should not be granted. The Knights, seeing their dangers, feeling their wants, fearing their ruines, yet desired respect till King Iohn might know their State: who finding himselfe at home as ill bestedde as theirs abroad, his Barons refusing to follow the warre, returned them answer, hee could not presently releue them. Whereupon the Great men who could sway the multitude with cheaper reasons, then Philips open hand had swayd with them, per-

Kings assent, and leave to elect, and therefore to prevent both his * interposing and displicature, till it the same night they caused their Elect to enter caution by oath, never to carry himself as Archbishop, nor to make it knowne to any man living, till he had further speciall warrant from them, upon paine of the success: it might find at Rome, whether forthwith they sent him for his dispatch.

(11) Reginald taking Flammaris in his way, was both to prudent, and impudent, (the vertues of their most choise man) that he could never conceale the purpose of his iourney, and boast of his dignity from any mans Eyes, nor from their Eyes the Conuenuall letters ratifying the same. Whereof when the Couent had notice, vehemently increased against him who had thus divulged their secret, and pro-vidently calling how to evade the Kings offence, out of hand they depetised certaine of their Crowe, to craue both pardon of their fault, and licence for choise of some worthier Primate. There was then in high grace and implorment about the King, Iohn Bishoppe of Norwich, a man of great wisdom, learning, and integrity, (qualiegruely belittling that high place) whom the King much desired to advance, commending him, as one * most deare unto him, and of his secrettest Council (of which, some say, hee was President) most beloued for the Commu-wealth, for Honesty, and them * which message from the King faithfully deliuered, * all of them glad thus to redeme the favour, which they had hazarded, with * voluntarie consent elected him; and sending for him from Turkey where hee was in the Kings affaires) the King himselfe graced his entrance into Canterbury with his presence in great pompe; and the next day, the King with a multitude of People assembling in the Metropolitane Church, the Prior did there publish his Election solemnely, and in due forme performed; where the Monkes carrying him with Tedern to the high Altar, did forthwith enshrine him in the Chaire of his Promotee; The King then in presence of them all, giving him full possession of his Temporalties. This louing correspondence betwixt the King and his Clergy, gave great hope of more happie fortunes henceforward vnto them both; but the Infernal Author of debate, and his chief Agent, tooke a hint hereby to intrude a Tyranny both vpon Clergy, King and all.

(12) Lorde thought false Regner what was doing at Canterbury, whiles hee was trotting to Rome; whither when hee came, and shewed his letters of Ratification to his Holinesse and his Cardinals, * hee requested this short answer, that it was a business which asked mature deliberation and better informations; the Pope soon finding, that the Sub-prior was too slight an instrument for him to worke with, and for King Iohn to be wrought with, and therefore be thought him of some fitter hammer for so hard an Anvill.
But sundry Boppes were in the way, which wily and by degrees were to be remooued. The first was (which Reginald in likelihood had imparted to hasten his owne dispatch) that the Bishopps of the Province claimed a joint interest with the Monkes, in choise of their Primate: a point which could no way suite with the Popes aduantage, because Bishopps were generally much obliged to their Sovereignes, and so likely still to Elect a Royalist, whereas Cloystermen, professing ignorance of worldly affaires, and obedience to one Superior, might more easily be swayed to bend as the Pope would bow them, in preferring his creatures. Which was the Motiue (we may suppose) of the Popes * letters, soone after sent to the Suffragane Bishopps, exhorting them by * sacred example, and precept of filiall obedience, to desist from voting like vndisaffected smoothes, their Mother Church with such vniuall clamours. The Bishopps notwithstanding, who knew themselves in sacred writ to be styled Fathers, would not thus acknowledge the Monkes for their Mothers, till Amos shew to his light Regens added the weight of his Epistles, and by his power swept both that and other rubs out of his intended way. For the King keeping his Christmas at Oxford, (attended as it seemeth by his Bishopps) meaning not to pretermitt any faire means to worke the Popes inclination towards the new Elect, he sent for * twelve of the Monkes, whom with some other of his owne Clerks (which carried his letters to the Pope) he put in traile for transacting this business at Rome, allotting them very beautifulle expenses out of his Exchequer for their whole iourney. They to leauie with the King (who knew well the traines of Rome, and the ouer-reaching fellicies of Innocentius,) a pledge of their duty, and assurance of his hopes, * entered with him * a conuention by oath, that no man, nor meanes should remooue them from him, whom the King & themselves had already appointed. The Bishopps sent * the same time their Procurators also, to plead their right of Co-election; so as, foure obstacles stood at once in the Popes way, (the two desires of the Monkes, and the two claims of the King and Procurators, hee for his Royal assent, they for their owne consent, in the choise) which all must be done and voided before the Pope can haue his full forth.

But because these will aske long time for contrai-ning, (which mooued his Holinesse to adourne the hearme to the very * end of the year) we will see the while how the King and State of England is im-ployed.

(13) The dorte, which deceased Habert did put vpon K. Iohn and his late designe, gave both K. Philip aduantage, to take surer footing in his new possessions, and King Iohn greater stomack and edge to recover his old. The last task (almost) of the one, and bold of the other, was Chelton a place of great strength, but in nothing more, then in the euer-cruitly valour of her Captain, Peter Lasz, who (if some mistake him not in freed of Habert de Borgo) being redeemed from the French, resolved here to gine Philip another taste of his prowess, and King Iohn of his fidelitie; had not others faithlesse feare defeated his braue resolution. For the besieged having * no rest night or day, from a long and incessant batterie, their Commanders inuincible con-fiancy against yielding, which enheartned the better sort, dismayed the baser, as more prizing their ease, then their faith or fame; some of which by night slipping ouer the walles, so instructed the enemy of all secret aduantages to possesse the towne, that by a sodaine assault, both it and Lasz (more worth then it,) was againe surprized. Here seemed to haue bene the Garland of Philip conquest; had not newes heere thither brought vnto him of some new risings in Brittaine, where Guise, the husband of Cambrantia, Arthurs Mother, (inseparable belike of the false-grounded wronges offered to King Iohn, vnder pretence of Arthur.) * returned gladly both into Amiens and a strong league with the English; and with him also Samary Mallon, and Almeric Lafeguan, * two Peeres of heretike valour and great command, whom King Iohn had his * prisoners, had made by prudent and loose vltage his truely friends.
The French King fuming to see his vnwill intrusions thus preiudiced, (especially by Arthurs owne father in law) was halting from Chelton into Brittaine, to worke reuenge on them, whose exemplar equilibre should haue bene his mirror of amendments Englands King on the other side, was no lesse heartened with this new conspuration, vnto once again a puissant Army, which he * landed at Rochel, being the only noted place, which in all these tumults and mutabilities of Fortunes, kept her selfe entire from enurance either of enemy, or of disloyall thought.

great portion of that Country, till coming to *Maunt-potest¹ impregnable, and now the Ende now of his most potent enemies, and all their flames of Chivalry, hee gave a terrible assault thereto for 15. dayes together, where at last his English valour was so adventurous in scaling the walles, and both giving and taking blows unprofitable, that in those few dayes hee entered Conquerour into that very place, which Charles the great could not get with his seven years siege. The multitude of Nobles therein taken was so great, that hee sent into England a bedroll of their names, for a memoriall of so great a victory. Which auspicious beginnings hee seconded with no lesse expedition, providence, and prowess, in the siege of Amersfort, where on his first approach, hee gaue present iustro to his maine Army, suddenly to environ the whole City, & by assault to keepe entrance at the walles on every side, while himselfe and his selected band, with fire and Engines would assaile the Gates, where with great celerity, and no lesse hazard then hardiely, breaking through, he became Lord of his owne. But whatsoeuer were the Citizens demerits, pious it was, that their offences, and the Conquerours wrath, lay so heavy on thole ittelly walled, as to throw them flate to the ground, which haily doome, (it being the cradle of his birth and City of his chiefe delight,) hee so hally (and very deely too) repented, when with excessive expenies hee encircled it againe with a beaustie farre beyond the former. These farre successes, humbling all the Countrey before him, cleared his passage into Peris, whether King Philip was now concurring all his power to oppose himselfe against the violence of this Torrent: which now more easily hee might stoppe, hauing in his way by laying secret ambuscades, laid hands upon Duke Guido, Savoy, and Amurice, King Johns principall hopes, as they were busily advancing his present affaires: by which surprize, though the English forces musing their Princemals aids, were greatly impaired, yet their great hearts were not much amited, as the Frenchmen found, when both the Armies nere approaching over night, the next morning alacrily they addressed to the fight, and with great furie on each side expected the Signall. Notwithstanding the day likely to prove dreadfull with expence of blood, yet earnest interceeding of forraigne Prelates and religious persons, who undertooke equally to compose all things, both Kinges condescended to a two yeeres Truce, King John chiefly out of affection to his Captive friends, whose liberty was formeist in the conditions.

(11) Having thus seduced those Countreies in farre better termes then last hee found them, hee embarked for England, where hee laid not aside a carefull (though difficultfull) providence, for still bettering those his successes: for which ends, whilst from his Subjects both Lay and Clergy hee gathered money, the Strawes of warre hee lost their affections, the seeds of Peace whereof Geoffrey Archbishoppe of Turke (his Natural and vancarell brother) was a principal incense, who solemnly cursing all the Kinges receivers within his Prouince, fled secretly out of the land. Which periclit, a hater enemy of K. John, yet bitterly teaching, the English Bishops were faine from that distastfull offence towards their Sovereigne, which the French Bishops performed to theirs, at whose command they maintained Souldiers in his warres against King John, acknowledging they were so bound to doe, as often as the King pursued the warres in person, though now altho they did it, where hee was not in person. And indeed how hollow-hearted to the State thole money-marmarers were, their owne friend hebetatech, shewing, how with curses they wished, and prayed to God, that these exactions might neuer have any good success, though they knew it was purposefull for preterring a maine part of the Kingdome. A disloyalty the more vnprofitable by the King, knowing that but a very little before the Popes Legate, Jo. Florentinus, nick-named Florentinus, for bearing a way so much money, had gathered of the Clergy a huge masse of money which hee clost hee conveyed to Rome. Yet all these domesticke grudges abated not the Kings due care, nor yet his good hopes, which were soon after much augmented by the encouragements of Other Imperial presence, who in person arriving here in England, to profit for his owne and his vncles warres, was with great voyes met by the King, and conducted through London by night, where all the City was strewn in her glory, & all the streets adorned with richly beangry, beangry all along with the lustre of pendant Crowns, and burning Lampes: who after some dayes of royall entertainements, hence departed not vnfurnished with helpes to defray his warres.

(12) Whiles King John is thus busied about his open hostilities, Pope Innocentius is plotting his secret Stratagemes against him at Rome: where, like unto that other old Roman, who, being chosen Emper touching some march-lands betwix two neighbour Nations, vnpartiall to either, adjudged it from them both to the Roman State: so hee now, being Arbitrator betwix the King, Bishops, & Abbes, concerning their choice, hee means to defeat them all, and adjudge the right of disposing thereof to his Romish see. Therefore at the fore-limited day of hearing, his first care was, that the Bishops shoulde for ever should be sealed up, (notwithstanding their allegations of Law, Reason, Decree, and Practice,) fro intermeddling in choice of their own Primate. Will you heare the maine reason? because himselfe, and some other would haue it so. Which definition sentence being read to the Prelates into England, it was thought a point of prudence alse, to prepare the King and write him plain before hand, to entertaine that which was to follow: which must be done by amiable lines, and gestures, whereas he knew the King was much delighted. His Present being a gold Ring, with foure precious stones, an Emerald, Sapphire, Ruby, & Topase, hee so vainly & childishly (though ignorance enlile it eloquent) cele breath in his Epistle, for their number, forme, and colour, that no man will question whether it were dictated with an Apostolicall Spirit. The Rings Romish must remember the King of Eternity, the Round as number of Confessy and of the foure Cardinal vertues, Justice, Fortitude, Prudence, Temperance; the Golds price, of Wisdom; the Emerald greenesse, of Faith; the Sapphire brightnesse, of Hop; the Rubies readinesse, of Charity; the Topases clearenesse, of operative Sanctitie &c. Which, though toys, were yet accepted as pledges of love for a while, till at last, the King finding by the sequels, they were but baits to beguile him, esteemed the Popes Gold as asie, his travels as a lewd frander, and his love as well returned baite. For shortly after came to his notice, the most indignouse intine, which the Pope meant to obtrude upon him and his Kingdome, bawing not onely bawed both Reynard and Gray out of their holdes, but also imposed upon him, for the chiefe place and managing of his State, one whom hee reputed a chiefe and dangerous Enemy to himselfe and it: which thus was seitch about.

them, who must be there presently chosen for their Primate, Stephen de Langton, a Cardinal, English by birth, ¹ French by education and affection, one of so transcendent power in the Roman Court, that the Pope was thought not for love, but for envy, (as being himself eclipsed by his nearness) to have wished his service in Rome remoter dignity. But the Monks ill at ease with what was done already, and very tremulous to ensue matter of new intrications, all agreed again all further courses, that ² no Canonical Election could be there made, they having consent neither of King nor Council, at which word the Pope snapping them up, had them know, that ³ he had there plenitude of power over the Church of Canterbury; and besides, that no consent of Princes ought to be expected in Election celebrated where the Pope was: hee therefore charged them under paine of his high curse, (a terrible bug-bear in those daies) there presently to choose him for their Primate, whom himself thought good to nominate unto them. Thus trembling under the cracke of his Thunderbolt, they all ⁴ excepting one Halan de Bransfield (whose constancy shall perpetuate his memory, Idol not for feare but for him, though very cunningly, and with murmurs: whole ⁵ Consecration followed by the Popes owne bandes at Yorkshire, and his earnest recommendation by the Popes ⁶ flattering letters, to the Kings favourable acceptance. And this was the valedictory beginning of those new miseries which brought the King to his ending, and his Kingdom to un-reportable calamities, all which, little did his Holiness or his Charitable reckoning of so his desperate Poles might take effect. Yet not vnderly fell those judgements on many Princes of those times, who neglecting the domesticke execution of Supreme justice, suffered their Subjects, at so high a rate both of expence and travel, to buy such arbitrary and dangerous formes of a foraine, and fallily-named Justice.

(33) Two very presumptuous Lanes hath one observed to have bene first hatched by this lawlesse Pope, the one occasioned by King John and Philip for met first, that Princes delinquent must be liable to correction from the Pope; the other, upon the choice of the Emperor, that where in elections votes are equal, or concur wanting, the Pope may gratify whom hee please: unto which we now may add a third no less dangerous & insolent, that the Pope may strike up Elections, both where and of whom, and with, and without what ought himself. Which lewd obtrusion, that it gallicked the King to the quicke, wee need not marvaile, if wee balance in one scale, the Popes meere will and pleasure in the other, the dishonour to the King (thus to be tried out of that, which so vehemently, and with his owne presence hee took care to see effected) the preiudice to his Crowne, to be defeated of Sovereignty against the hazard to the State, to have his Empery (as Philippe, and French favourite) the classe man over his English-besides wrongs more particular; as both the disgrace to his best-servicing Crownsmen, the dishonour of the Monks, first, to choose without his licence, then to mocke him with a second choice, next, to beguile him with athe, after to trauaile upon his excessive charge, and lastly to doe, and vnder all, with their peruase. With all which so farre the Kings patience suffered, that hee beganne on them to dilige his wrath, who with him beganne their affronts in prohibiting first all those Monks as Traitors, and afterward writing ⁷ his letters to the Pope, with relation of those ⁸ great wrongs to himselfe, and exceptions to ⁹ Langton; vowing immutably to stand for his own ¹⁰ Election, and to die in defence of the Liberties of his ¹¹ Crowne; putting the Pope in mind, that Rome reaps more paine from England, then from all the Trans-Alpine Regions; threatening also, if he were now crossed in this, bee would stoppe all from crossing the Seas to Rome, nor would any longer emendate their foraine Justice, such ¹² his owne Kingdom, so abounded with Bishops and learned men of most accomplished perfection ¹³ in all professions.

(39) If, when this Kings Father vttered some such threats to Gracian the Popes vassall, hee then replied ¹⁴ See doe not threaten us, for wee feare no men, because wee are off a Court as off to be more impious our Emperor and Kings, (which is a remarkable Apologues, ¹⁵ Baronius lets forth in greater letters) ¹⁶ we may then gasse, how this great Lord of that Court did himselfe brooke such trait faluations. Nay the effects betwixt it: when in his sublimed ¹⁷ Reply, hee sets the King for comminatory ¹⁸ abrogating, and contumacious departer; and threatens him, that if he do not, by referring himselfe wholly to his good pleasure, to deserve his Grace, hee should plunge into those difficulties, ¹⁹ whence hee should hardly euer get forth; intimating, that himselfe (being conuictly viceroy) to ²⁰ him, unto whom euer kee in Heaven, Earth, & ²¹ Hell must bow; mult in the end hee haue the ²² upper hand; and that to resist him is to oppugne ²³ God himselfe and his Church, for which glorious ²⁴ Becket spilt his blood. These were indeed bloody words; to affright the King with expectation of more such blowes, and bloody stripes from Rome, as had lighted on his Father. And hee threatened no more then hee acted; for thereupon, hee sent his doubled Apollonical command, the one general to all the Prelates, for submitting and adhering resolutely to Langton, the other, to some particular Bishops, for ²⁵ consenting the King, and interdicting his whole Kingdom, if him they found still continuously rebeling. Neither was hee more insolent in the command, then they in the execution, whereby (on a day all suing to vestralize an Action) this flourishing Church (though the King had sworn their humblyment, and consolation if they did it) was deprived of the very face of Christianity for many ensuing yeeres; if, not Innocentius Christi Pater, but Isidore his professed Enemy, had mured up the doores of the Christians Temples for despite of their God.

(40) But this High-Priest had forgotten what another taught him, and ²⁶ hee himselfe sometimes thought, about interdicting France for their Kings offence; that better it was not should suffer then a whole Nation perish: whereas now for the Kings only crossing the Popes good pleasure, God is censured to loose a worshipping, and all the People to hazard their foules, ²⁷ having almost like Infidels, without Gods service and blessed Sacrament, yet and dying ²⁸ like dogs rumbled into euerie ditch. But what? did such wofull effects fall onely on the Layty? The Clergy bare their part too; whom the flames of the Kings iustly incensed wrath did soorch, that his Dominions were too hot for their abode: for their ²⁹ persons hee procribed and sent packing to the Pope, their reueneues, hee confiscated, their Bishops, Abbeys and Priories hee deputed to Laymen custody: their women (for such as had not wives, had Leimans) were dearly ransomed; and euer where they suffered wrongs without ordinary protection of Justice. Whereof, though our vulgar perfunctory Writers produce no other reason, but the only overflowing of the Kings gall, as if first stirred by some few delinquent Bishops, through furious reuenge is oot-welcomed the whole Clergy; yet indeed these were but the due chastisements of their generally disloyall hearts. As (to instance) when the King sent his mandate to S. Albans, that not regarding the Popes command in the Interdict, they should continue the celebration of Gods service; the Abbot calling his Monks into the Chapter-house, persuaded them to obey God rather then Man (meaning the Pope rather then the King, and to bare rebellion to the Kings anger, ³⁰ whom God in due time would bring to an end. What marvaile then, if the Clergy carried so generally with this flame of a foraine viceroy power, against Gods service, and their Sovereigns god-godly desire and due authority, were likewise generally inrolled in that reward of their fidelity. And yet, even in the Clergy, many of eminence detested their cruel and unreligious courses of the Pope; Philip the Bishop of Durham, and his Successor, with the Bishops of Norwich and Winchester, heartened the King to condemn the Papal curse; the *Christianity Abbot (neglecting the Interdict) continued their divine celebrations, till the Pope suspended them for their contempt; Alexander an Abbot of the Benedictines, a Duke of *exquisite learning published in his Sermons, that their profane calamities were no reproach to their Sovereigns proceeding, but due rewards of the Subjects' heinous trespasses, because kings ought to govern, and strongly rebuke all disobedient Subjects in themselves; but as for Popes they ought not to intermeddle in the civil affairs, and reprimand any Princes over their faults, seeing Peter himself received no power, but only in matters appertaining to the Church. And though the *Pope were revenged on him for his plain truth, and some Monkish humors have aspersed other such men with bitter reproaches, yet what may be thought both of these the Popes courtesies, & of such his opposers, a late Jesuite (no partial man to Princes) likewise saying, that many, and godly wise men at that time wrote, that Pope Innocentius had not stood so hard with King John in such a point as this was, for contending him with a person grateful unto him in that See. And no marvel they so wished, seeing that was the ground cause of such infinite confusions, factions, and wrongs, hurrying so indignely the Prince, Peeres, Clergy & Commons; the very contemplation whereof to all godly wise men must needs be galling and full: yet wellware those Anachemizing Bishops, the Instruments of all these evils, who patiently endured under the name of Exile, to live the while abroad in all varieties of delights.

(41) Such perplexities in the People could not but breed as great hatred and hazards to the King; who therefore to prevent the issue of such discontentments, (which though causeless, yet kindling in the multitude prove often unpardonable) hee required of his Nobles new Oaths of allegiance, pledges of such as hee most suspected, and homage of all Freeholders, even of twelve years old, whom he dismissed with a kiss of peace. Not doubting also the Popes further intent to abuse his Subjects from their due allegiance, hee gathered about him (by *example of his Father Henry on the like ground) a mighty Armie for all occasions. The terror whereof hee first displayed in the North, offended (saith one) with *William King of Scotland, for marrying his daughter to the Earle of Balliol; for receiving (saith another) Fugitives and enemies of his State; for throwing down (saith a third) a Castle built by King John against *Barwick: but whatsoever were the breach, the cloze was amiable, each accompanying other to York, where King William's two daughters were promised to King John two sonnes, and delivered as pledges of vnited love, with a gift of nine thousand marks. The dread of this his power so glyded out of the North into the West, that vpon his returne, the Princes of Wales, and others rich & poor came to him at Winchester (the like thing neuer heard of before) to doe him homage. But all these lunkes of allegiance were soone crackt by another thunder-clap (from Rome) of Anathemas on the King by Name, with strict injunction for all men to abandon his presence; which sentence being sent to bee divulged by the Bishops and Prelates in England, all of them for feare or favour of the King, were content to neglect the Popes command, and let the Apostolike practise escape without execution. The same yet thereof was in all mens mouths, but came forth (as seemeth) to the Kings Eares, by a friend of his owne Exchequer. Geoffrey Arch-Deacon of Norwich, who secretly perswading his fellow-officers, that they were bound in conscience to relieving the Kings ser-vise, gave them example himselfe by leasuing his duty and charge; for which hore-braine trickes, hee was put in a Ciole of lead, the weight whereof (as a punishment of his leuitie) soone halloed his end in prison: but the greater and wiser sort, both of Nobles and others, continued their due attendance on their Sovereigns Courts and person, without regard of the censure.

(42) Those Romish furies thus infesting all at home, gave also courage & opportunity to ill-affected others further offense, of which in Ireland hauing furnished long of the Kings indulgence or absence, he beganne now to play the Kings himselfe. The whole spirit of this Prince in his tender yeeres made choice (on bonded knes to his Father, in presence of Heraclius Patriarche of Ierusalem) rather in devotion to conduct an Army against the Turks, then in ambition to take possession of that goodly Kingdome. But being now possided thereof, and intending (by a kind of compensation for his losses in France) to annex and assure that Kingdome to the English Crowne, hee resolves with a powerfull Army to quell the distublers, and reforme the disorders, of his fitt and long vnusued charge. Whole approach lacke fame and dread did forecurre, that more then twenty Fety Kings of that nation hastened to Dublin, there to honour his *arrivall with their submissive attendance, homage and oath of allegiance; others, eyther vpon confidence of their good holds, or diffidence for their ill desertes, flying his presence, and some of them, the Countrey. The two Lanes (whose only praye was, that they were the sonnes of a nobly-deserving Father) hauing bene through ambition of Sovereignty, the fountain of dangerous garboyles, (as tyrannizing over the Commons, and making away such of the Nobles, as stood eyther in their light, or in the Kings fauour) fled into France, where they liued in *an Abbey as poore Gardiners, vntill the Abbot desiring by their deportment some state above their habite, vpon promise of humility reconciled them to the King. The Lord William de Breuse, (a Baron lately of great command and wealth in the Marches of Wales) shewed not the like penitence, nor found the like grace, who, vpon a refusal to deliver his sonne as a pledge of his fidelity, spedde into Ireland to flie the Kings wrath, and now, to avoid his pursuit, fledde also into France, then the common Scauerie of all trayterous fugitives; but *sharp reuenge ouertook both his sonne and his Lady (taken in a strong Castle of Wales) whose virulent and rayling tongue had more exasperated the fury of the King (whom there immediately reuiled as a Tyrant and Murderrer) then could be pacified by her strange present: (four hundred Kine, and one Bull, all milke-white, except onlie the eares, which were redde,) sent vnto the Queene.

(43) But *Catalus, the vnquiet King of Connaught, trusting to his owne Forces, King John captured by strong pursuit: *and after all carried him captiue in triumph, impsoned the English Fugitives, took pledges both of English and Irish Inhabitants, punished by death malefactors, turbulent persons by ranimes, established all their Lawes, Canons, and Officers to the English forme, and departed (which was worth all) a wife, stout and vpright *Gouernour ouer them, the Bishoppe of Norwich, Langston competitor: thus seding on that barbarous land so noble and ordered a face of gouernement, as was the stay thereof in those tumultuous times, and a patterne euen to more peacefull ages to imitate. By which both glorious and *speedy conquest and reformation, hee better merited that Style of Ireland Lord, then when it was confirmed to him by a Crowne of Peacocks feathers from the Pope, at what time (long before) hee inioyned it by his Fathers gift, as his Brad-Scale (here not vnfitte to bee annexed) will them.

(44) The Ranckes of King Iohns estate, were not unlike to those in Gravel ill-neighbourd with an encroaching Sea, where before one breach is well made vp, another no lesse dangerous is laid open; which endles turmoils kept his body still in Action, his Minde in passions, and his Prowesse in vire. The vast expences of his Irish expedition were no sooner repayed; by a great tax charged on all the Commonall houses; but Leys Prince of North-Wales, with his great spoils on the English Marchers, made new matter of charge and exploit for the Kings *ha*ving, to prevent deuicence, caused his Wallaces to conuey all their cattell and better substance to the scarce-accessible refuges of Swynburne Hill. These difficulties much more whetted and excited the Kings resolution; neither had the vntual power of the Popes fulmination as yet so blasted his good fortunes, but that hence also hee *re*turned in great Triumph, as Conquerour of all Wales, where, with wonderful celerity and valour, hee subdued all their Princes and Chieffes, whom hee received upon Oath homage, and hostages, with an absolute grauant of all their inland unto the King for ever. Notwithstanding, perceiving that very many slipped away for dead (at least for colour) of the Popes curse, from those his martiall and other civil seruices; (though he not pishd by fine all such Resolutions) whereby his person could neuer bee free from danger, nor his State from trouble; hee resolued (seeing the Pope inflexible, & vnconuenient of so many Christians calamitie) at length to recusat from his vowed businesse against the Popes Elect, in hope so to settle his owne and his Subiects tranquillity, though with vnusufferable indignity to himselfe. In his *re*turne from Wales, two Nunnes from the Pope, *Ran*dyth a subdeacon, and Duranda a Knight Templar, mette him at Northampton; to make the attournment; *wh*ereto he was so propense, that hee accorded to assure vnder his Seale, that Archbishoppe Langton with the Bisshoppes, Monkes, and others, should be restored both to his honour, and to their possessions; that, holy Church should haue all the Franchises as in Edward the Confe'ssors time; that hee would never take any thing of holy Church against the owners will; but, because hee would not also make full satisfaction for all confiscations, and other emoluments receiued of the Clergie, (nay, hee could not haue expended all his treasure in his continuall warres,) the Clergie and their Factori (the Legates) more prizing their priuate gaine, then the weale publike of their Native Country, contemned the sweet proffer of peace, & exposed all to the bane of a reuengeful mentation. For hereupon they did not only denounce the curse upon the King by name (which the Prelates before durst not doe) and upon all other who conuersed with him; but, as if hee had most continuously condemned quietnesse, by their relations they incensed the Pope (too proude of himselfe to let forth his owne greatness) to put on him a faire more indignous wrong and contumely then Interdiction, by absolving all Kings and People, poore and rich, hauing dependance on him, from all Fealty and Subiection to him.

(45) This being the third steppe, whereby both the Pope ascended to the height of his flurped power, and mercilesse revenge, and the Subiects daylie descended from their loyal obsequence, made king Iohn more circumspect to strengthen himselfe, both with an Army no lesse faithfull then powerfull, & also with the loue of his Neighbour-Princes. King William of Scotland, at this time infested with a dangerous rebellion, (stirred vp within his Kingdom by one Guthred, laying elisme, vnder color of some antiquated title, to his Crown) bring himselfe infirme with age, lent his sonne Prince Alexander into England, to craue assistance of King Iohn, who (by his owne princely looe and readinesse, to demerite theirs) resoluing with his Army in person to challenge the disturbers of his trusty Confederate, before his setting forth, did on the Table in a solemn feast, (which hee kept in the Hospital of Clerkenwell: adorned Prince Alexander with the belt & Order of Knight-hood; and afterward with his host vanquishing the Rebels, aduanced their Chiefe-leader farre higher then his owne Ambition expected, and left that Kingdome in a letted peace. But whiles hee thus kindly careful in suppression of anothers Rebells, his owne at home are as vnkindly vigilant to vndermine his State; the Popes Absolution, like magick spells, hauing let loose many insinuating Spirits, which will not easily be laid again. For the Chiefe among the Wallaces, whom neither breach of their Oathes, nor losse of their noble hostages, (which loone after perished for their parents finnes) could deterre, suddenly fell off from the King, and fell on his Subiects with much slaughter of men, burning of Townes, and surprisall of Castles: whereof, whiles the King meaning to take sharpe reuenge, was on his way at Nottingham with an vnresistible Armie, letters of great speed and secrecie were deliuered to him; as hee late at meat; from his faithfull and gratefull friend the Scottish King, & instantlly others from his daughter Iuan, Princess *Leys*bur, Lady, both giuing him intelligence of imminent Treasons plotted by sundry of his Peeres, who meant either to murder him, or betray him to the barberie of his foes. Which dreadfull notices from so true-harted Informers, could not yet affright his manlie heart, till comming to Chesler, hee there vnderstood by sundry other Intelligencers, that his Nobles held themselves quite discharged from his allegiance; and knowing that they wanting fidelity hee himself could not but want security, hee dismissed his host, took hostages of his Barons, pursued the detected Conspirators, and * the three principal of them flying the land, hee profecuted their persons, demolished their Castles, and confiscated their possessions. But many of as vile and virulent affections they left behind them, as that * traitorous A.D. of those Nobles hereafter, who sent to Philip of France their sealed Charter, promising to settle on his head the Crown of England, if hee would come to recover it. And that the minds of the vulgar should not be vnpossessed with like expectation of John va-crowning, the prophesies of * Heremias (a wise) (foretelling, that on the day of Asen King John should be no King) were huzzed into their eares. Whether by God inspiring, or the Dravellers, these were revealed, a some doe doubt; but hee that considers the quotidian impostures of these times, and the secret machinations of the Pope, the French King, and the English Barons, all for diuer ends, complotting against King John, will easily perceive both what vie there was of isboring such a Prophet, to deteare the popular mayne, from sticking to the King, and to beguile their credulity, as if the thing were to be done, by Gods fore-appointment, and ordinance, and also * that his punishment by death as a Traiterous Impostor, was no other then hee deserved.

(46) Neither is the Popes reuenge thus appeased, how higher greeces yet remaine, on which his Greatnesse, and greatness of his holy rage must display it selfe: the vnderprovs whereof (a thing almost incredible) were not onely Englishmen, but English Bishops also. For Stephen Langton with the B.B. of London and Ely (thirsting after reuenge though with the destruction of their Country, & blood-shed of innumerable their Compatriots) going to Rome with complaints on the King, * made humble supplications to the Lord Pope, that hee would condescend in a touch of pious compassion, to support the English Church, being at the point of ruine. At whole earnest supplication, the tender-hearted Pope (griuously lamenting the desolation of the Kingdom of England,) decreed by solemn sentence: That King John should be deposed from his Kingdom, and that the Pope should provide some other, who should be deemed worthy to succeed. To effectuate the former clause, Innocentius eagerly pursued the latter, sending speedy letters to (whom but King John most mortall enemy) Philip King of France, * requiring him to undertake the labour of the detroning King John, with no lesse reward then garden for all his fat, and enjoying of the English Crowne to him, and his heires for ever. A goodly large patent both for a spiritual and temporal Kingdom, which (more like Mars his Priest, then Christ Vazar) hee means to keele, with a deluge of Christians blood. For use thus yet faciated, hee transmits his Letters general: * To all Prelates, Souldiers, men of warre of all nations, to fight themselves with the Crosse, and to follow their Captaine Philip for the deiection of King John, assuring all that their assistance (whether in Person or Contribution) shall be no lesse meritorious, then if they visited our Saviours Sepulchre. That this Pope vnder colour of such Crusades, did formerly cloake his own Avarice, his * owne Monkes avarice; but here hee clothes themselves both his Pride, and a far more savage vice, the thirst, not of mens gold but of their blood. In which seruice with King Philip, hee vied the same English Prelates for his Negotiators, where before his Souldiers therewith, with whom also he sent his Factor Pandolph, * going him to private, secret instructions how to manage every particular of the whole designe, in the most beleeve of the holy See.

(47) The French King likewise receiving * from the Archbishoppe and his Alldomies (in a * council) the Apostolicke sentence, was very apprehensive of that employment, where to no more than the Papall command as his * owne ancient malignity, and the English Barons traitorous requests, had prepared him; both which hee was unwilling to make with the specious pretext of iustice and deuotion. Vnder which colours hee had * speedily marshalled an immense Army at Rouen, & drew a mighty Navy richly furnished to the mouth of Sygn, * altho Dukes, Earls, Barons, Knights, Countsaides being summoned, to the exploit vnder paues his Treason and desertion, who theretofore both in feare & hope of spoile came flocking without number.

(48) A preparation of so great importance, that all Christendom tooke notice of, could not long be hidden from King John; whole care, by reason of his now doubled opposition (forraign & domestick) could be no lesse for his owne and his Kingdoms safety, then was his Enuemies for unpunishing both. Wherefore his Summons being * sent to all his officers both for Sea and land, for speedy furnishing both of a Navy, & an Army, equall to encounter so powerful an Invasion, such a innumerable multitudes swarmed to Dover and other harbours for landing, that the Chiefe-leaders for want of provision, dismissing the rest, * encamped at Barham Downe, men with 60000. choice, valiant, and well appointed men, who, if they had carried all one mind, and true eye (from towards their King, and safeguard of their Country, there breathed not any Prince vnder heaven, whose assault England had not beene able to repell. And being no worke appointed for a Sea-fight, his intent was to grapple first with the French Fleet, * making no doubt of sinking them all: so fierce and confident was he in expectation of all invaders. In which braue address, whilst both shores of the Sea are thus belaid with both those Kings puissant Armies, the one waiting for the Enemy, the other for faire windes and more forces, behold Pandolph (the Popes Pragmaticke) having first desired leave conduct of King John, arrives at Dover, to put in execution those * secret instructions which his Lord (who made his advantage of the Fauour, as well as of the Lunar) * had expressly prohibited. He there vnfoldes to the King, the innumerable multitude both of King Philip Souldiers, and of his Souldiers Horse and Foote, all in readinesse to passe, and yet more expected to follow) to become him of his Kingdom by Apostolicke authority, and to enjoy it himselfe with his Heires for ever. That with him were also coming all the English Exiles, both Clergy and Lay, they, by his forces to repossesse their citates (maigne the king) and hee from them to receive allegiance, as from his sworn Subjects. That hee had the fealty of almost all the English Peeres obliged to him by their owne Charters; which made him distrustlesse of attayning easily his wished success: which calamities (the more valuerable, because imposed) by his insulting enemie, and his owne Subjects) he might yet evade and retaine his Crowne, which by Sentence hee had already lost, if presently hee would submit himselfe to the Churches judgement. Doubtlesse the frames whereinto the King saw himselfe planged, were very deuidious, so many deadly enemies abroad to assault him, so few trustie friends at home to guard him: which drove him into this sad cogitation * that those his perfidious Peeres would now with their followers abandon him in the field, or betray him over to the Sword of his Enuemies. Yet not vnlikely other motives also might forcibly perswade him to relent: the remembrance of the Emperour Orto whom this very Pope (not without foale blot of Isidore and Leury) had both eagerly advanced, and furiously disempyred; the boundlesse injuries of the Crusade promised against him, where with this Pope * vied to outflow, as with a mercuriall Ocean, all such Princes as withhood his will, which once broken in would euer end, but with the end and ruine of all. Thus thinking a better to yield to the time, with assurance both * of his Crowne, and of the Papal fauour, then desperacie to hazard Life, Crowne and all, to his immorall foes; hee redeemes his safety on such conditions, as Neither say and the Pope (both which have no law) listed to impose; and so presently swore to submit in all things to the judgement of the Church. By virtue of which false-breathing Oath, Pandulph afterwards exacteth his subscription to a Forme of Peace prescribed by the Pope, wherein King John, though with an unwilling eye, a bleeding heart, and weeping eyes, yet will he, will he, must acknowledge: that touching all things for which he was excommunicated, hee had absolutely sworn to stand to whatsoever the Pope should command. Secondly, that the Archbishops, Bishops and Monks, with all the rest of that sort, should (with satisfaction also for all damages) be restored both to their possessions and the Kings favour, so that they also would swear not to attempt any thing against the Kings Person and Crowne. Wherein we see that King John in swearing to obey the judgement of the Church, was concluded to have sworn performance of whatsoever the Pope commanded; and how great matters the Pope can command, King John, with much more bleeding and amending of spirit, shall quickly see and fee. For two dayes after (being the period of the Hermits prophetic) the King at the house of the Hermites Templarii Dames, by the Popes command in his preordination at Rome, taking off his Crowne from his head, surrendered it into the Popes hands by his Attorney Pandulphus (at whose feet hee also laid his Scepter, Robe, Sword and Ring, the Royall Ensignes;) subscribed also to another Charter, whereby hee resigned his Kingdomes to the Pope, professing hee did it neither for feare, nor force, but of his owne free will, and in the common Council of his Barons, as having no other way to make satisfaction to God and the Church for his offence, and that thenceforth hee would hold his Crowne as Feudary to the Pope, paying a pension annuall of 1000. Marks for both the Kingdoms of England & Ireland: whereupon doing homage and swearing fealty to the Pope, hee did withall deliver some money (as the earnest of his subscription) unto Pandulph, who throwing it to the ground, did thereupon trample with his feet, to manifest his Masters greatness. That these things were done in presence of some Peeres, who gave no consent thereto, appears by Henry Archbishop of Dublin (the very principall man in that Assembly) who bothwardly grieved thereof, and openly disclaimed and gainsayed it.

(49) The Pope formerly pretended he fought nothing more than Johns repentance, and he grieved at nothing so much as Englands defolation: but these his circumlocutions bewray he fought somewhat else, which bred both repentance and defolation to King John and his Successors long after. Which fact cannot be believly paralleled, then by another dolefull accident of the former year, * when a dreadfull fire in Southwark, consuming the Church & buildings neere London Bridge, suddenly (whiles numberles people flocke on the Bridge, either to bring succour or seeke safetie) the fire by a wind seized also on the higher end of the Bridge; wherewith multitudes thus encompassed on both sides, miserably perished; where at length some bringing their ladders to faine the rest, their crowde was so great, that the vessels sinking, more perished in the water, then by fire. King John, like those, was in the middle of two inevitable flames, on this side, his faithlesse Nobles, on that, his mercilesse foes; when the Pope thus proffering him S. Peters seat, for a safeguard fro both, drencht him into as great misery, certainly greater ignominy then both the other. Wherin yet the Pope doth not want his share and shame; amongst his owne favourites, some accusing that his prescribed Charter, was lamentable and detestable; some, denying it was of the Popes procuring, but that King John had long before made a vow of donation, that if God letted him in those Kingdomes he would dedicate them both, and make them tributary to the See Apostolicke. But some other (great pillars of the Papacy) stepping further, * aucto it to be utterly untrue, that King John did make his Realmes thus tributary to the Pope; or that ever such persons were paid to Rome; or * if hee so did, or any other English King should so do, such an Act to bee of no validity at all; or if it were of any force, it ought only to be on King John, who first offered, and not on any his Successors. Doubtles, if the Popes word had power to cut off King Johns regality for any offence, his Crowne was to have descended to the next Heire (whether Henry his sonne, or Eleanor Arthurs sister, then alive) who, as they were not guilty of the fault, so neither consenting to the reneigement. Some therefore have imagined, that * such Instruments might happily then be misused and abused, and yet not contrived, though the copies stand recorded; but whatsoever were then done, that the Pope himselfe (not onely those his friends) were thereof ashamed will hereafter appeare.

(50) Whiles Pandulph in this chaffering about the Crowne for his Master the Pope, Philip in fitting his head to wear it, and was now setting forth his Navy to winne it, for himselfe; which made the Legate (hausing after five dayes leyne) redoubled the Crowne, but * not yet released the Confuses, till conditions were performed) to haire into France, carrying with him eight thousand pound, as part of restitution to the exiled Bishops; where comming to King Philip, hee desired him to dismise his host, & enterprise against King John, as being now an absolved and reconciled Sinner to the Church. But Philip who was of the Popes mind, not caring for Johns repentance, but for his Kingdom, which now hee lost before hee had gotten it, * fretting exceedingly to see himselfe not onely set vp for a litle, and made to the world as object of feite, by the Sinneres gainefull collations, but also by the * Popes more intemperate plunging into ex-cercise a damage, (hausing yet, beside his great trouble in this preparation, 60000. Crowns, wherewith hee purchased nought but Jeffries released, and professed, that fitt the Pope himselfe, had so farre thrust him on, his Legates sue rescript (two nor his threats of excommunication) should not draw him backe from his intended course. In which resolution calling his Peeres and Nobles into a consultation at Saumur, all the rest approving the course, Ferdinand Earle of Flanders (part of whose Country Philip by force detained) told him tartly, that as the attempt was both vain, and impossible, so it was fier, every mans right should at home be restored, and justice embraced, before they attempted to teach duties of piety to others abroad. And, that hee ought rather to thinke of making restitution to King John of those transmarine Countries, which hee withheld unrightly, then of invading his Realm, where hee had no right at all. With which unexpected reclamation, the chiefe Peeres beganne to waver, & Philip enraged, bidding him defiance, forbade him his Court. The like rough vage (not a long before) hee found * Reginald the most valiant Earle of Balliol (though his daughter was married to Philip younger sonne,) whom the French King perceiving to with well to King John, * drove him unrightly out of his Earldome; but King John, receiving him with honourable compenlation of * sayre recompense in England, held both with him and Earle Ferdinand, a sure (though secret) confederacy: So that now Philip rage, and feare to hazard his owne Crowne, if seeking anothers, hee should leave so neere an Enemy at his backe, diuers the course of his Ambition into the streame of his Revenge, and resolving first to subdue the Earle, (after which success hee might more safely prepare into England, hee commands his mighty prepared Navy to set forth from the mouth of Some towards Flanders, where himselfe with his Forces (meaning to subdue the country in their way) would meet them by land. Whereof King John having speedy intelligence from the Earle (who knowing his meanes too slender to beare off the Kinges so long prepared power, desired his present aide) without delay dispatched his * Fleet, to pursue them who intended to pursue him, under the conduct of

De Jure.

A general rule is imposed on the three brave generals, his brother William Earle of Salisbury, William Duke of Holland, and Reginald Earle of Bologne; & who with happy gages surprizing the French Navy at the port of Damme, (whiles most of the French Sailors were on land, disposing the Earle's Countrymen on them all) three hundred of which shippers, laden with provision, Armes, and other costly traught (for whatsoever the King and he had not been held captive was there.) they sent for England (whether at first they were bound) and above one hundred other they burnt, or funke for France.

(11) This Naval victory produced effects in the two Kings so opposite as were their affections; the one, with ampleness of his irreparable loss and ignominy, hailing back into France, to prevent further danger; and the other (joyful of his own success and his confederates) diminishing his power, as figure of any French attempts in haste. Wherefore now, with full purpose to find him work at home, who so busily sought it abroad, he forthwith sent (with large rewards to his Flourisher Army) instructions also to the Earles, how to infest Philip on the side of France, whilst himself entering Padua, would the like on the contrary side, and Ordo the Emperor on a third part. A dangerous plot and league, if the issue had been answerable to the designs. For prosecution whereof, King John attending at Paris with a noble Army, in hope now that all true English, would gladly embrace so fair an opportunity, to reconquer their hereditary Provinces from the false French, his Barons ceasing themselves in procuring his vantage, and reflecting that his foray vexations being thus passed, he should want domestic help, Early oppose themselves both to his command and their Countries good, b denying him (which he were grieved of his excommunication) their attendance in so behouffull a service. Those men in the heat of his former troubles with the Pope, thinking such troubled waters most advantageous for their fishing, recommended their contention with the King for their long desired Liberties, wherein because they found him still as immovable, as themselves were moderate, it seemed, though the cloak of their now selfish were Religion, yet their spirit was Jealousy, basing withall an eye to the good of the King of France, whom so well they had before loved, as to wish him King of England. But King John, being no less careful to further the present general cause, than they their particular ends, delayed not their desires; and b depriving his Charters and safe-conducts to the Archbishop and his fellow-Exiles, he as speedily arrived: at which presence the earth is said to have trembled; but (doubtlesse) King John did, who hearing of his coming towards him, then at Winchester, went to meete him and those other Bishops, at whose sight he fell downe at their feet with floods of teares, intreating them to commiserate his, and his Kingdomes miseries. Upon which great humility in a King (moving themselves to bewee their eyes,) they lifted him from the ground, and leading him by each arme to the dore of the Cathedral Church (where, at the death of the 5. y^e old man, all his Nobles and others were for joy, safter in the Chapter-house they did absolve him;) but with such goddesall Appendices of Oathes imposed on him, that this absolution was not so much the Epilogue of his old, as the Prologue of his new Tragical vexations.

(2) For the Proletariat, whose best abettors the disloyal Barons had formerly been, meaning now to be like them, amongst other Orders then taken of the king (to defend holy Church & Churches; to make due restitution to the Clergy; to bear fealty to the See of Rome;) cannily also inferred this, & to establish the good Laws of his Predecessors & to abolish all bad, proceeding with all his Subjects according to the last judgements of his Courts: out of which generalities what good flatter the Proletariat &

Barons can pick, lequels will shew. Now all expectations seeming to be taken away, which might hinder the Kings deligne for France, hee once againe at a perishment haileth to imbarke his boate whereat the point of paffage new impediments are pretended, 1. that the people bring few their money with long attendance could not be fitted for the service except the King would doe it out of his Treasure; which moued the King in anger, with a small traine of his owne attendantes, to let forth to sea, and his Barons (Philipps true friends) to depart home, leaving the king to be at Grisey expectall their coming; the delict of their service. With these fo often treacherous delusions, what marvaile, or blame, if a King and in so important an Action, thus defeated, were enflamed to take due revenge? On which purpose the King thus enforced to returne, refusing to challice those rebellious Spirits (the canons therof) and to reclaime them to due obedience by force of Armes; the Arch-bishoppe (to resolve to be asough a Brillie to the king) power as ever Habert his predecessor was,) came vnto him, to duert him with Argument, that it was a breach of his Oath, for him to take Armes against any man whosoever, without the iudgement of his Court. But the next day, seeing he could not thus preuaile with reasons (the King forbidding him to intermeddle in matters of lay-iudgements) and fearing that hee would not forbear for one Clertes pleasurie, came by some ouffalls hee followed the King (who was on his way earnestly following his intendment) determing him with threats, and vowing, 1. if out of hand hee did not desist from his purpose, hee would excommunicate all (except the King himselfe) who durst take Armes against any whosoever, in the interest were quite released. So quickly did this Prelate on his coming into England, shew himselfe not onely a faithfull Philippus, (as the King foretold,) and a faithlesse Baronius; (as these his darings prove) but euen another Pope, to threaten and persecute the King, John himselfe had left to doe it.

(31) But these threats of forced Confession, though they dash the whole course of Regale government, may seeme the more excusable, hee having some colour (though but a colour) thereof by reason of his oratory and place: the courties which soon after he purified, will not admit the like plea or pardon with the King. This English Pope, hauing in a provisory Synode of Clergy men and Bishops, granted by Indulgence, that in this time of Interdict, both Commonwealth and Seculars, might in their Churches celebrate diuine seruice, saith it were with a very low voice, Kinged out the Sacraments at a very private conference, more cordiall perhaps to them then seruing of God,) relating with much oftentation, what an Oath at his affluishing the King, hee compelled him to take, for reffering good Lawes and antiquating bad: to which end, a Charter of King Henry the 5th being lately found (which there hee shewed and caused to be read) by it, they might, if themselves would reduce to the justitie estate, those Liberties which long they had lost. Both Charter and Causell being received with a great applausse, and a Confederacy was stricken betwixt him that all swearing to him in force for those liberties to the spending of their lives, and bee promising them his most faithfully and uttermost assistance. Amongst so many false to the State, probable it is, that some were false among themselves, by whome these secrets might come to the Kings eares; who finding himself by both Clergy and Lay-Peeres combining against him, vnable to reuenge his foraine, or repress his late domesticke indignities, knew no furer way to ouertop them all, then by that high Hand, by which himselfe was first subiected to them all. How this might be fetcht about, becometh concerning his Holiness, a learned Monke shall relate in his owne Language. * The King knew and had learned by manifold experience, that as the Pope, both for Ambition, and Pride, went beyond all other mortal men: So likewise he was in his greedy desire of riches far vn-table, that with money either paid or promised, he might be wraught like wraue and made phable to all wicked actions. Thus hauing the true length of the Popes foot, he futes him accordingly with rich prelates, and golden promises, craving (by such mooring Rhetorick) not his aide only, but his Consecration against the Archbishoppe and Barons, who lo vncharitably distressed him. But Innocentius forward of himselfe without any Motiues, to put in wre the Papall vtterues, and the execution of his late-vntused power, vpon the first gladtime newes of England's Passallage to his See, had preceeding dispatched for England an Agent of greater port then Pandolph, a Sub-deacon, Nicholas Bishoppe of Tusculum, with no meane credence and instructions for perswading what the Pope had guiltfully gotten, then Pandolph had to purchase, what he ambitiously gaped for: by whose¹ arrival the King seemed to be possided of those his desires, before his golden letters arrived at Rome to craue them.

(54) For this Legate was infected with the like itches (* Ambition and Avarice) as his Master, and therefore King Iohn knew how to demerite his faithlesse loue, by supplying him with like ornaments, whereby the Archbishop and Barons (some perceived, that the Legate was a wholly Regall, and the King Papall) which iculousse made both their Actions more distastfull. The Ouent and professed end of his coming, being to release the Interdict, hee first tampered a little to accord the King and Prelates vpon countenances of Requitution towards which, though the king offered ten thousand marks, yet the Prelates² repining at the Legates³ partiality to the King in approving that office, chose rather to suffer the whole land to groine vnder that vnecharitable, and truly-styled Curse, then to defalcate any lot of their countenances. Vnder which colour, the Popes Agents, (a little helpe for such a butcher) brake his mind so the King of a more secret & principall cause of his Legate, which was for the continuing of a more validous and vnexcusable conuenance of his Kingdomes to the yoke of Roman Sovereignty; pretending doubtlesse, (as Pandolph had done) that hee could neuer be safe or quiet, but vnder the powerfull protection of the Popes winges.

What iust exceptions the World might take to the former Graunte, his Holinesse was not ignorant it being an Act in the King, both of manifest Peccata against his oath at his Coronation, and also of Compromissus, Circumcision, and Fautes, hee being driuen thereto by the Pope himselfe, who had set vpon both the French power, and his owne Barons against him; an Act of one⁴ actually excommunicatus, as also were the Witnesses concurring with him in that action, whereto, as neither the next Heyes, nor the Cherchy, nor Body of the Kingdom, gaue any consent, so an open dissensus thereof was made by the very⁵ Principall man there present, in the name (as is likely) of all the rest: and that all was ingroffed with so many graffes curatibus, as if done voluntarij, without any fear or force; in a general Assembly of the Barons only by a diuine inspiration, and because the King had nothing fite to pacify God for his sinnes, but the young excess of his Kingdomes: Well might the Pope blush at these shamelesse oblations; and therefore if now the King, standing on calmer termes, can be wrought to ratifie his former Graunte, though the dealing bee more fraudulent, yet the Act will seeme more colourable, because labouring of lesse constraint, and more free deuotion. But if we looke with an vnpartial Eye, wee shall see both the plight of King Iohn, and the action of Innocentius, still like it selfe: the Interdict still burthening his land; his Barons more molested to him then fortaite foes; his Prelates greedily gratifying him to empowerr his meanes; his Archbishop stopping all proceedings against forraigne or home-bred enemies; and if hee had thwarted the Popes command herein, hee foresaw faire ground for storme at hand, then hee had hitherto escaped. Thus in desire to settle his Kingdomes quiet for his owne time, and in hope, perchance, that his Successors would (as since by diuine blessing they haue) vindicate it againe from such an enforced slavery, hee condescended to remue his Charter of Substitution, knowing belike that his expresse⁶ reformation to himselfe and his Heires, of all due administration of Justice, all Liberties, and Regalties, (as being excepted out of the Graunte), was forcible of it selfe to make it vnforceable. For how hath hee his wanted power of Inflicte, who was supreme, and in due subordination? how his wonted liberties, who was absolute, & in due Homage and Personage? how his fore-wed Regalties, whom another may name, and command as his vassall?

Yet this Charter, adorned with a Golden Bull, (hitherto the Roman Phalera, whereas the former was but sealed with waxe) was at a meeting in Saint Pauls Cathedral Church⁷ presented for other business (as the Interdict) presented for more authentick solemnity at the High-Altar, where, in the King and Legates presence, the Archbishoppe of Canterbury, himselfe also both a Cardinal and a Legat (in this acting the office of a house Parson and noble Prelate, as the Archbishop of Dublin had done at the first Crusade) steep forth, and is the⁸ name of the whole Clergy and Kingdomes, boldly and earnestly presented⁹ at the same Altar in solemn manner, his Appeales against that Charter to be revocable to the whole world, as like-wile formerly¹⁰ he had off his payable condemner to disperse the knights hairs in the substitution to the Pope and Court of Rome. That the Power of the land accorded with the Archbishop in the Appeale, (and more then in Appeales) both the King owne¹¹ letters to the Pope saying, they openly professed, that they forcibly made head against him, because hee had so enlarged his land, and their owne bitter exclamations against it, so frequently in a Authors reiterated, doe demonstrate; and yet both the Archbishop and other Barons, are so cunningly named in the Popes¹² Transcript, as if they had not ouely beene present and witnesses at the doing, but also approvers of the deed. What comfort then had Innocentius of renouncing his old Charter, and thus insinuating for a new? Surely but little, it seemeth; especially when hee saw both his owne Creasures in England thus oppugne it, and Christian Princes abroad; yea King Iohns¹³ mortal enemies, who not only denied that England, notwithstanding this Translation¹⁴ was any patrimony of St. Peter, and condemned the Pope for holding an error so pernicious to all Kingdomes; but also vowed to doe before they would yield, that any King ever of his owne will, made his Kingdom Tributary, and his Nobles slaves to others. By which vniversal detestation, of this the Popes viurping, it is not impossible (though for the present hee flourished the Transcript thereof, which hee sent into England, with the¹⁵ Preface of Christ, and Statutes de being Kings and Priests, and that therefore in one person of Christ vicar, as the Soule and the Body, so both Kingdom and Presbytery did concur), that yet ere long hee was no lesse ashamed of this latter, then of his former Charter. Whereto well fitteth his testimony, who writes that¹⁶ a Parliament was held at London the yeere 1214. Where the Archbishop saie as President with all the Clergy and Laity: wherby by commandment of the Pope, the Charter, Fealty, and homage by which the King was obliged to the Pope, was absolutely released on the 7 day of July: which if bee true, so mirabile if the Court of Rome cannot produce, though often challenged thereto, this Charter whereof so much they vaunt. Notwithstanding some vnquiet Spirits, alping long after to the Papacy, though pretending (perhaps) the¹⁷ Original Charter was consumed at Lyon, where the¹⁸ Pope causing, some say his owne Concile to be held on St. John had a pretence to extort a contribution from the Prelates: there in concelle, the first transcription then¹⁹ hee meant it should²⁰ they made some flourish to renew their claime of homage and prelate, till in a General Parliament, the Prelates, Lords, and Commons, generally and jointly called, that forasmuch as neither King John, nor any other King, could bring his Realm and people to such trial, but by common assent of Parliament, (the which was never done,) and that in doing he did against his Oath at his Coronation; besides many other causes of inconvenience; therefore the Pope thenceforward should attempt any thing therein, the King with all his Subjects should with all their Forces and powers resist the same, and rather hazard all their lives and livelihood, than endure that usurpation. If Pope Paschall (in the time of King John's grandfather) having with much solemnity made some grants to the Emperor Henry, and confirmed them with an Anathema, with the sanction of thirteen Cardinals, and with religious receyving of the blessed Sacrament; yet, because such grants were thought prejudicial to his See, solemnly disclaimed his own Act, and such his doing was approved by a Clergy Council, as pretended to be done by force: how much more lustily might King John Successors and his State, by such approbation of their General Council, free themselves of those servitudes wherewith by another vainly, forced, unwarrantable Act, they were supposed to be entangled?

(55) Though the Archbishop were so vnkind against the Pope (the Advancer of his Fortunes) as to give by his appeal so fatal a blow to his desired Crown; yet the Pope was not so ingrate as to die in his debt; as quickly he found in another Appeal, which he made to the Pope against his Le-gate, for that he, relying on Apollinical indulgence, not only dispensed of all Spiritual dignities in such as he liked the King, but also to his own Italian; and King John, though absent, unconscionable, unconscionable, unconscionable. Which Legate tyranny invulnerable in a Christian State, though Simon Langton (the Archbishop brother and Proctor) vrged earnestly before the Pope, yet the Le-gates Agent Pandulphus, so displayed both the Archbishops servitudes in using suchever personal and appellation against the Kings subjection, and the Prelates' amaze in their own conscience as for restitution from the King being the most benign, modest and humble Prince that his eyes ever beheld; that his Holiness not only concealed an exceeding hatred against the Archbishop and his cause, but also his Antientike Letters for repealing the interdict, upon restitution only of 11000.
Markes more to the Prelates (the King before had voluntarily offered them 100000) and that but by equal portions of five years payment. But the King, who knew the Pope's pleasure before these letters came to impart it, having found that his French affairs had sustained vnrepairable impeachments by his hitherto enforced delays, entrusting his Kingdom to the Legate and Earle Marshal custody, was with his Forces passed into France, (whiles in his absence, the relaxation of the interdict after more than six years continuance, was by the Legate in a Parliament solemnly promulged) where his Successors were so fortunate, that being powerfully subdu'd, great hope was conceiv'd the other Provinces would follow. Whence breaking with like victoories into Britaine, being there at the point to give battle to Lewis the Dauphin, his currentlike Resolutions suddenly forsooke him, and made him forsake his purpose. But a greater impairment of those his hopes, was the defection of his Confederate Otho the Emperor; at the renowned Battle of Boissin, where King Philip, driven from his horse by the hand of Reginald Earle of Bulioigne, had there with his life ended the quarrell, if a faithful Soldier had not covered him with his own Body and bravely sacrificed his life, to save his Sovereigns; who thereupon recovered both his footing, and the victory. The bay news whereof, concurring with his Barons outrages at home, drove King John on such conditions, to capitulate on a five years Truce, and return to bridle them at home, whose attempts hee ever found most dangerous, when hee was most bound abroad. For vnck a prate of Demetrius (the villal mark for Treachery; the Barons assembling at Saint Edmunds did every man on the high Altar solemnly swear, to renounce their former fealty to the King, and pursue him by arms, till they had enforced his consent to the Charter of liberties formerly by the Archbishop recommended to them. Which when afterward they came in person to challenge of the Kings as a part of his Oath taken at his Absolution; hee seeing both their forces and affections ad-dress'd for violence, was enforced with gentle language and promised satisfactions, to desire, till after Easter, mature deliberation on so important a matter; in which breaching time, both in publick, hee took new oath of loyalty through all the land, and in devotion, undertooke the Crusade and Signe of the holy Warre, choosing belike to die against faithlesse Turks, rather then to live amongst such faithlesse Subjects. But neither Oathes, nor holy oaths (them offered the sacred privilege of protection) could be sufficient backers to protect against such desperate attempt-ers; who at the prefixed week of Easter, preparing themselves not for a Conference, as with their Prince, but for a Battle, as against some hostile power, troop'd together at Stamford, with 12000 men conformable for number, whose very principal Actor and conqueror was Stephen the Archbishop, the more pensioners person, because (to hide his false enterprises) most assiduous in attendance about the King. And him the King selecting to lend to the Barons Army (who were come on as farre as Brighthelm, not farre from the King, residing now in Oxford) to know the contents of their desires, hee brought a Schedule of these claimed liberties, with a message of their resolutions, of presently hee sealed out a Charter thereof onto them, they would compell him thereto by forceful entrance on all his possessions. Whereat his great heart highly disdain'd, hee demanded, why they also demanded not his Kingdom? those their exactions being grounded on no colour of reason, and swearing never to embrace himselfe to them by such a condition, hee dismissed his Archbishop to return them his peremptory answer.

(56) Neither were the Barons lesse resolute in performance of their own message, appointing for Head unto that huge and heady rout, Robert Fitzwalter, whom they entyled The Marshal of Gods Army and holy Church: who first assailing Northampton Castle, after fifteen dayes fruitlesse fury, departed to Bedford, whose Castles being in Condemnation gave them easie entrance; but the Londoners (displeased with the King for burthening them with taxes) not only admitted them, but vnto them by request, to enter their City by night: where haling that Key (as it were) of the land in their disposall, they by these the successful letters not only drew most of the Nobles from the King, but also had almost lockt him out of his Regall Seat. To present which outrage, by gentle messages interacting of the Barons place and day of meeting, who thereto designed Runnymede, (since called Confession, for such consultations of State, they thence came) with armed multitudes out of all the Kingdom beyond all number, that the King, seeing his power far inferiour unto theirs, was constrained to grant them their vtmost desires, not only for Liberties, (specified in Magna Charta, and Charter forestis), but also for a kind of sway in the Government, by twenty free elected Peeres, to whose commands all the other Barons also were bound by oath to be obsequious.
Thus one of the greatest Sovereigns of Christendome, was now become the twenty fifth petty king in his own Dominion; as appeared that very night, when all the rell following the pompous streame of the new Peers-Kings, left their Sovereign one selfe with seven Gentlemen to attend him. What marvaile if high disdain hereof pierced his swelling heart, fitian both bodily & ghostly: and not only forgave gladly all his mortal persecutors (holding that a matter, though very difficult to flesh and blood, yet salutary to the soul) but also first commanded it to carry his name to do the same: to whom he caused all present, to swear fealty, as to the King of his Crown, and sent his letters to all his Officers abroad, exhorting them to assist him. And ¹ thus he commended his soul to God, and his body to be buried in Westminster Church, where the Bishop solemnly interred it, by the Kings appointment, near the Body of Wulfstan, a sainted Bishop renowned for constant fidelity to his Prince against the rebellious Nobles of his time: with which kind of men, King John's government had been miserably encombred.

(62) This, being the Catastrophe of his Tragicall Reign, might also have been the close of his Story, had not the suddenness of his death, excited some search into the cause of his sickness. Such Authors as touch the matter but in general, content themselves with saying, he died of a gravel, or a feaver, or a flux, or a surfeit: but those who have entered into the particular, insist on such a Surfeit, as when of both gravel, feaver, and flux were most probable effects and Symptoms. For comming (say they) from the Waters to Winchester Abbey, (being of the Cistercian Order, which of old he had much incensed) he added new matter of offence, as he late at meat, when, in speech ¹ of his enemies too large prison, hee swore, as hee lived but half a yeere longer, he would make one halfe-penny loaf as deare as ² twelve: whichto prevent, a Monk of that holy habit, whither in love to Levin, or hate to the King, or pique on the Land, presenting him with an envenomed Cup, (whereof the King commanded him to bee his Taster) became the Diabolical Instrument of his own and his Successors destruction. This relation, delivered by Monks, and men of Monkish humour, as a thing too vudenable, that they know (at what time they wrote this) ³ five Monks in that Abby did sing for this their Brothers soule specially, and so should wholes the Abby stand, which if it had bene forged carry Child might easily have refuted; and the record of all circumstances thereof, (of the Kings speeches, of the Monks conference with his Abbot, of his preparing the drinke with a Toade in the garden, of his dying in the Chantry) might deserve credite with the greatest Patrones of Monks; yet one of them (as if by acquiring Simon of Winchest, all other of such Orders were cleared from allminating of Princed) thrust eagerly, to asperse some late a Relater herof, with the blots both of malice & forgery. Wherein is the malice: in adding to the narration, Pictures also of the fact, so to move hatred to Monks and their Religion; whereas of truth, every Monks, or men of that Religion, were the very first, who not onely so depicted, but also lively and richly depainted it in their goodly Manuscripts.
Wherein then the Forgery in adding to Custom, that his Abbot gave him absolution for the same before death, there being no such matter at all, nor any mention thereof in the story? No? let the very story speake; 1 The Monks went to the Abbot and as for John of him, and told the Abbot all the King had said, and prayd his Abbot to give him, for he would give the King such a drinke that all England should be glad thereof and say that the Monks unto the Garde, &c. Yea farther, one Monk alledged, an inducement for the Abbots assent thereto, for that the King had sent for the Abbots sister (a faire Princess) with purpose to have deflowered her. Yea, but the Story it self is charged with noveltie, the first author thereof being but *An.
1431*. and all other former Writers making no mention of it. This if true, were somewhat, and doubtles, it is as true as the former: for how could hee bee the first Author, when not onely Ranulph the Monk of Chesler, John of Tymnham, and Thomas Otter-bourne the Franciscan Fryer, recorded as ² some generally retained, but sundry other ancient flowers, as

John of Lichfield, the Monke of Leicester, & Seale Monks (to omit other namelesse Authors before *An.
1431*), so confidently avouch his poisoning at Winchester, that vnpartiall after Writers, though friends to Monks, made no scruple to beleieve it. And why should they not, with an Author, more ancient and vnexceptionable then all the rest, (even King John Sonne and Successor in his Kingdom) asserted it, when the Prior of Clerkenwell finely telling him (being then in that house) that as some as hee came to die justice towards his Princed, he should cease to be a King; the King enraged with his traitorous threat, replied; What? meanest thou to turne mee out of my Kingdome, and afterwards to murder mee, as my father was dealt with?

(63) But not to trouble our felices with refusing a Gossie gawling against Faces true relation; as it is to obdurate the hatred of Monks against that King, both in thus procuring his death then, and his dishonour (a second death) in their slanderous inductions euer since. For, whereas he ¹ wrote by some of his Bishops to certain foraine Princes, for aides against his faithlesse Rebels, the Monks charge him, that hee counterfeited his Bishops Seales, and writ abroad, that all Englishmen were become Infidels and Apolytans from Christs faith, and therefore such should come to subdue them and take their possessions: 7 when hee said, a King which hee kild, had neuer the lesse fate, though hee neuer heard a Message; they charged him hee doubted of the Resurrection of the dead, 8 and Judging, hee never died well after his yielding to the Pope, that hee had bee was unfortunate since hee was reconciled unto God: that, 9 when hee gave leave to a servant of his owne, to enter any religious Order, he gave him leave to bee of what Religion and Faith heell. That moreover, 10 hee offered his Kingdome to a Saracen, and would embrace the Turk faith, though this tale were told by one Robert of London (a wicked Masse-Priest, or rather a Monks- sister, 11 having a face like a serp, with one arme long, and another short, his fingers deformedly growing together two and two, with such senseles improbabilities, as, 12 that hee found that Monks King reading of Saint Pauls Epistles, and that hee refused the Kingdom of England being offered him, with the like. That lastly 13 it was revealed to a Monk, King John was in Hell; though a Poet for so saying, in by M.P. (who made no doubt of King John's salvation) censured for 14 Reprobate. These all are demonstrations of incredible hatred, as should rather alleviate their Authors credite, then the Kings; whose Raigne had it not fallen in the time of so turbulent a Pope, so ambitious Neighbour-Princed, so disloyall Subjects, nor his Story into the hands of exasperated Writers, hee had appeared a King of as great re-nownce, as misfortunes. His works of devotion inferiour to none; as his Foundations declare: 15 Beauley, Ferrington, 16 Malmesbury, and 17 Dunelm, and that other for Monks at Godstow by Oxford, for which, some have interpreted that Prophecy of Isaiah as meant of him: Sith Virgin refers to Maid he gave, Monks his first Saints God will him save. His Acts and Orders for the Wales people, were beyond molt: hee being eyther the first, or the chiefest, who appointed those noble Formes of Ciuill government in London, and 18 most Chief, and Incorporate Townes of England, endowing them also with their greater Francisces: The first who could with Sterling money to bee here coyned; 19 The first, who ordained the Honourable Ceremonies in Creation of Barons. The first, who settled the Rates and Measures for Wine, Bread, Cloth, and such like Necessaries of Commerce. The first, who planted English Lanes and Officers in Ireland, and both annexed that Kingdome, and salued Wales to the Crowne of England, thereby making amends for his losses in France.
Whose whole course of life and actions, were cannot flut vp with any true Eulogie, then that which an ancient Author hath conferred on him; Princed qui-dem Magnam erat, sed minus felix; atque ut Mauri, utraque fortissimum expertus: Double life, he was a Prince more Great then happy, and one, who, like Marianne, had tried both sides of Fortunes wheele.

His Wives.

(64) Alise, the first wife of King Iohn, was the eldest of the two daughters, and heires apparant at that time of Humbert the second, Earle of Maurien, now called Sauny: her Mother was Clumence daughter of Berthold the fourth, Duke of Lorraine, who had been the divorced wife of Henry the Lyon, Duke of Saxony. This marriage was in their chidhood coöded by their Parents at Montfort in Auvergne, in February, Anno, 1273; he should have had with her, her Fathers Earldome, but all altered by her untimely death; and after the death of her Mother, the new marriage of her Father, and the issue male of the same, whereof the Dukes of Saxony are descended.

(65) Isabel, his second wife (by * some called Henrietta or Anis) though the * youngest of the three Sisters, yet was in regard of this marriage, the sole Heire of William Earle of Gloucester, sonne of Earle Robert, the Natural sonne of King Henry the first; her Mother was Henri the daughter of Robert King of Leicester. Anno 1200. and surrouing him, was married to Hugh Barre Earle of March, and Lord of Lestrem and Valence in Paysois, to whom first she should have bene married, but yet (as seemeth) continued her affection to him till now. By him shee had diuers Children, (greatly aduanced by the King, Henry 3. their halfe brother, and as greatly malignd by his Subiects) Hugh Earle of March and Angoulême, Guy of Lusignan, slain in the battell at Lewes; William of Valence Earle of Pembroke, Amy of Valence Bishoppe of Winchester, Geoffrey of Lusignan L. of Hoffings.

CHAPTER IX.

HENRIE, the eldest Son of King John, was when his Father dyed about * ten yeeres of age: which state of Child-hood, being most vnfit to succede in so troublous a state, (the furious waues whet-offe seemd far from being appeas'd) God Almighty, in fauour and pitty of his Innocency, strengthened with the seruce of great and worthy men, whereby the free and noble Realme of England was graciously preserued from French seruilite; from whose Conquest as it was naturally disparted with a Sen, so could it as badly haue endured to be ioyned thereto by subiectiue gouernement. Howbeit the difficulties were not few nor sleight, which did at first emperch this happy preferuation, though they did not hinder it long: for, * bee disposing the matter per se or dameth all things wisely, and moderates them sweetly, faire weather was restored after stormes, and quiet being established through the Kingdome, the peaceable seruants of God had space to breath in.

(1) To effect so great a benefite, Wille the Popes Legate stood wholly for advancement of Henry, and expulsion of the French; the authority of whole persuasions, ioyned with his other power and example, drew many of the Prelates to fauour, that (although their lands and goods were theretofore spoiled) they would not doe any homage to Lewis; as likewise the loyall care of William Marshall Earle of Pembroke, did gaine (in time) and settle the hearts of the secular Lords. Great was the wisdom, courage and diligence of that Noble Gentleman in so broken and ieopardious estate; for he, knowing that the maine hopes of his Countrey rested in the safety of their persons, in whom the right of Succession was, be first of all secured them within the Citie of Gloucester, which was at Henries seruice: There were with the young King, his mother Queene Isabel, his brother Richard (afterward King of Romania,) his sisters, the said Earle, and many others in great numbers of the chiefe and principall men of all sortes, who vpon perfect notice of King Johns death, repaired thither to their young Prince, with a purpose to console and conuince in one, for the re-union of minds and bodies to the obedience of the true borne king. The Earle of Pembroke therefore bringing forth his precious charge, and placing him with all due honour and ceremony in view of the assembled States, is reported for the pleasing of all sides, so haue vied words to this effect. About the father of this Prince whom here you be-ho-ber you, for his euill demeanours hath worthily vndergone our persecution, yet this young Child as he is yeres tender, so is he pure and innocent from those his Fathers downy: Wherefore, if any man is to be charged with the blemishes of his euill transgressions, wither shall the Child (as Scriptures teach vs,) beare the unquiste of his Father: we ought of duty and conscience, beare our sinnes milder towards this tender Prince, and take compassion of his age. And inasmuch as he is the Kings lawfull and eldest Sonne, and ought to be our Soueraigne, and his Successor, let vs with one voice of distance appoynt him our King and Governour, let vs remove from vs this Lewis the French Kings sonne, and suppress his people, which are a confusion and shame to our Nation, and the yeaues of their forwarde vs cast off from our shoulders.

(3) The entertaining of persuasions among the wife, is an effect of Truth, not of painted Phrases; and these plaine wordes of the 1 stele, (the young Kings Brother in Law) were received with generall applaus of all that were present, so that Henry was immediately proclaimed, and speedily crowned (vpon the day of SS. Iohn & Iude) in the presence both of Walle the Popes Legate, (who imposed on his vnexperienced yeres some vndue Oathes of seruice to the Romane See) and of Queene Isabel, with many of the Lords Spiritual and Secular, and those of all other sortes of People. The speede of which roial Ceremony (for it was the ninth day after King Johns death) was not greater then the necessity of the State required: for his Enemy (naturally his, but the enemy of the English name, Prince Lewis) had (as yet) London, the chiefe seat of the Empire, at his deuotion, many potent Earles, Barons, and martiall malecontents, subiect to his command, and an Armie in the field with which he sought to constrain that mirror of constant loyalty, Hubert de Burgh, to render him the most important Citie in England, that of Dover, committed to his much-approved trust: The young King on the other side was equinoxed with many difficulties, want of money not the least, the most part of his Fathers treasures being drowned. To encounter all which mischiefs, the said Earle of Pembroke was by common assent of Prelates and Peeres constituted Guardian of the young Kings person, and Vice-Governour of the Kingdome.

(4) Letters hereupon issuing in the new Kings name, and for his affaires, to all such as had charge in the common-weale, (with many promises of reward and fauour,) were accordingly in most places obeyed: for the cull will borne to King John, licensing to die with him, and to be buried in the same graue, the loyal bloud waxt warme about the coldest hearts, rekindling in them the honest desire of shewing themselves true Englishmen. It was also a great helpe to the Kings party, that Prince Lewis his followers and abettors, were, on every Sunday and Holiday, pronounced to stand accurd and excommunicated. Lewis perceiving (contrary to his expectation) that King Johns death was to him nothing auailable, but rather detrimental, dwells no longer about Dover Castle, but raising his flagges enters London, and provides the best hee can for his terering estate, which hee sought to support, by putting French Garrison into Callicies: The Tower of London being rendered to him, hee beleagued Hertford Castle, which after the slaughter of many French, being deliuered vpon faire composition, the custody of that Peice was demanded by Richard Fitz-Walter, as by ancient right belonging to him; but Lewis put him off with this answer, that he should haue patience till hee had conquered the Realme, at which time hee would restore their right to every one. The secret reason which moued Lewis to giue this answer, was: for that, consulting with his French vpon Fitz-Walters demand, they gave it for their common opinion: That the English were not worthy to haue such places entrusted to their charge, who were betters of their natural Lord. A well reason to moue Lewis to answer, but a farr better to teach others to continue loyal. The Battle of Berkhamsted (whose Capitaine was one Walran a valiant Dutch Knight) hopeles of succours was likewise rendered, which as the rest, hee stuffed with French Garrison, where in, howsoever hee provided for his owne Nation during that present, hee tooke no wife counsell for the maiue of his enterprise: for so apparant ielousies (secouding & confirming the Vicount Melours predictions) could not but vterly vntierle the affections of such great ones as had called him in. His next March being to Saint Albons, where hee would haue constrained the Abbot to doe him homage, hee was encountered with this honest answer: That he would doe him no homage, unless hee were absolved from the homage which hee had made to the King of England: yet to purchase respite of homage, or rather his and the Towns peace till Candlemas, hee was forced to vif the mediation both of his purse, and of his noble friends.

(5) But those intestine causes for which the Barons had called Lewis in, falling now to the ground by the death of King John, and the French by their natural insolence, insipitions and vanity, ministering new reasons of auersion, were all of them strong moeues to dispose the mindes of the English Leuitians to returne to due obedience; yet finding themselves bound in honour, not so to leaue him so dauidely destitute, (who vpon assistance of their oathes and hostages had put himself among them) that he should thereby fall into Henries hands; they desire therefore his absence, but not his destruction. The more handsomely to compass the rest, an abstinence from warre was (for a time) concluded between the King and Lewis: the rather for that Lewis had intelligence from Rome, that the curie which Walle had denounced against him, should shortly be confirmed by the Pope, unless hee left England. As this Truce gaue Lewis liberty to sayle backe to France for new supplies from his Father, (who greatly desired to confere with him;) so his absence gaue opportunity to his English, to consult more freely of their best way, that from thence forth Lewis was neuer potent in their affections, but presently lost many chiefe Lords and others, who againe became true English.

(6) Lewis vpon his speedie returne out of France, minding to make a speedie dispatch, sets out of London his Army of more then twenty thousand Souldiers, with a purpose not onely to free Mount-Surrey (then beleagued by his enemies) but to subdue the whole contry adjoining. Odious and grievous to the Countrey was this passage of the French, which reach as farr as Lincoln, there were among them so many ragged rascals, the verie scumme and filthy froth of that Nation, whose beggary was so base that they had not clothes to hang on their backs, to supply the which they made many goe naked in all the places where they marched. The Earle of Pembroke Governour of the King by the Counsell of Walle, and the Bishoppe of Winchester resolving to set the cause vpon God, and the fortune of a field, is now with the young King and his Assistant flant Lords, at Newark, where the Generall assembly for that service was appointed. The whole Army after the Masters, relied there some dayes, which they spent not in vanities, but in deuotions & recit of the Sacrament, humbling themselves before the offended Maieſtie of God; and so all of them (saith Paris) being prepared, resolute yether to returne victorious, or to die in defence of their country, their Soueraignes right, and their owne Liberties, and possessions, all which seemed now to be at stake. To give them the greater edge and spirit, Walle with great solemnity accosteth Lewis and his Conditions, and thus the Army marcheth towards Lincolne, and the Leuſians there in siege of the Castle the King himselfe being left with a strong guard at Stow (about eight miles short of Lincolne) accompanied with Walle and others, there without perill of his person to attend Gods pleasure, in the event of the enterprise.

(C) Vpon their approach, if the Councell of some English Lords had bene followed, the Leuſian Army had issued forth of the City, & given them battle in the open field; but the Earle of Perth (the French Generall) thinking the Kings party to bee greater then it was, for that the Noblemen and Bannerets thereof had each of them two Esquires, the one born with themselves, the other aduanced among the Carriages, which doubled the shew of their numbers; they did thereupon change that course, closed the Gates of the City, and pyled their endeavours against the Castle more fiercely then before. The Earle of Pembroke therefore lets Falschaw slip in at the Castle-pollerne with his Archbushers, whiles others breake vp the South-gate of the City, at which the Kings Army most courageously entering, and they of the Castle falling out in Flancke of the Enemy, scattered and vnicely defeated the Leuſians.

The Earle of Perth their Generall, being euironed with the Royallists, and willed to render himselfe, swaie that he would neuer become Prisoner to any English: vpon which refusal he was run through the sight of his helmet into the braines, and soyed without speaking any word. In this conflict (being on Saturday in Whitsun-week) the force of natural propension was apparent; for notwithstanding the fierce resolutions of the Kings People, yet when they saw the faces of their kinsmen, friends & countrymen on the other side, that fury relented so strongly, that the most part of the reuenge fell vpon the Horſemen and not vpon the Horſemen, whom onely they laboured to make their Captiues. The whole riches of the Leuſian Campe, & of the City of Lincolne, became the booty and spoile of the Kings Army, whereupon this difcomfite was called Lewis Fair. Neither did the Clergy of the place escape, for the Popes Legate had commaunded that they also should be rifled to a penny, as persons excommunicated in partaking with Lewis. The Chafe was but coldly & faintly followed vpon the flying Barons, otherwise not a man could haue escaped; wherein yet the chiefest Barons were taken, with about 400. Knights, besides Esquires, and of other sorts without number, though some say that this number of Knights were slain, & matrons and women of the towne flying by boate, which they had no skill to goe more. Such as escaped the fight were not therefore palled the danger for the Country people fell vpon them as they fledde, killing great numbers, so that almost all the footmen tooke vp their last lodgings before they could reach to London, where Lewis was. The Marſhal of France, the Chapellain of Arras, and about two hundred Knights came safely thither, but were not otherwise then slowly welcome of the Prince, who laid vpon their cowardise the losse of all the rest. His feare of being taken Prisoner lustily enuincing, hee fortifies London by the best meanes hee can, and dispatcheth Poſts into France for more reliefe. This great victory was much the stranger, if (as some write the same went) that only three were slain vpon both sides, the Earle of Perth, one of Du-Breuil Knights, and an obscure fellow belonging to some, or other of the Barons.

(8) The Kings Governour after the victory rode presently with the gladdest tidings in the height of speed to the King and Legate, who with tears of ioy gave God thanks. But the noble Earle not leaving his worke imperfect, seekes to imbarre Lewis from foraging about London. Meane while by the diligence of Lady Blanch the wife of Lewis, English the Russian Apoſtata, (who of a Monke becoming a Demagogue) was now vpon the Sea with a fresh supply of men and munition bound for London; But God was not better pleased with these, then with the other scatterlings at Lincolne. For the English Naue, hauing the wind of the French, sunke diuers of their shippes by tilting at them with their yron Prowes & Beakes of their Gallies; using also vnlikened lime in dust or powder, which they threw into the faces of their enemies, and blinded their sight: so were the hopes of Lewis for any present succours absolutely frustrated. Lewis himselfe, found after long search, and drawne out from the bottom of the Pompee in a French shippe, at Deuier had his head cut off, though some say hee was slain by Richard, a baill-sonne of King Iohn. The newes of which successe being brought to the King, did not more reioice him, then they wounded Lewis, for the losse was not onely great in men, but in all sorts of riches and provisions. To giue now no rest to Lewis his declining fortunes, the Earle of Pembroke with a mighty Army besieged London, and Lewis therein, as well by Water as by Land; seeking to drive him by penurie to render the City. It came to capitulation, and in an Ilet in the Riuer of Thames, not farre from Stanes, the King, Walle the Legate, and William Marshall the Kings Governour, met with Lewis & the Barons to finish the Peace: for Lewis had promised to doe as Walle and the Earle would desire, so that it might be tend to his dishonour or scandal: Heades or Articles of the agreement which Lewis swaie vpon the Gospell to performe, were, 1. That Lewis, the Barons, and other his partakers should stand to the iudgements of the Church (whose censures they had now for many yeeres contemned) and from thenceforth bee and remaine true to the same. 2. That he and his should forthwith depart the land, neuer to returne again with a purpose to doe harme. 3. That he should doe his best to draw his Father to make restitution of all such things in France as belonged to the King of England, and that Lewis when himselfe was King should quierly part with them. 4. That Lewis should immediately render to King Henry all holdes and places taken in the warre. On the other part, the King, the Legate and the Earle swaie; 1. That the King should restore to the Barons and others, all their rightes and liberties, with all the Liberties formerly demanded of his Father. 2. That none (of the Lay) should suffer damage or reproch for taking part on either side. 3. That Prisoners should bee released, &c. Whereupon Lewis with his adherentes was formally by Walle absolved from the sentence of Excommunication, and so they ranne on all sides into embraces, and parted in the kilfe of Peace. The Walle, who had held with the Barons, were left out of this Conclation, being thereby laid open to spoile. This was Lewis driven out of England, whom the Earle of Pembroke brought to the Sea-side and the Realme was cleared.

mies the Barons; in that, if money were due, it must have come from them, not from the King, who both in honour and profit was rather obliged to the contrary. Writers of that very time do in plain words say, The Poverty of Lewis was such, that he was compelled to borrow five thousand pounds of the Londoners, to set him out of England: and therefore that other seems nothing else but a vaine glorie to false the honour of Lewis, who was plainly driven out of England, after so high hopes with loss, sorrow, and eternal disgrace, which the French are so sensible of, that they scarce seeme to write of the whole action, otherwise then *laying the misfortune of Lewis upon the Barons mutability.

(10) The Realm of England purged of those foraine dragges, was not therefore perfectly freed from other manifold encombrances, such as affect so great a clogging of all lawes and things divine, and humane, doe ordinarily flow up and downe, like the froth & working of a troubled Sea. For divers men presuming upon their former services to the State, or thinking the old bad world would either continue still, or loose returne, if iustice grew confident against Trespassors, or for what other corrupt motives fouer, did dare intolerable things. The principall Lords of this misrule, were William Earle of Aumari, Falscheus de Breut with his Garrison Soldiers, Robert de Cespont, with others, who having had the Castles and possessions of certaine Bishops and Great men, either to keepe in trull, or otherwise by iniquity of the times converted violently to their vice; did still with-hold the lame, both against the minds of their lawful owners, and the Kings expresse Prohibition. Among others, Eubert de Gange defended the Castle of Newark (being the Fee of the Bishoppe of Lincolne, as was also the town it self) against the Kings Armie, conducted by the * Great Marshall Earle of Pembroke, for eight dayes, and did not first yeeld the place, before (by mediation of friends) the Bishoppe paid to Gange one hundred pounds. There was in that great Earle, a perpetuall care to conclude things without blood-shedde, wherein shined his Christian piety and morall wisdom, there being no other lo safe way to steele disordered humors. The greater was his losse both to the King and State by his death * soone after ensuing, whole * monument yet remaining, doth not so much eternize his memory as that well-deserved * Epitaph, the Epitome of his noble vertues;

Anglia, Mercurium Normannia, Gallia Martem.*

Ireland Saturn, England Sonne our I, The Mars of France, and Normant Mercurie.

He left behind him five Sonnes, all Earles of Pembroke successively, and dying without issue; his five Daughters advanced by great marriages, brought as great advantage to their husbands issue, by the inheritances of their issuelesse brethren.

(11) The King (governed after Marshall death, by Peter Bishoppe of Winchester, and such * other, whom the Bishoppe had procured to ioyne in administration of publick affairs) seeming now to have a settled and calme estate, resolute (for good hopes like) to be crowned againe; (which was performed by Stephen Archbishoppe of Canterbury at Westminster with the attendance and confluence of all the Prelates, Peeres, and People. Upon the Saturday before his Coronation, the * new works of the Abbey Church at Westminster, (Paris calles it the Chappell of our Lady) was begunne, whereof the King himselfe in person laid the first stone, as if he ment the world should know, his intention was to consecrate his future actions to raise the glory of God. This calme but new beginning, was almost as speedily dispersed and disturbed by sodaine stormes; by reason that, while the King kept his Christmas with great royalty at Oxford, in the company of the Prelates and Peeres of England, William de Forthun, Earle of Aumari, incited by Falscheus de Breut, and the like riotous Gentlemen, sodainly departed from the Court without leave, & (whether it were upon discontentment, because the King had against the Earles will the last yeere taken some Castles into his hands, or out of an ill ignorance how to lye in quiet) he mannes the Castle of Bisem, vizuals it with the Corne of the Chanons of Bridlington, spoiles the Towne of Deeping, and vnder shew of repaying to the Parliament, kisheth on the Castle of Fotheringhay, committing many other furious actions in contempt of the King, and breach of his peace; many * others in other places following his lewd example. Yet at length the Earle coming in vnder the conduct of Water Archbishop of Tork, was at the suite of Parliament (who succeeded Walrein in the place of Legat) pardoned; and the like hurtfull clemency was extended toward his Complices and Retinue, whom the King (in reuerend belike of some former better deserts) set free without punishment or ransom. And to prevent any further disturbances of that nature, Eubert de Burgh Earle of Kent, for his rare integrity and fidelity (approved in all King Johns troubles) was also made gouernour of the Kings Person, and Chief Justiciar of England, with the generall allowance of all the States. What need the land then had of a feere proceeding, we may iudge by this, that Falscheus de Breut held the Earldomes of Northampton, Oxford, Bedford, and Buckingham, with the Castles and Holdes Philip de Mors, the Castles of Pekes and Nottingham, Nottinghamshire and Derbyshire; and others detained other portions, without any other right, then that which the iniquity of the laterall times gave.

(12) It was no small addition to the troublefomelness of this time, that certaine * Lords of Wales, and (as * some say) Prince Lewelin himselfe, desirous to ridde their Marches of the English, tole in Armes, & laide siege to the Castle of Radi, which incited King Henry to draw thither with an Armie; but the worke was made easie by the voluntary departure of the Welsh; upon the fame of the Kings approach: which appearances of some ensuing storme, moued the king to thinke of strengthening himselfe with faithfull alliances; and not long after, Alexander King of Scots came to Turk, (who in the yeere* before had met King Henry at the same place) and there tooke to wife the Lady Joan King Henries sister; and Hubert de Burgh, in presence of both the Kings married the Lady * Margaret sister to Alexander; Bartolomew * faith, that two great Lords of England married two sisters of King Alexander at that place. About which time, * Isabel Queen Dowager of England, without the leave of her sonne the King, or of his Council, crost the sea, and tooke to husband the Earle of March in France. The young King supposing his estate at home now somewhat settled, and his eyes beginning to grow cleare-sighted by the helpe of experience, forgets not to looke about his affaires abroad; and first sends * Sauaric de Malen to bee his Lieutenant in Aquitaine, where yet the English held the greater part, and dispatcheth Ambassadors to Philip King of France, for restitution according to the Articles with Lewis: whereunto answer was made that nothing could be set restored (which by right of waite had bene achieved) but (as it seemes) there was a Truce for * foure yeeres agreed vpon betwene the two Monarchs, concerning the County of Faitau.

ford, about reformation of the Clergie; where also was counted before him an execrable Impostor, who seeing how current all grossit delusions passed in those dayes of blindness, was emboldned to suffer himselfe to be wounded in his handis forte, and * file (an horror to thinke) that by the resemblance of thole bloody impressions, he might perswade the people (apt to beleave any thing) that hee was their verie Sanitor: whose deserved punishment was by immuring betweene two walles, as a monster too impious and vncworthie to die by any humane hand. There was immured with him a curied old Beate, who pretended to be Mary the mother of this Christ, and well might bee, if their manners bee compared; * some adde a third also, who named herself Mary Magdalen. The punishment by Crucifixion which * some thinke was executed vpon the man at Arbury, is neither so credible nor tollerable, as in which Christianity is selfe might seem to sustaine reproach, it being also against the * ancient law of Constantine, the first famous Christian Emperour, that any should from thence forth die by crucifixion; but it may be, that it was first so iudged (which might cause the relations error) though afterward vpon sounder deliberation changed into a more fitting censure. But strange it is, that this man deferving (as hee did) so severa iudgement at Oxford, Saint Francis, whose fiction and imposture was the very same (for the * mynd, though not for the name of Christ) so soon after deceased for it to be canonized at Rome, for a Chiefe of Saints; and perhaps if this Monster had been at Rome, hee had bene likewise Sainted, or if Saint Francis had bene at Oxford, hee had been likewise immured.

(14) In the State of the Common-wealth incredible darings (though of inferiour quality to that former) were not wanting, against the mastery of the Kings, as appeared by Constance Fitz-Arthur a Citizen of London: who vpon colour of a popular tumult, by him purposely cherished, (which rose at palmes of wrestling, and like maistries betweene the Guzzers of London, and others of the suburbs, Jarremped to set vp a Leuw againe, and in the heat of the sedition, hee traterously cried, * Mournt-loy, Mournt-loy, God for vs and our Lord Leuw. Though the * Lord Mayor, a discreet man, earnestly perswaded dutifull behaviours, yet Constance had made the people incapable of good Counsell with his seditious Proclamations, which hee there caused to bee * published. The secret of this conspiracy was * reuealed by another Citizen, and without question was farther spread then the compass of one City, euen as farre as into the heares of all such turbulent people, to whom warre was beneficiall, and quiet banefull. The chiefe Influencer hearing of these matters, with forces assembled, entred * the Tower, whither hee commaunded the principall men of the City to come, who easily put off the blame from themselves vpon Fitz-Arthur. But hee as resolute in his answer, as desperate in the sedition, complained of himselfe in the hearing of all, that hee had done lesse therein then hee ought; yet siterne thousand Markes sterling hee offered for his life, when hee saw the halter about his necke, (for with his Cryer, and his Nephew the next day hee was hanged,) but no price could redeeme him out of the hand of Iustice. It is said, that hee so confidently answered, vpon trust of the Articles and Oath betweene the King and Leuw, that the partakers of Leuw should not be troubled; and that, vpon this occasion, Leuw denied restitution of such things, as the Articles did mention, pretending that Henry had therein broken faith his faith, and thereby made the whole contract frustrate. Execution thus done without noise, or the Londons priuie, the Justice accompanied with Falseslow and his armed troupe, entred London, apprehends such others as were culpable, and for a terror to the rest, cutteth their hands or feet to be cut off, and then set them at liberty. The King deposed the Magistrats, though some write that the tumult was appeased by the Mayor; but when the King found, that onely the * baileff were interceded in the disorder, hee was reconciled to the Citie, having first thus weeded this chiefe Garden of the English Emper, and pluckt vp by the rootes the master bramble.

(15) This dangerous beginning might haue had farre worse proceedings, if the King, though in yeeres tender, yet had not bene so provident, as to haue foreseen it, and so, with patient conuenance at some particular indignities, prentened a publick disquiet. For the Barons, still minding their long desired Liberties, and requiring a confirmation of them by the King, who, at the concluded peace with Leuw had sworn thereto; William Briwere, one of the Kings Councell answered; that the liberties which they demanded ought not to bee observed, because they were violently extorted. But those growing bercepoun, and Archbishoppe Stephen (the Barons ancient abettors) kindling thereto, the young King prudently thrust vp the whole strife with this speech: All of vs haue sworn to these Liberties, and that which we haue sworn, all of vs are bound to observe. His Deed immediately sealed his Word, (for hee saw hee durst doe no other), and Writs were sent forth, to enquire vpon Oathes, what Liberties or free customes were current, in, and from the time of King Henry his Grandfather: by which ad, all mens hopes were raised to expect the full conclusion of all those grievous contentions, which had so long encombered the Kingdom. The like hope was conceaved of better success then before, in terran affaires, vpon newes of the death of King Philip of France, the euer-deadly (and now-dead) enemy of England wefare; which moued the King to send the Archbishoppe of Canterbury, and three other Bishops to Leuw, now crowned King of France, thereto demand the Duchie of Normandy and such other Lands on that side of the sea, as before his departure out of England hee had sworn to restore: but his answer was, I haue held those possessions by aught title, as hee was ready to shew King Henry, if he would come to his Court to make his demand; 2. that the King of England had violated his Oath, for that such as were taken at Lincolne were grievously finis; 3. that such Liberties of England, for which the warre was first moued, hee had bene granted at his departure, and since confirmed by oath, were not easily to be observed, but the aid wished once redoubled, and generally farre worse or dained in their place. With which solutions to their demand, the Ambassadors were faine to returne, and Henry left to come by his owne as hee could.

(16) The king well perceiving, how vnable hee should be either to recover those his Transmarine Dominions, or almost to maintain his owne royall estate at home, as fisch, as by the vntaynes of former times hauing gotten possession of Crowne-lands might still with-hold them, resolved to resume them, by aduise principally of Stephen Archbishop of Canterbury and Robert de Burgh Earle of Kent, who thereby drew vpon themselves no small loads of enuie. Which recovery of such parcels of the royall Patrimony, though it were no lesse needfull then lawfull, yet by reason the interested were so many (and such as wanted no will to torde the whole Kingdom, rather then forgoe their holdings, they wisely vied all the strengths which Religion or humane policy could giue. First therefore a there was procured a Briefe from the Pope, by which both the King was declared to bee at liberty to choofe his owne Councell, and gouerne by himselfe, (which, who doubteth but hee might haue done without the Pope Bull?) and all men commaunded vnder pain of Curses to restore such things as against law and the Kings will, they detained from him. This put the interested into a will to raise Armes; meeting for that purpose at Leicester, where the Cystrian Earle and his * Confederates consult, how they (vnder to in rage of this unexpected revocation, like a braue Roman threw the Popes letters into the fire, yet durst not disclose the Contents. And whereas the message itselfe had bene scanned and sifted to the very branne, both here and in France, and indged to favour of so unswifell an apprehension, as might cause a generall defection from the Church of Rome; the King in presence of his Prelates and Peeres, turned off the Popes contents demand with this thurly answer: I he things which the Pope would perswade us unto, doe breake themselves as farre as the Christian world is wide, and because England is but an Out-Angle thereof, therefore when we see other Kingdomes give us an example, wee shall then finde us the more forward to obey.

(11) That difficultie so avoided; the King was earnestly bent to make a voyage in person to the aide of his brother Earle Richerd, who poisoned the affaires of Gascogne; which through by the late Earle of Sarisbury death it received some maim; yet by the fortitude and counsell of other noble persons, it did still prosper. This intention and desire was staid by the receipt of letters out of France, which declared the Earle his brothers health, and the good successe of affaires. The King (some say) among his Counsellors of State, had one William de Perrepaud a great Astrologer, who foretold that Leuis King of France should not prevaile, and this affirmation did the rather withhold him at that present.

There is who* writes, that King Henry (upon the Popes letters) forbore to attempt any thing in France at that time, lest he should hinder Leuis, who was then upon an enterprize against the remains of the Albigenses in Languedoc, Provence, and the parts about. These men were traduced for Hereticks, and so condemned by the See of Rome; but what their Heresy was,* Fryer (who writes against them,) reports, saying, they were of all other the most pernicious Sect; for antiquity (some holding they were from the Apollis times; for generally, there scarce being any Nation where they are not; and lastly, for shew of piety, in that they live justly before men, and believe all things touching God aright, &c. all the articles of the Creed,* only they blaspheme and hate the Church of Rome. No marvell if this horrible heresy did trouble his Holynes, and therefore, whereas his Predecessor, and himselfe had kept much ado in Christendome, to exorcismen to take the Signe of the Crosse, and warre against the Turkes, (which the Fryers did perswade men unto, teaching, that *whosoever were palliased with any heinous offence, as Parricide,* incest, Sacrilege, &c. was presently acquitted both from the sinne, and the punishment of it. if hee thus take the Crosse upon him,) now, because the Earle of Tholous and his people entertained the forsworn Heretic, the Crosse, and boile warres were by the Pope denounced against them. Of which Earle yet let us heare the iudgement of another* Fryer then lining. These (saith hee) who thus take the warres and Crosse against him, did it more for feare of the French King, and the Popes Legate, then for zeale of iustice; it seemeth to many a wrong about to iustify a faithfull Christian man, and one who with many traies desired the Legate to examine the faith of some one of his Cities, and if any one held against the Crablon libellous, hee would punish him, according to the iudgement of the Church, and if any City should resist him, hee would enforce it to make satisfaction. As for himselfe, hee offered to be examined by the Legate touching his faith, and if hee were faulty, hee would make satisfaction to God and the Church. But all these things the Legate scorned, nor could that Catholike Earle find any fauour, unless hee would forsake his inheritance, and abjure it both for himselfe, and his heires for ever. These were the Heretics against which Leuis was now employed by the Pope, and King Henry the while *commanded to forbear from impeaching his holy enterprize. Wherein Leuis had spent a month in the siege of Amisins, and endured (for all his sacred Crossings) marvellous losses, by a terrible plague destroying his Army by a strange kind of venomous flies, dispatching many, by a ioudaine drowning of a great part of his Armie; and lastly, by being himselfe* poisoned by one of his Earles (an vnchast Riual of his Bedde) though it was given forth of him (as o of his late Enemy King John, whom some thinke that Leuis his friends did make away) that hee died only of a Flux.

(12) The news of the French Kings death seconded with false relations of sundry discontentments, and open factions vnder the young King (who was but* about twelue yeeres of age) bred an hope in King Henry mind, that now the time was come, wherein hee might recover those ancient inheritances which his Forefathers held in France; and to advance his hopes, he had his mother Queene Isabel (wife to the Earle of March in those parts,) an earnest solicitor. Peter Duke of Britaine was the principall man who tooke offence that himselfe had not a chiefe hand in directing the young King Leuis; but his prudent mother Queene *Blanch weakened his party by drawing his brother Robert Earle of Dreux from him; and albeit the Duke had repaired the breach, by affinity with the Earle of Champain, (one of the twelue Peeres of that Realme, to whom the Duke married the Ladie Blonde his daughter and heire,) yet was the Earle driven by a short warre to continue quiet. The Duke hereupon calles himselfe upon King Henry; See for a succession Angles, the English aduerses come forth such Amblus. These and the like inducements moued the King to send Walter Archbischope of Tork, with others to the chiefe men of Normandie, Angou, and Poitou, that by large promises they might procure them to acknowledge Henry for their King, or by persuasions, facilitate their reduction to the English Souerainie; who accordingly profecuted their employment.

(13) These opportunities for that designe, moued the King to bestow how to gather money, to furnish his chargefull an enterprize; whereby while he sought to provide to recover that which was lost, hee manifestly occasion to hazard that which hee had. The only great man in Court now was Hubert de Burgh: For the King professing himselfe of age to gouerne without a Tutor or Protector, did principally confere with him about all his most weightie affaires. Hence grew more enuy against Hubert, and perill to the King. From a the Londoners (besides the granted aides of a sixteenth, which all degrees were subiect vnto) he wrang five thousand Markes, for that they had (as was alleged) to his preiudice, given Leuis the like summe. In the Parliament at Oxford, by aduice of Hubert his Lord Chiefe iustice, hee reuokes the Charters of Liberties, which now for two yeeres had been practised through the Realme; pretending, that at the time of their Grant the King was vnder age, and had then no liberty either of his person or Signature; though otherwise, the royall power of the English Monarchie neuer pleads pupillage or minority. It turned the turne for the time, and all men were faine to pay, what *Huberts pleasure was to assele, for obteining the new Seal. The fortune of such Arts, whereby they were wont to fill Princes Treasuries, was not alwaies without repentance to the Authors, and Authorisers. The Clergie was compelled (vnder paine of Papall Censures) to pay the Fifteenth not only for their temporal goods, but also for their Ecclesiasticall; and yet in the end, (after so much toiling of the People,) the Kings Ambassadors returned out of France, without having effected that which they went about, so that the whole enterprize qualified. For Queene Blanch by sweet and prudent counsell, so preuailed among the factions, that there was left no place for Henry to take fare hold vpon. The Duke of Britaine (who expected the English succours not till the Spring,) was so neerely prest, and almost opprest, with a winter war, that he thought himselfe beholding to his brother that Robert Earle of Drogha, for procuring his price through a wretch with such a condition, as avert after, left upon him, the by-name of Maulwurf or Mole-dog. He acknowledged the Duties of Britain to be the Eye of the Crown of France, and that by right it ought to hold thereof; this acknowledgment, being against all apparent truth and Record, procured to him that by-name. Such conclusion at this present had King Henric French defendants. Our ancient Authors write, that this dishonourable bondage was done long after, and with an halter about his necke, at such time as the King of England refused to goe in perieus to his succours, but offered Four Earles, and other competent Forces, which he refused by harbouring a revolt in his boosome, and turned Pirate.

(24) The coill will which the other great Lords secretly harboured against Hubert, (whose Enemy the Kings favour is) creating him Earle of Kent had lately encreased, now openly discovered it kille, upon this occasion. Richard Earle of Cornwall, the Kings brother, (lately returned with honor out of Gwynedd) had seized into his hands a certaine Manour, then in the tenure of one Walter a Dulen Gentleman, (to whom King Jehan, for his good services had formerly given it,) which hee alleged was parcel of his Earldome of Cornwall. The King hereupon directs his letters to his brother, commanding him to come immediately and take a reuision of his said He due do, and without any pleaders helpe defended, as ill the feisure which he had made, concluding among other words, that hee was ready to stand to the iudgement of the Kings Court, and Peeres of the Realm. When the King, and the Chief Iusticiar heard him name the Peeres of the Realm, they (suspecting his bent that way) were exceedingly offended; and (said the King) either restore the Manour to Walter, or thou shalt depart out of the Kingdom, never to returne: at which peremptory sentence, the Earle boldly (but too rashly) answered; that hee neither would give his right to Walter, nor without the iudgement of the Peeres depart the Realm. The Earle in this heat returns to his lodging; thence (vpon surmise that Hubert had perswaded the King to lay hold on him) he posteth to Marleborough, where finding William Marleborough the young Earle of Pembroke, hee enters into a full confederacy, ratified by oath; and Ranulf Earle of Chester is easily drawn to make another. Letters thence flying about to all their friends, at Stanford there assembled vnto them, the Earles of Glooucester, of Warren, of Hereford and Warwick, Earle Ferrers, many Barons, and an huge multitude of armed men. Their strengthes being in likely hood able to beat out their darings, they address a bold message to the King, by which they require him in the very Palace, to make preſent criminal to his Fathers for the wrong he had done; the ſlands whereof they imputed not to him, but to the chief ſuitor; and that if he did not without delay reſtore the Charters of Liberties, which he had cancelled at Oxford, they would drive him by dint of ſword to give them ſterner competent ſatisfaction. The King ſeem't it no ſafe time to deny their requests, appoints to meet at Northampton in Auguſt next; where the Earle of Cornwall upon his ſolicite reſolute demand of the King, had large arrears of any injury ſuſtain-ed, his Patrimony being augmented with large acceſſions. The moderation and equanimity of the King (terrified by his Fathers example) peaceably finiſhed this contention (the matter of the Charters being for the time buſied at ſome) which might otherwiſe have coſt many thouſand lives, and have hazarded the ruine both of King and kingdom.

lending through a great wood of* hucicaiges long, that traualterly ordinarily there spoiled might paine more safely. The Welsh not suffering that waile, violently assailed the Workemen, and not without slaughter on both sides, drave them into the Cobble; which drew the King (who euen in little matters vied to make one) to comethither in person, who, with a competent strength, glues not out, till hee had with fire, and other force, consumed the whole Forrest. From whence hee peireth farther into Wales, and consumes with fire a place called * Cradley, where whiles the King is building a Casse to bridle them, * Llewelin drew thither his forces, where many were slaine on both sides, and a man of speciall worth William de* Brause (or de Bruse) by the Welsh intercepted, as he went to forrage in the Country; * many great persons there in the Kings Army being severely confederated with Llewelin. By which trecherous practise, victualles grew so scarce, that the king was compelled to yield to a very dishonourable peace, the conditions whereof were: that the King should raze to the ground the new fort now almost finished; that * William de Bruse should sell remayne Prisoner till the Welsh thought good, that Llewelin should give the King toward his expenses three thousand Markes.

(36) These home-bredde garboyles thus appeared, whereas Ambassadors had formerly repayred to the king out of Galesne, Fainne, and Normandie, to offer him their services for recovery of thole his inheritances if himself would com in perion with a royall Armie, hee about Aethelstan is now ready at Perisburg for the exploit; whether all his Nobles were come with so greata multitude, nonely out of England, but out of Ireland, Wales and Gallerye, as none of his ancessors ever had. Many ere the motives which encouraged the king to this attempt, but none greater then the basic workings of Queen Dorothea his mother. Lewis king of France had created his brother Aimlie Duke of Poitoun, commanding the Lords of that Country to doe their homages to him; one of these was Hugh Earle of March now husband to Queene Isobel, who because shee had once bene the Wife of a King, and now the Mother, disdained that euen her presint husband, though but an Earle, should doe homage to a Schallie, and thereby her Earlie (bearing the stile of a Queene) seeme inferioriour to the Lady tane, wife of Duke Aimlie. The Earle was therupon sworne to a refusal of homage; and the like spirit thes had breathed into the heates of the princely family of Lefauan, whose Ancessors had been Kings of Ierusalem and Cyprus. Norr then contented to haue plotted a party, for her Sonne among the French, he is charged to haue fought by payloia to make riddance of Lewis himselfe, and that her Agents for that purpose were discovered, and executed. But Aimlie shall pardon vs, if we herein crite not his iudgement, as also in thinking her the Author of labouring Affaires to murder the King; for that we find him singular therein, the * recieued opinion being, that they were first vnder-hand by the Surceases out of Affaire, to take away the daunger which they forelaw was comming, in regard King Lewis was too deuoutly addicted to Chriatian piety, and the hatred of Mahomets Infidelity. There were also at the same time great Divisions among the French Nobility; but the English (saith Aimlie himselfe) wrought not by treachery, but after the manner of faire warre, which they first by defiance denounced, and then did openly prosecute with sword in hand.

(27) The King of England being thus provided of men, munition, and other necessities fitt for the field, and now ready to embarke: there was not shipping sufficient to transport halfe the Company. Which enraged the King so farre, that turning himselfe to Earle Stubbs, (upon whom hee charged the blame) he called him vaine old Traitor, affirming, that hee had of purpose benee flake herein, as in other things, in regard of five thousand Marks, with which the Queene Dowager of France had (as he said) embroiled him, and withall ranne at him in great fury with his drawne sword, but Ranulph Earle of Chester and others stept betweene, and saved the King from so foule a blemish, who loone after receiued him into grace againe. But that assembly was dispersed by the arrival of a great man out of Britaine, a principal confederate with the English against Lewis, who shewed the vnreasonable time of the yeare, and other reasons; and the enterprize thereupon adiuined to the Spring. So after Easter hee transports from Portsmouth with a full Armie into Britaine.

The same day in which hee set saile from England, himselfe did in person, visite the poore and feeble, and dealt large Almes, not refusing to kisse the sick and leprous. The success of this voyage is so diuerly reported, that without prejudice to an obseruant Reader, it might be all left out. Much certainly was not done. The King of England purpose was to haue marched through Britaine (where many receiued him) into Paillais; and as some write hee did so, and tooke homage in Galesaigne. To emperch this passage, the King of France lay with a great Armie at Angiers, and the King of England at Nantes in Britaine, expecting the repaire of more force. Fulk Paynalen noble Norman, with about sixty valiant Knights perswaded the King of England, it was easie for him to reduce Normandie to his obedience; but Habert de Burgh diuerted the King from acceptance of that enterprize. The Normans therefore made an ill journey and an vn lucky, for they pleased not with King Henry, and for their conspiracy were distressed at home by King Lewis. But whether it were by losse in battle (wherein, if any battle were at all, some say the French had the better, taking about foure thousand of the English,) or otherwise, this is agreeed on, that after the walk of infinite Treasures, and the great diminution of his numbers, the King of England returned without accomplishment of his purpose; leaving for the defence of Britaine, the three great Earles of Chester, Pembroke and Arundell, with forces answerable.

(28.) It is not vnlike that the dangerous rebellion of the Irish halloed his returne; for the King of Connaught and his Irish, seeing the King and the Earle of Pembroke (who as Heire to the great Strangleham had goodly possessions in those parts) whole embroiled in the enterprize of Britaine, had invaded the Kings people, with a purpose and bope, veterlie to expell and amoue out Nation from among them: but their deuiles proued mischieuous to themselves, that rebellious King himselfe being taken Prisoner, not without the losse of many thousands of the Irish. The Irish also loone after brake out againe, whose Prince Lorenus, in reuenge of those Irishmen heads, which Habert de Burgh had cruelly caused to be stricken off in cold blood, and presented to the King, had burnt certaine Churches and Gentlewomen in them; for which, at Oxford in the presence of the King, all the Nobility, and Clergy, hee was solemnly excommunicated: and the King there gathering a great Army, in person went to repress the Irish, though not without losse.

(29.) Another Garboyle thereafter no lesse disturbed the whole Land, the Insulency of the Romans (who were charged to haue wrought innumerable confusion and infinite grieuances to the King, his Kingdom, Peeres and People) stirring vp multitudes through the Land, by a common consent, to seek by force to shake off the importable yoke of their oppressions. It was alledg'd by these reformers, that they had vnder hand the Kings Letters Patents, the Lord Chief Iustice assent, the Bishop of *London*s countenance, and the Sheriffes aide in sundry Shires, whereby the armed troopes rook heart euery where, violently to seize on the Romans Corne, and their other wealths which booties they employed to good purposes, and for reliefe of the poore, the Romans the while biding their heades, for feare of looting them. And though the King, on the Popes complaint thereof, seemed to milike the outrage, yet had the King himselfe no lesse cause to bee moued with the insulency of the Pope, then were his Subjects of those Popelings. For that very time the See of Canterbury being void, Ralph Nevill Bishop of Norwich was elected by the Monks, and gladly approved by the King, whose most faithfull Chancellor hee was, an vnshaken pillar of truth, doing right to all without delages, especially to the poore, without declining to the right hand or the left. But the Pope being told he was a Royalist and one that would iure with the King and whole Kingdom (who were all struggling to shake off the Popes seruitude) and would to the death stick to that law and those Appeals, which Stephen Langton solemnly before the Altar in Saint Pauls Church urged against King Iohn (whom hee to the See of Rome, his Election (as being a person very dangerous) was perfectly pronounced void. Whereupon the Monks choos'd a second, and him the Pope misliked, for being too old, and losit spiritied, then a third was elected, a man of eminent learning, a Student in the Vniuersity of Oxford, and him also the Pope reiect'd, never resting till they had chosen Edmond of Abington, a man more pleasing to the Romane palate. But the King seeing the Great Emperor Friederick, even this very time whiles hee was winning the Kingdom of Ierusalem from Infidels, so Turkishly in his absence depouled from his owne Empire by the Pope, vpon a priuate spleene; no more able, if in this his vnripe age, and distracted government, hee feared to draw on himselfe by any opposition, so mercilesse an enemy. So that for the time these indignities were winked at in these parts in France also by the wisdom of Queen Blanch, and mediation of the Archbishops of Reims, and Philip Earle of Boulens of one part, and the Earles of Britaine and Chester on the other, a three yeeres cessation from mutual hostilities was ratified by oath, betwene the French and English.

(30.) Habert de Burgh Earle of Kent, Chief Iustifier of England, hauing with few rubbes hitherto, enjoyed the most inward loue and fauour of well of this King, as of King Iohn, seemes now to haue run the Stage of his best fortunes. For the King (vpon occasion of such inrodes and spoiles, as the Prince Lewins continually made in the Marches of Wales) being advertised by Peter Bishop of Winchester, and certaine other of the Councell, once for all to giue an end to those braues and insolencies of the Welsh, complained; that hee was not able in regard of his want; saying, that his Treasurers told him, all the rents of his Exchequer would doe no more then scarce maintaine apparrell, houshold and ordinary Almes-deeds. This was not vnknowne to the Bishop, and the rest of that faction, who watched this opportunity of purpose to lift the Earle of Kent out of fauour: wherefore they boldly answered the King; that if he were poore hee might thanke himselfe, who gave away to others such Honours, Castles, and Dignities, as were vacant, alienating them from his estate, that hee was worthy to be called a King in name, rather then for any riches which hee had; that his Ancestors, magnificent Princes, abounding in all sorts of worldly glorie, and wealth, heaped to themselves innumerable treasures, out of no other means, but the Bents and Profites of the Kingdom.

(31.) The King stung with this iust reprehension, beganne (by their instructions) to call the Sheriffes of Shires, Baylives, and other his Officers to a straie account, for all such recites, as appertained to the Exchequer, thrusting some out of their places, and wringing out of all their full sponges, store of coine, till hee satisfied himselfe both for the arrerages and interest. Out of Ralph Briton a Treasurer of his Chamber hee drew a thousand pounds, and in the 12th. Statute.

and also path him from his place, into which (by the Bishoppe of Winchester suggestion, who now predominated in Conrey) hee substituted Peter de Cornhill a * Feilstone, the Bishoppes * Nephew or Sonne, if Paris say true; and forsooth hee, the Kings suffers otherwise empty and leave, were by these means shifted againe, though not to their full surfeit. For these were but preparatives to a further intestine and raskie, intended against the Earle of Kent, whom (upon the * Bishoppes suggestion) the King removed from the * Protectorship (or high office of his Chiefe Justice) and put in his place Sir Stephen Seagrave a Kent onely in name. Then a strict and capacious account demanded of the Earle of Kent, for all such things as he was in any sort chargeable with; as, 1. For such receipts or debts, as were due to King John, or to this King Henry himselfe; 2. For the meane profits of such lands, as the King was seized of, from the day of the death of the first great William, Earle of Pembroke, his Justiciar and Marshall, whither those lands were in England, Wales, Ireland, or Patrimony; 3. For such Liberties or free Customes which the King had in Forrests, Warrens, Counties and else where, and how they were kept or alienated. 4. For such things as the King lost by Huberts negligence; 5. For the wronges and damages offered to the Romanes, and Italian Clerks, and to the Popes Nuncios against the Kings will by authority of Hubert, who would take no order to correct the misdoers, as by vertue and nature of his place hee was obliged; 6. For the many excoages comming by Carruages, gifts and presents, or for the rents of Custodies belonging to the Crowne.

(32) To all which heades, the Earle answered, that hee had the Charter of the Kings Father, by which hee was freed from giuing any account eyther for things passed, or to come, and that hee had giuen such proofe of his fidelity unto King John, as he would not chuse to beare him make an account. Peter Bishoppe of Winchester replyed hereunto, that such a Charter after the death of King John had no force, and therefore the Fathers Charter, and ground of Privilege, was no reason why he should not stand accountable to the Sonne. This defence for money dangers in this sort trueried or auoyded, they labored to draw him in for his head, by charging him with sundry Articles sounding treasonable; as, 1. That Hubert had disswayed the Duke of Austria from matching his Daughter with the King who sought it; 2. that he had hindered the King from entering vpon forraign lands to him belonging, whereby the King, Peeres, and People conuulsed their Treasures vainly; 3. that hee had enticed the Daughter of the King of Scots (whom King John had entruisted to his custody, meaning himselfe to marry her) & traitorously defiled the noble young Lady, whom he married in hope to be King of Scotland in her right, if shee survived her Brother; 4. that hee had done out of his leuel-houle a precious stone of wonderful value, whose vertue was to make him who had it, invincible in Battle, & that he gaue that stone to Llewellyn prince of Wales, the Kings enemy; 5. that he by his letters had caused Llewellyn to hang William de Breuse.

sations (insuouring of much malignity) round about, vpon hopes to oppress & bury Hubert vnder them for euer; as, 1. that hee had poisoned the two noble Barres of Salisbury and Pembroke; 2. that hee had also procured Falsburgh de Brent, and Richard Archbishop of Canterbury to be made away; 3. that by Sorceries and Enchantments, hee had deuene the King to fauour him e-bow all other; 4. that in the willow gotten against the French by Sea, hee sweetly took many Prisoners from the Kings Soldiers, and made his benefite of their ransom, contrary to right, and that hee had spoiled and dispossessed many; 5. that hee had without trauell vniuently put to death Constantine, for which offence the Citizens of London required iustice against the said Hubert. The King hereupon makes Proclamation through the City, that all such as could charge Hubert with any wrong, should repaire to Court, and there receive immediate redrefe. This strange course of proceeding did so appale and terrifie the Earle, that hee forthwith fled to the Priore Church of Merton in Surrey, where among the Chanons, hee sheltered his head for a time.

(34) The King with his Prelates and Peeres meeting at Lambeth, at the * day appointed for Huberts answer, hee (being made to beleue that the King would put him to a most foule death) durst not appeare, or peepe forth of his sacred temple. The Londons were assembled in Armes (by the Kings command) to the number of about twenty thousand vnder banners displayed to dragger the Earle out of Sanctuary: but vpon the Earle of Cheshires wisser Counsell, the prey was taken out of the hands of a blondy multitude (who mortally hated him for Constantines death) and they returned againe to their City. The Archbishoppe of Dublin still performing the office of a true friend, ouerslips not this occasion, and by his importunke obtayned day for Hubert, till about Twelfe-oide then next ensuing, and the King for his allowance, during the Interim, giues him letters Patent, Hubert thinking himselfe secure for the present, is now vpon his way toward his wife at the Abbey of Saint Edmund in Suffolke, but his enemies so prevailed by their suggestions, that Sir Godfrey de Cauxemb Knight, with three hundred armed men, was sent to apprehend the Earle in Exile. Hee having intelligence of their approach, fledde into a Chappell at * Brentwood, which adioyned to his lodging, from whence those rough Souldiers haled him (hee holding in one * hand a Crucifix, and in the other the Sacrament) and sent for a Smith to make for him shackles of yron. But when the Smith vnderstood, that it was for Hubert de Burgh Earle of Kent, he refused, vntill such words (if Mathew Paris doe not Poetize) as did well shew that honourable thoughts are sometimes found in the hearts of men, whose fortunes are farr from honour, for hauing first drawne a deepe sigh, hee said; * Dee with mee what wee please, and God haue mercy on my soule but at first as the Lord saith, *I will neuer make yron shackles for him, but will rather let the worst death that is. For is not this that most loyal and courageous Hubert, who so often hath preferred England from being destroyed by strangers, to reuend England to England? Hee who faithfully and constantly served his Sovereigne Lord King John in Gasconie, Normandy, and else where, that he was compelled to eate the flesh of hisse, whose high courage even Enemies admired; hee, that so long defended Dover Castle, the Key of England, against all the exquisite forces of the French, and by vanquishing them at Sea, brought safety to the Kingdome? What need I rehearse his excellent deuias at Lincolne and Bedford? Let God be iudge between him and you, for seeing him so vniuently and inhumane, repaying good with euill, nay requiring his most excellent deserts with the worst recompence that can be.* But Sir Godfrey, and his blacke band regarded not such speeches, but otherwise binding the Earle hard, they let him on horse-backe, and so conuayed him to the Tower of London.

(35) This breach of Sanctuary being made known to Roger Bishoppe of London (whose Diocesse it was) he confidently tells the King, that if the Earle were not reformed to the Chappell, hee would excommunicate all the Authors of that outrage. The Earle is accordingly reformed: but the Sherifves of Essex and Hereford, as the Kings commandment, with the powers of their counties besiege the Chappell so long, that at last (they having cut a Trench about it that none might goe in or out) the Earle was compelled to come forth and render himselfe, bearing all things with an equall mind, as one that had a clear conscience before God, which hee professed to haue. While the Chappell was thus beset round, the Kings indignation was so violent, that hee forbade all men once to make mention of Hubert in his hearing. No man durst then if it bee said, that the Princes indignation is death. The Archbishoppe of Dublin neuertheless was not dejected, but with prayers and teares besought the King, who remained as yet inexorable, Huberts enemies possessing his soule and senses. Hubert therefore being imprisoned in the Tower. There was no sacrifice as it seemed could appease the Kings ire, but that of the Earles Hoord of gold, and other riches, which the Knights Templars had in their custodie vpon trust, & without Huberts consent refused to deliuer. Hubert therefore willingly yeelds; which when the Depu- ties did giue vp, the value seemed incredible. This hoarding perhaps was Huberts crime, whereof being thus purged, he had hope to recouer out of these deadly pangis and consultations of fortune, and him- selfe to bee made capable of curing. Well, the king obtains this precious booty, but his enemies would haue his blood also; saying, that hee was convicted of theft and fraud, it was meet he should die a most shame- full death. It seemes, they thought, that the vertie finding of so much treasure was a consuetion of fraud in the getting, and that the King must bee interpreted to haue lost, whatsoever the Earle had gained. But the displeasure of the King was mollified with this golden baine, for hee answered them thus; Hubert from his childhood hath (as I haue heard) faithfully enough serued my uncle King Richard, and my Father King Iohn, and if hee haue done ill towards me, hee shall neuer therefore die an unright death. For I had rather be reputed a foolish or a negligent King, then a cruel Tyrant, or a bloody man towards him, who hath long serued mee and mine ancestors; nor will I weigh more his euill deedes, which are not as yet manifest, nor giue trace, then all his good deeds, which are plaine- ly knowne to the Realme, and to us all. Hereupon Hubert had all such lands granted vnto him, as eyther King Iohn had giuen, or himselfe had purchased. There undertooke for him to the King (as forreins) the Earles of Cornwall, and Warren, Marshal & Ferrars, and himselfe was committed to the Castle of Denford, there to abide in free Prison, vnder the Custodie of foure Knights, belonging each of them to one of these foure Earles. This Court-scene thus in part ouerblowne, let vs take our standings, to view what other weather followed, and what countenance of things in this Kingdome did next present it selfe to the world.

haue praied redresse for these abuses, were interrup- ted, and put off by the Bishoppe of Winchester. Among them who were removed from their places in Court, was one Sir William de Redone a Knight, and Deputy Marshall to Richard Earle of Pembroke. This was to the Earle very displeasing, which ioyned with a consideration of the publike cause and danger, he associates vnto him certaine of the great Lords (as was the fashion of those Lording times, vpon every discontent,) and in the Company of them aduanceth confidently to the King, whom in the hearing of many hee retrioueth; for that hee had, through his- ter aduise, called in the Poitounes, to the oppression of the Realme, of his natural subiects, of their Lawes and Liberties: humble therefore hee beseecheth him that hee would graciously reforme such abuses, which threatened the amiable subiects both of the Crowne and Kingdome: which if hee did not, himselfe and other Lords, would so long withdraw their attendance, as hee enter- tained strangers. The Bishoppe herewith makes answer, I hat the King might well and lawfully call in what strangers himselfe thought good, for the defence of the Crowne and Realme, and such, and so many of them, as might be able to compell his proud and rebellious people to due obedience. When the Oracle would speake no otherwise, they departed from Court greatly discontented, firmly promising one to the other, that in such a cause which did so touch them all, they would like men stand together while anie breath was in their bodies.

(37) Those who were now most potent about the King, nothing sorry for the discontentment of so great a Peere as the Earle Marshall, but counten- ing it a part of their strength, to vie the regall power toward the weakening of the English, nourish in the King his assertion. The minds of men sufficientlie inclining of themselves, to doubt the worst vpon such diuisions, that their feare increased by findee prodigies of strange thunders and raines, but especially of foure redde P arabolles (or resemblances of the Sunne) besides the Sunne it selfe, (appearing a- bout the parts of Hereford and Worcester) from morn- ing till night in the Skies: and indeed much trouble immediately ensued aswell in England as Wales, & Ireland. The Poitounes, and other Strangers thus bearing the sway, so as the Kings person went guard- ed with troups of such, the Earles and Barons being by the Kings command summoned to ano- ther Parliament at Oxford, refused to come. While the King was there, one Robert Bacon, who vied there to preach before the King and Prelates, freelic told him, that if hee did not remove from him Peter Bishoppe of Winchester, and Peter de Rualis, he could neuer be so quiet. The King did hereupon a little come to himselfe, & Roger Bacon a Clergy-man also of a pleasant wit, did second Roberts aduise, telling the King that Petra and Asper were most dangerous things as sea, alluding to the Bishops name, Petrus de Ru- pibus. The King therefor (as hee had the happines in his mutability, to change for his more security) taking that good aduise of Schollers, which hee would not of his Peeres, summons a Parliament to be holden at Westminster, giving the world to know with- all, that his purpose was to amend by their aduise, whatsoener ought to be amended.

(38) But the Barons, considering that still there arrived sundry strangers, men of waite with Horie and Armour, and not trusting the Poitounes faith, came not, but presumed to fend this traitorous mes- sage to the king, that if out of haud hee reman- ed not Peter Bishop of Winchester, and the Poitounes out of his Court, they all of them, by the common assent of the kingdom, would drive him & his wicked Counsellors to- gether out of it, and consule about creating a new Souer- eign. The king (whom his fathers example made more timorous,) could easily haue bene drawne, to haue redeemed the loue of his natural Liegemen, with the disgrace of a few strangers; but the Bishoppe of Winchester and his friends infused more spirit into him. Whereon, to all those whom he suspected, the King lets downe a day, within which they should deliver sufficient pledges to secure him of their loyalty. Against that day the Lords in great numbers make repair to London, but the Earle Marshall (admonished of danger, by his sister the Countesse of Cornwall) flies backe to Wales, and chiefly for want of his * preference nothing was concluded. The King not long after is in Gloster with an Armie, whither the Earle and his adherents required to come, refused, the King therefore burns their Mannors, and gives away their inheritances to the Peiſannes.

(19) This Rebellion had not many great names in it, but took strength rather by weight then number: the known Actors were the Earle Marshall, the Lord Gilbert Bassi, and many other of the inferior Nobles. The Bishoppes Arts had pluckt from him, the Kings Brother, and the two Earles of Chester and Lincoln, (who dishonourably sold their love * for a thousand Markes), and otherwise, as it seemed, secured the rest: nevertheless, these may well be thought, not to have borne any ruall will to their now forsaken confederate, the Earle Marshall, who took himselfe to handle the common cause; certainly hee handled his owne safety but ill, as the event shall demonstrate. The Earle hearing these things, contracts strict amity with Lewelin Prince of Wales; whose powers thus knit together, by advantages of the Mountains, were able to counterpoize any ordinary invasion. To the Kings aide, Baldwin de Giffart with many Souldiers came out of Flanders. The King now at Hereford in the midst of his Forces, sends from thence (by Winchester councill) the Bishopp of Saint Dunle, to desire the Earle Marshall; how farre faster this word descends it selfe, sure it seems that the Earle hereupon vnderstoode himselfe discharged of that obligation, by which hee was tied vnto the King, and freed to make his defence. The King notwithstanding after some small attempts and better considerations, did promise and assure, that by advice of his Councell all that was amiss should (at a * day appointed) be rectified and amended. About which time, Habers de Burgo, having intelligence that the Bishopp of Winchester (who was a Peiſanne) plotted his death, clapped out of the Castle of Devizes (where he was prisoner) to a neighbour Church, but was halld from thence by the Castell-keeper. The Bishopp of Sarum (in whole Diocesse it happened) caused him to be safe restored to the same place, from whence by the Earle Marshall and a * troupe of armed men his friends, hee was rescued and carried into Wales.

(40) The King, at the day and place appointed, holds his great Councell or conference with the Lords; but nothing followed for the peace of the Realme; it was not an ordinary passage of speech, which hapned there betweene the Lords, and the Bishopp of Winchester. For, when the English Bishoppes and Barons humbly besought the King, for the honour of Almighty God to take into grace his naturall Subjects, whom without any trial by their Peeres hee called Traitors: the Bishopp (offended it seems, at Peeres) takes the words out of the Kings mouth, and answers: That there are not Peeres in England, as in the Realme of France, and that therefore the King of England, by such officers as himselfe pleases to ordaine, may punish offenders out of the Realme, and by iudiciall process can condemn them. The English Bishoppes relished his speech so harshly, that with one voice they threatened to excommunicate and curse by name the Kings principall wicked Counsellors; but Winchester appealed, then they accused all as alienated the heart of the king from his naturall Subjects, and all others that perturbed the peace of the Realme.

(41) The Earle Marshall, this while had by force retuned a Castle, which he had a little before surrendered to the King, which stirred the King to gather his forces at Gloucester, and thence to aduance towards Wales. But the Earle had pollicly barred the Country of all Provisions for man and beast, that the King was faine to strike aside to Gloucester Castle, where the Earle, with his Confederates and the power of Wales, at awaited their time, that assailing the Kings Campe unawares, there were taken about five hundred horse, with the Sumpers, riches, and carriages of the Armeys upon which Ioffe (his men also greatly scattered) the King leauing * two noble Gentlemen with the Peiſannes, to make good the Marches against the Welsh, returned more empty and inglorious then before. The Earle found them worke, whom the King had left behind; and (as hee was a man of no lesse courage then deepe witte, y^e whereas Baldwin de Giffart (the valiant French knight) with a thousand Horsemen, thought to haue surprized him, who hauing but a tenth part of that number, came to view the Castle of Monmouth, the Earle alone defended himselfe against twelue of his enemies; and when his horse was cowardly slain by them, hee pitched one of them by the legge out of the Saddle, and leapt into it himselfe, neuer giuing ground till his Arme came to the rescue, and obtained a faire victorie, with the slaughter and captiuitie of many Peiſannes and others. His other exploits in and about Wales, were not lew nor valourant; it was not onely in this, (as what indeed could be more glorious or valourous to a noble mind) for that his Soueraigne was upon the contrary side.

(42) The King about this time, to strengthen his life and State, with the prayers of Benefactors, and other deuoted affections, founded the * house of Canons, where such as forsooke the Iudiciall Superstitions, had provisions for maintenance vnder a sober rule and rule; he also erected and endowed a famous Hospital at Oxford, both for the entertainment of Forrainers and Pilgrims, (who thither much frequented,) and for reliefe also of such as were diseased: So that Lewelin Prince of Wales, (the Earles chiefe Confederat) when hee was threatened fore, if hee would not live in quiet, did not speake more magnificently of charity, then honourably of the King, I were faine (quoeth) hee the Almesdeans wherby the King death, then all the men of warre which hee hath, and the whole Clergy, put together.

(43) The Earle Marshall encreasing in strength and haured against such as were the Kings reputed Seducers, makes spoile and booty on their possessions, and joyning with the power of Leuins, puts all to fire and sword, as farre as Gloucester, part wherof they burnt at Abbe, and lacke the residue. The * King then at Gloster for want of sufficient Forces, departed thence (greatly grieved) to Winchester, abandoning those other parts as it were to wast and ruine. It therefore seemes, that hee was not growne stronger or richer, by the displacing of Hubert Earle of Kent, and the rest, and by taking new into their roomes, who commonly bite and sucke hard till they haue glazted themselves, of as bad life there be any lasciuie in auarice; whereas the old officers, hauing provided in afort for the maine chance, haue the lesse reason to be grieuous.

(44) Therefore the Lions skin not being large enough for the Bishopp of Winchester, and his factious purposes, they place them one with the Foxes case; an inevitable straitage is devised. The Earle Marshall had in Ireland all the ample Patrimonies of his Grandfather, the famous Strongbow. To make that member of his strengthes improfishable, if not also pernicious, they deuise certain letters directed to Maurice Fitz-Gerald (Deputie Iustice of Ireland) and other principall men, who held of the Earle. In them they ignifie, that Richard, once Marshall to the King of England, was for many treason by the iudgement of the Kings Court, beheaded the Rebelle, his Lands, townes and Townements consumed with fire; other his Hereditaments destroyed, and himselfe for ever disinherited; that if upon his coming thither, they should take him either alive or dead, the King did give them all the Earles lands there, which were forfeited by virtue of his Attainre; and so a promise that the said gift should continue firme and good, they, by whose advice the King and Kingdome were governed, faithfully undertooke. To these letters (which the Monkes call bloody) they caused the King to set his Seale, as they themselves also (being eleven) did theirs; upon receipte of which lines, the parties signified backe under the seale of fire, that if the Contents of those letters were confirmed by the Kings Letters Patents, they would performe that which was desired. The Letters patentes bee made accordingly, and having fraudulently gotten the Great Seale from Hugh Bishop of Chichester, Lord Chancellor, who knew not thereof, they make them authentike with the impression.

(45) The Kings mind therefore being still exacerated towards the Earle Matthias, hee grievously charged Alexander Bishoppe of Chichester, that he had too much familiarity with the Earle, affirming that they sought to thrust him from his throne; the Bishop to clear himselfe from his haunces a scandall, puts on his Episcopall habite, and solemnly pronounceth all those accurs, who did but imagine a wicked heart of so foule a nature, against the Maesty or person of the King; and thereupon by the intercession of other Prelates, hee was received into grace. The King was then at Westminster, where Edmund the Arch Bishop of Canterbury cleave with other his Suffragan Bishopps, bewailing the estate of the kingdome, present themselves before him, telling him, as his loyall Liegemen, (46) Nothing had hitherto preferred the King more, then that hee could, without great griefe forgoe any favourites, if bee were needily pricked; the contrary quality whereof hath bene the cause of small defolation to so many Princes. For albeit the choice of Counsellors ought to bee free, yet by common incident, they should bee good; or howsoever they are, or are not, it is madnesse to hazard a Crowne, or leese the love of an whole Nation, rather then to relinquish or diminish a particular dependant. The riches of amity ought nevertheless to remaine insoluble, but in such distance, that the publike be not perverted, nor incurred for a private. The King therefore, in this point not vniotunate, commanded Bishop Peter to betake himselfe to his residence at Wynton, without once meddling in affaires of State; but against Peter Rasset his Treasurer, hee was so vehement, that hee swore, bee would plucke out his eyes, were it not for reverence of holy Orders; commanding also their Fai-Flamers to depart the Reine, never to see his face more.

(47) Then are the Arch Bishop of Canterbury with the Bishopps of Chichester and Bath sent into Wales to pacifie things there. But the incombible Earle Matthias had now cross the Seas into Ireland, to take revenge for the spoiles and disaffaires, which his hired enemies had made in his lands thereby whole plices, according to that secret agreement, hee was finally taken, and died of a wound given him in the backe, as hee with admirable manhood defended himselfe. His Body was buried in Kilmerie, (which pleasantly situated Towne our Sovereigne, King James erected into a City,) where himselfe in his life had appointed, in the Oratorie of the Minerites: in which Towne, yet some small tokens of this great name are remaining; for in the East window of the Abbey Church of S. John Baptist, and in the Abbey of S. Dunwich, the ancient Armouries of Matthias, Lord of Kilmerie, are yet extant. The Patrimony of this Earle was shared by the Contractors according to the purport of the Letters patentes: but when the King heard of his death, hee to the wonder of all that were by) brake forth into teares, bewailing the losse of so brave a Knight, affirming that hee had left no Peere behind him in the Kingdome. A blessed King, faith Pieris to love even those who had offended him.

(48) The Arch Bishoppe of Canterbury with the other Bishopps, repaired to the King at Gloucester, upon their returne from Leoline Prince of Wales, who pretended hee could not concinde, till the King had received into grace such of the banished Nobility, with whom himselfe had bene confederated during the late displeasures. The King thereupon moved with Pity, sends forth his Proclamations, that all such as were outlawed or profcribed, should bee at Gloucester upon a certaine day, there to be received into the Kings favour againe, and to have restitution of their inheritances; but lest they might suspect any evill measure, it was ordered that they should bee in the Churches protection, and come under the safe-conduct of the Arch Bishoppe and the other Prelates. Thither at the time and place limited doth Hubert de Burgo Earle of Kent and lately chiefe Justiciar of England repaire; upon whom, by mediation of the Bishopps, the compassionate King looks graciously, receiving him in his Armes with the kisse of peace; in like sort was the Lord Gilbert Rasset, and all others of that fellowship, received into favour, their severall livings and rights fully restored; and both Hubert and Rasset admitted to bee of his Council. And, that nothing might bee wanting to make the joy vniuersall; Gilbert, Brother to the late Earle Matthias, had the whole Earldome conferred upon him with all the lands and rights thereof whereofsoever, notwithstanding the foresaid treacherous conveyance, whom also the King made Knight at Wynter, and delivered into his hands the to bee expended in the generall services of the Kingdome, as occasion required; so that if the King failed to performe his duty, every man should have backe what hee had disbursed. One great and ordinary cause of warre, seemed now taken away, for that Leoline (who had first taken homage of all his owne Barons) did voluntarily yeeld to hold his whole Principality of the Kings of England, moved thereunto (though with much mislike of the Welsh) to strengthen himselfe against his son Gryffin, who greatly infected him, being also assailed with a pallie.

(17) There is in Mathew Paris much complaint of the State of England at this time, which by the Kings flexibility (saith he) was become the ordinary prey, sometime of one sort of strangers, and sometime of another, Poitovains, Italians, Alemaines, and Provincians. Indeed the Gensin, and common humour of a Nation, is not easily alterable: and our Misfortune (or rather our Strangers) was no new quality, for Horace noted it before our Christs birth: and Englishmen can hardly see when they are well to keepe them so. But no kind of Strangers at that time more infected England (saith out Monk) then the Romans, of which here Iwarmed three forces, Purses, which were the Popes Merchants, Italian Clerks, most vile and illiterate persons, which armed with the Popes Bullies possessed themselves (against all right of Priviledges) of spiritual revenues, and if any withstood them, they were by the Popes curse warrent excommunicated; lastly, the Farmers and Practisers for the Romans, who commonly serping together whatsoeuer was of price in the Land, sent it over Sea to the Masteries, who there lived on deliciousnes in the Farming of land that was crucified, and in pride on other mens goods. In somuch, that holy men with heart-breaking, teares, and deadly groans, protested it was better for them to die, then to see these miseries on their Nation and holy men. So that the daughter of Simon was become like an impudent Harlot. And as these Papall Engines drew here in England, so did they with others: at Rome, the Governours of that Church not seeking to winne mens soules, but their money, oppressing the religious by punishments, of arrests, excommunication, without any care of justice and honesty. Which made the Greeke Church at this time to fall quite away, and opposit selfe against the Romane. Doubletelle England had no lesse cause to doe, then had the Greekes; but as Pope Gregory knew that his onely way to keepe England safe, was to hold close with the Kings, so the King also saw no way to strengthen himselfe against his Barons, but by holding in with the Pope, though with so many unsufferable mischiefs. And for some such purpose of the Kings, newly now arrived Cardinal Otto, the Popes Legate, greatly against the liking both of the Peeres, and of the Archbishoppe of Canterbury, who not onely reprobated the King thereof, as of a thing dangerous to the Kingdome, but tooone after also took his journey to Rome, to make some complaints, neither would he stay, though the Legate recalled him by his authority, which ever after caused much hatred betwixt them. Yet sundry good offices were at first performed by the Legate.

The treatie of peace begun betwixt the two Kings of England and Scotland at Torke, was again resumed in the same City, where Otto interposed himselfe toward making a final agreement, which ensued. There were also assembled the Earles and Barons, who by the princely offices of Alexander King of Scots, were reconciled to the King their Soveraigne, it being the time which Bartolus means, and not the next yeere. Otto had formerly accorded many of them among themselves, whose disagreements had emperid the State of the Realme, so that for a time working but calmnesse and amity appeared. Yet soone after they thorted to see the King to be admitted to the wall of the Romane, especially the Legate, for which, Richard Earle of Cornwall reprobated him, as carrying himselfe more like the Popes Pensioner then a King. Notwithstanding the King was to president of his State, that the Legate calling his National Council, thither came from the King, John Earle of Lincoln, John Fitz-Gerffrey, de William de Kere a Canon of Pauls, to forbid the Legate on the behalfe of the King and Kingdome, not to attempt any thing against the Crowne or royall dignitie.

(18) Simon de Montfort afterward created Earle of Lancaster had now wrought himselfe into such favour, that the King with his owne hand secretely gave Blunet, (widow of the late William Marshal Earle of Pembroke) to him in marriage, notwithstanding that he had vowed herselfe a Nunne. When this was once knowne to Richard Earle of Cornwall, and the angry Lords, they all took such sinisther therat, because they were not first consulted with, in regard the King had promised to doe no weighty matter without the, that none but Hubert de Burgh Earle of Kent adhered to the forsaken King. The head of this defension was the Earle of Cornwall, of whom men generally had hope, that he would now free the Land from the miserable oppressions both of Romans and other Strangers. Him therefore the Legate undertakes, but found him thiffe and vnderatable at first. For when he truly and faithfully told him: That if all the people of the Land rose against the King, yet he being his own brother ought always to stand fast with him against the whole world, and out to make himselfe Captain of the enemies, &c. The Earle roundly replied: That none ought to marriage, if hee being the only Heire apparent, had a care of the Kingdome state, when there was no treasure in the publick coffers for defence thereof, though it were covered with canons: That it was more cruelly wounded at, for so much as the King his brother did most stand in need of helpe, and good defence, that he would not take example by such a mercies, as neither of the Emperour, who having married his sister, retained her with him, but sent backe all that attended her, not giving to any of them either lands or money, although himselfe did abound in both: the example of the King of France, who took the same course though he married the eldest sister of the English Queene, &c. The Legate upon these and many other shrewdly sharpe speeches, takes with him Peter Bishoppe of Winchester, and desles with the King, who required time to answer, which the Lords granted, and met at London strongly appointed vpon the day. There, while the quarrell hung in suspence, Simon de Montfort had with money, false wordes, and much entreaty of Mediators, reconciled himselfe to the fierce young Earle, and so also had John Earle of Lincoln, another mark of the publick enmie. This practise (which Earle Richard entertained without his Confederates priuily) had probable effects: for the controlling Lords lost thereby their Generall, and hee greatly weakened himselfe in the opinion of the Lords and People, both which were points of advantage and safety for the King. But Simon feeling himselfe as yet vpon no sure ground, left his wife with child at Kentworth, not ceasing, till by the favour of the Emperours letters and excessive bribes, (by which suffice to overcome, and made captive to the Roman avarice) hee had obtained at Rome a dispensation for that marriage, which yet was doubted, whether it could bee lawfull, because shee had taken the ring, though neither the habit of a Nunne, nor the veil. Howsoever, the King did afterward sodainly breake with him, obliging that Montfort had first corrupted her, and hee to cover his Sisters shame, was content to give her in Marriage.

(19) While the King and his Queene abode at Woodstocke, a Traitor was apprehended, who vpon examination, confest that others had vowed the same, and that hee was sent out of Ireland from Flavinus the soun of Gerrfrey de Marfise (one of those Patentees, which hoped to share in the heads

Great feuds in the Lords con-towards the King.

of Richard late Earle Marshall) to commit that assault upon him. This execrable wretch having become a Courtier, and one of the Kings' Knights, supposing to have found the King in his own retiring Bed, had about midnight gotten in at the Chamber window; but God (in whose special protection, the lives of Princes are) disappointed him, for the King was cleft where in bed with his Queene.
Nevertheless he gave not over, but with naked knife in hand, fought up and down in some other Chambers. One of the Queenes' gentlewomen (sitting late and very devoutly at her booke by candle-light,) at sight of the furious villaine, with her startling noise wakened the Kings servants, who flaring out of their Bed, laid hands upon him; & afterward he was drawne in peeces with horses at Coventree. And worthily for (as a vulgar Chronicler hereupon hath truly & justly wounding and killing a Prince, the Traitor's guilt of homicide, of parricide, of Christicide, next of Decide. William de Ma-rissey, who was said to be the instigator of this Treason, knowing his danger, became a Pyrate & fortified the Ile of Lundy in Severn, where hee did much mischief, the situation of that little Island being inexpugnable. At length hee was forsaken therein, and listerne of his Complotes, who all of them after consaition were put to death at London. William to the last gasped denying his privity to the former treasonous attempt of killing the King. About the time of the Kings danger at Woodstocke, the Legate was in very little better case at Oxford, where being at first honourably by the Pnunciary entertained in Ousey Abbey, the pride of his Romans there proved so insolent, that a troupe of the younger Students, provoked therewith to arme themselves, not onely slew the Legates own brother, but would have done the like with the Legate himself, whom they termed an Infidel, Symon, & Reuerker, Money-thirster, perverter of the Kings submission of the Kings peace, poisoning strangers with spoils of the English; but hee lurking in the Bellifry, at midnight escaped over the river (not without danger of drowning) and fled to the King for his protection. For which outrage, the King sending the Earle of Warren with an armed band, imprisoned about 30. of the offenders, and the Legate interceded the Vniversity, till all the Bishops of England purposely meeting in a Synode pleaded for the Pnunciary, as being the second of Christendome: to whose importunity the proud Legate would not condescend, wistfull all the Bishops would yield to goe on foot with the Student; from Pauls Church to the Legates house, (which was about a mile,) who there overgrew and outbore, should haue crave absolution; which accordingly they performed.

(60) The Legate was (not long after) called home by the Pope, upon notice of the scandalous dayles given in England, by the insatiable avarice of the Ro-manes; but by the carnell workings of the King, who feared lest his great ones would rise against him, hee was detained as a necessary cull to establish the good of Peace. For it was in a manner taken up for a fiction among the Lords, to glorifie themselves with the fenelike multitude, by distastfully disparaging and taxing the Kings discretion and government, being farre too gentle and amiable for spirits so puerile and insolent; which might well force his loving nature, to seeke kindness and aduise among strangers, seeing he could not have it for any his defects among the home-borne. A great reason why (perhaps) hee did some few things rashly and passionately enough: it being a thing forceable to displease a very wise man, to have so many impetuous censurs to obtrude his actions, and few to humble their abilities to obligious services, all bearing themselves rather like Tutors or Controllers, than like Subjects or Councillors. About which time, one William an ordinary Calumniator, and accuser of great men to the King, was for that impious practise condemned to die; though hee fought to peccot out his dayes by the helpe of new appeachments and false criminations; but that being discovered, he was hanged upon a Gibbet in London. Now also the King beganne to smell out the vnderplot and false dealing of his beloved Legate, whose familiar friend (Peter Saracen) being taken Captiue by the Emperour, and to pay 10000 l. Sterling for his ransome, the shamelesse Legate counsell'd the king to bind himselfe and his Crown for that payment. Whereby the King perceiving what traitors were laid to entrap him, (the Romanes not caring what life happened to the Kingdome, so they might be winners) swaine in great rage that it repented him he had ever admitted the Legate into the land, to dissipate the wealth thereof. But the Bishops of the land meeting in Council at London, to redresse the oppressions of the English Church, tolde the Legate flatly, that the Romanes importunity had so long exchanged their Church goods; that they would no longer endure it. These English representations seemed somewhat too late; but that providence which the King of Scotland looke after vicd, was, as more tempellous, so more commendable, when meeting the same Legate (for now into Scotland he is going to gather coine) he desired him to enter once more into his Kingdome, telling him, hee was the first Legate whom ever entered that Kingdome; yet by intreatie to save the Legates credit, hee was permitted; first making a declaration, that his entrance should neuer goe for a President of any after; whereto the Legate should put his Seale at his departure; but having gotten what hee came for, hee sodainly stole away without leave of the King, and carried his writing with him. By all which vile and indigne vi-ages, a man might thinke the Church of Rome did purposely strive to draw the hatred of all nations against her, especially, (ith as we shewed) the Greekes were taken from the Roman union, so now the Church of Antioch had both excommunicated the Pope, the Church and Court of Rome, and challenged the Primacie above the Pope and the Roman Church, as being an ancient See, wherin S. Peter first sate Bishoppe for seven yeeres, and more excellent and deare, (ith that Peter lived with love and reue-rence, whereas both he and Saint Paul were contemptuously persecuted in Rome, which Church was new also defiled with Simonie, Vsurie, Avarice, and other heinous offences.

(61) But (doubtlesse) it was worthy of reproofe in the King; that after so manifold trials of faith and constancy in Hubert Earle of Kent, hee should now againe afflict his honourable old-age with renewall of accusations, when hee rather ought to have tendered him as a Father. Among other the Articles (engines of vexation) which the King bent against him, these were new ones, by which any reasonable man may take a scantling of the reit.
1. That Hubert had taken the money out of the barrells which were sent for the reliefe of Richard and Pauline, and stuffed them with sand. 2. That hee dissuade a great Lady from marriage with the King, he had said the King was a fowling-eyed foule, a lewd man, and a kind of leper, whom hee perswaded, more faine-hearted then a woman, pa-rely terrible to his own friends; and utterly unfit for any faire or noble Ladies company. 3. That at Woodstocke, when the King was alone, hee sought to with a naked knife to murder him: Which and many other accusations the Earle did modestly and cleerely refuse.
But with the last (being most wicked of all) hee was so grieved, that making low obedience to the King, he could not forbear to say, that hee was never traitor to his Father nor to him, which by Gods grace did not appear in the King: as if he should have said, (quoth Paris) That if the Earle would have beene a Traitor, the King had never obtained the Crowne. This sentence to have beene a publike triall, upon a Suit or Addition of trepasse, brought against the Earle by the King in the Kings Bench, at which triall the King himselfe was also present. But howsoever the Earle answered, hee was condemned to give to the King * foure his * dearest Castles, Blanch Castle, Greyhound in wales, Shrewsbury and Hildes, and then also (as it seemes) hee was * deprived of his Title of Earle.

(62) After so many mischiefs patiently brooked, at last the King vpon receipt of letters from the Emperour (whom as his brother in law. hee was loth to offend) commanded otho the Popes Legate, in reuayd of the great enmities betwene the Pope and Emperour, to depart out of England. There was also writt commandement given to the Italian Forces, to leaue the most * pure earth of his Realme (meaning that his owne people was most innocent and free from such a sinne), but (saith * otho, who durst write any thing he thought) by giving the King money, which is too much ought to iustifie the wicked, they for a great part remained still, as loth to forsake such fair pastures. And the Legat himselfe also staid so long, till the Pope by wily inducements and * forged calumnies had drawne the King, both to relinquish the Emperour his brother in law, and to fulfill the Papall Excommunication to passe here against him, and money also to be gathered to his impeachment. A briefe taste of all the Popes proceedings against this glorious Emperour, we may take from the Nabillie of France, who (when the Pope offered the Empire vnto Robert the French Kings brother) in their grand Council refused to accept it, charging the Pope with the Spirit of audacious rascallie for deposing the Emperour, not consulted of any sould, and whom a Greater Councell ought ought to conferre, not the Pope, to whom no credit ought to be giuen, being his Capitiuall Enemie. For that themselves knew he was a vicious and vicious Emperour, and one who had in him more religion then the Pope had. Our Legat Otho (who now as length is gone) was no sooner departed, but Peter of Savoy the Queens Vnde arrived, to who the King gave the Earldome of Richmond, and entreated otherwile most magnificently. This and the like largesse to strangers, drew on the King much euill will, who also in fauour of his Queene, procured her Vncle Banias to be chosen Archbishop of Canterbury in place of * Edmund, who weary of his life in England, for reason that he could not redreffe the Popes detestable excommunications and oppressions, made choice of a voluntarie Exile at Fontenay in France, where he died with the honour and opinion of a Saint.

(61) The Kings imployments hitherto haue (almost wholly) been taken vpon either in the impatience of ciuill disturbances, or in the too-patient sufferance of some forraigne greiuances, nourished within his Kingdome; which gaue him perhaps little leisure, minde, or meenes, to pursue any transmarine designe. But now better provided with money, then with men, (and yet not sufficiently with money) he takes hisppeedily after Easter towards Poitou, where the Earle of March (now husband to Queene Isabel his mother) expected his arrivall. Hee committed the Government of the Realme in his absence to the Archbishoppe of York. Thirtie Hoisheards or Barrels fraught with firing money were shipt for that seruice. There also went with him Richard Earle of Cornwall, (who was returned with much honour out of the Holyland not long before) and fouen other Earles with about three hundred Knights, besides other souldiers. To resist the English, the King of France (who had giuen Paulin to his brother Ayauce) assembled an Armie royall of foure thousand men of Armes, excellently well appointed, and about twenty thousand choise Souldiers; with a thousand Carro to carrie their other necessaries. King Henrie vnderstanding that the King of France lay before Fontenay, (a Castle belonging to the Earle of March, lying to force it by assaults, sent a messenger of defiance to him as a breaker of Truce. Leuis a most iust and valiant Prince, denied that euer hee brake the truce, but that the King of England by maintenance of his Rebels, did rather seeme to infringe the Truce. Neuertheless hee offered (so as the English would not protect his enemies the Earle of March and others) to giue him Paulin, and a great part of Normandy, in satisfaction of his * Fathers Oath, and moreover, to enlarge the last truce with a longer terme of yeeres. These so honourable, safe, and profitable conditions, by the practise of the Facsimile (who feared the French Kings indignation would proue too heauie for them to beare, if the English abandoned their cause) were vnforsunately refused.

(64) When the French King heard thereof it repented him that he had humbled himselfe to flatter telling his Lords, that he neither feared his Cath of England, nor all his forces, but only that Otho, (for restoring of the lands in France) which his father made when hee was in England. This scruple did so trouble the Kings mind, on the behalfe of his dead Father, that hee would admit no comfort till one of his Lords told him, that the King of England, by putting *Constantine Fitz-Arno*ld to death, for hauing spoken some words in honour of King Leuis (his Father) had first broken the truce. This satisfied the French. That whole business is thus concluded by * Tilias: Hugh Earle of March overcome with the pride and persuasions of his wife Isabel, would not doe homage to Ayauce the French Kings brother: for soe was a cause to draw the English together, where things thriving on his part but meanely, Hugh is constrained in the end to doe both homage and fealty unto Ayauce. This onely must be added, that he did so faithfully provide for his priuate safety without the knowledge of the King of England, at such time as he * pretended otherwile.

(65) This treacherie lost the King all Poitou, for whereas he principally tooke care for money, presuming vpon the Earle for men, when it came to the point, the Earle was not only not provided, but seare by the throat of God, he neuer promised any such matter, and denied he had set his Seale to any writing concerning such promises, and that if any such false writing were (as the King and his brother the Earle of Cornwall affirmed) their mother his wife had forged it. They were now in sight of the French Host before Tailbourg in Normandy when this improvident expostulation was made. The King of England manifestly seeing his perill, and hauing by his brother Earle Richards meditation (whom many of the French did greatly honour because he had by composition been a meane at his arrivall to free them from the Saracens in the holy-land, raised his camp by night, and retreated with much more hast then good speed. Not long after this, the faire Citie of Amster in Normandy, vpon displeasure conceived by the Citizens against the King, because he had giuen the same to the Lord Hugh his half-brother (sonne to the Earle of March) first contriued a perfidious revolt so clostile, that if first the said Lord Hugh, and then Guy de Lusignan his elder brother, had not in good time signified the danger, the King and all the English had been surprized by the French. There was none (among all the notable Facsimiles) found respectiue of honor and loyalty, but only one called Hertald, Captaine of the famous Castle of Amirabell, who in great sorrow repaired to the King of England, praying counsell and assistance, where the King with a downcast looke gaue him this answer: *I haue doo see (Hertald) that my forces are soeare sufficient to defend my selfe. Our Lord and Saviour was betrayed by his Disciple Judas, and therefore who shall be safe? Behold the Earle of March, whom I loue and reuerence as my Father, hath giuen a perniuous president; I haue trusted in a staffe of reed, and the splinters thereof haue wounded my hand. Thou art the only man who hast beheld the selfe benefit: what fauour therefore thou dost possesse of none by any last title, take it to thee as thou comest, I giue it thee: Provide otherwise* wife for thy selfe, as thou dost thinke it most expedient. The King of France, in whom all magnanimitie, bountie, and Christian vertues did shine, hearing what Hertald had said and done, commended the man, and manner so highly, that saying, Ireland and allowed such as her. The Cattle was entrusted backe to the same Capitaine, when with many teares and other signes of sorrowe, he had surrendered himselfe and it to Lewis. The further prosecution of that warre was empeached by sickness and penurie which sore afflicted the French armie. An overture therefore for five yeeres tract being made, Lewis returned into France, and Henrie to his City of Bordeaux in Gascogne, where his Queene Blanche (who bare him Prince Edward about two yeeres before) bare to him a daughter called Beatrice.

(66) Meane while the King looking carefullie into the double dealings of the Peisvains, who were the limitarie or border-subjects of the English dominions in Aquitaine, and by a nature proper to free March-men which lie betwene the hammer and the Anvill, are enured to all sorts of devices how to save themselves and delude others, wicilie withdrawes his large Penions, which they by deep dissimulations and improfittable shewes of assistance had shared among them, for which they repayed nothing but secret scoffes of their Patron and Pay-master. The Earle of March whatsoever his Fees were from the King his Sonne in Law, made bot an euill bargain in the end: for, besides that the French Kingooke from him no small portion of his Estate, hee was openlie appeached of Treason in the French Court, by a valiant Knight, who offered to proue the truth of his accusation by Battell. Isabel, whom the French in passion called Isabelle, because her pride and turbulent practises had procured all those euils, fled vpon the newes to a Nunnerie. In the end yet her husband being aged, by the diligence & care of friends avoided the Combat, and was suffered to returne home. The king (whose commaing had bene long expected in England) hauing ordained one Sir Nicholas de Males his Lieutenant in Aquitaine, is now vnder Saile, although the Gascogne, because his presence was greatly beneficiall, had sought all the waies they could to detain him longer. Being returned, by reason of that vnuisidell and lossefull voiage into France, hee was compelled to be borthenous to his Subjects, aswell by the leuie of Exchequer, as offloances and otherwise. The Iewes also felt the gripe of his wants so farr, that euen Christians commiserated: whose gold hee receiued with his owne hands, but their filuer by others. These and other importunate corralions, were not made onely to fill vp such breaches as the French affaires had produced, but also to spend in entertainments and shewes.

(67) Neither will the Maiesty and honour of the Kingdome permit, that such kindes of expence should bee wanting, when publike occasions do require; in which respect they are not onely vifull, but absolutely necessary, because Common-weales are partly founded vpon the opinion which Subjects and neighbours haue of their power and riches, and their estate is commonly made by that which is outwardly seene at such times. This care, besides the great leue hee bare to his wises kindred and Countreimen, made him pursey for money in this manner; for in December the Lady Beatrice Countesse of Provence mother to the Queene of England and France, having with her the Lady Cynthia, Cynthia, or Scintia (for by all those names shee is called in Authors) and a princely traine in all points excellently well furnished, landed at Dauers, where innumerable of the best fairs gaue her welcome and attendance. London was hung with rich Ornaments, from the Bridge thereof to Westminster. This noble young Lady Cynthia, was brought hitherto bee married to Richard the King's brother

Earle of Cornwall: At whose Nuptiall feast, there were thirty thousand Meffes provided in the Cookery onely, and of all other things there was incredible plenty. All which our wishlandding did manifestly proue (as Peris saith most truly) that the world is but a very stage, and the pompe thereof but an idle shew, seeing the next morrowe blew away the whole varietie of so great preparations like as it had bene a Cloud. Nor much vnlike is the life euen of greatest Princes, which hangeth on very vntuly termes, as Griffith, eldest brother of David Prince of Wales did find, when boping by a chaine of Blankets, and such like stuffe to escape out of the Tower of London, where the King had imprisoned him, the line breaking, hee pitcht vpon his head, which the weight of his great body draue (as it were) into his shoulders, and miserably slew him. The King therefore punishing the Keepers for their sloth, commanded that the Sonne of Griffith (prisoner with his father) should from thenceforth bee more narrowly watched. Not long after the which, David Prince of Wales provoked by wronges, (chiefly done by the Earle of Hertford) invaded the English Marches, whom the Earles of Gloucester and Hertford, and other mighty men in those parts, hauing the Kings coulent and assistance, did withstand, yet fighting but with variable fortune. It was Prince David's purpose to haue freed himselfe from the obedience or tenure which hee had acknowledged to the King, for which purpose hee exhibited his complaint to the Pope, pretending that the King of England compelled him vniuallly to hold his Principality and Lands of him. But the Kings credite, cause, and workings, easily overweighed the Prince of Wales, and prevailed.

(68) The States of the Realme were in those dayes nothing supple, when the King fought to handle them for money: for hee about this time labouring to drawe some from them, vpon faithfull promise to keepe and obserue the libertie, vnto which hee had sworn at his Coronation, and whereof hee had granted his Charter, they beought him to remember, how often hee had wrang from his faithfull liege people (whom hee ought to cherish, not utterly empouerish) without performing his promise. This forthwith after the taking of Therford, hee had Carrawage, that is, two shillings vpon euery Ploughland; the next yeere after, a fifteenth of all their Moueables: vpon his passage into Brittain, so small summes of money from the Prelates, Religious orders, Bacheliers and Iewes: after his returne, hee had Exchequer, that is, vpon euery Shield or knights Fee) three markes: then a fortieth part of all their Moueables: within a while after a thirtieth part; By and by, for the marriage of the Lady Isabel to the Emperour, two Marks vpon euery Ploughland; at his Sonnes birth, hee by Profits heaped vp no small store of money. Again, when hee went into Gascogne, hee raised almost infinite heapes of money from all sorts of Subjects: vpon his returne, where hee had bene deluded and dishonoured, hee receed all manner of Subjects. They now also (vnder the name of aide for the marriage of his eldest daughter) granted him vpon euery Knights Fee, which belof of the King in chief, twenty shillings, the one halfe to bee paide at Easter, the other at Michaelmasse. But (say they) how well the King will keepe and fulfill his undertakings and promises, in requital of the past and present contributions, hee easily knowes to whom nothing is unknowne. But such as trauelled to strengthen the Popes designs, with collections of money among the English Clergy, found a stern and constant opposition, not onely for that they were unwilling, but also for that the Emperour had written to the King in plaine phrase, that if hee suffered any such matter, hee would not faile in grieuous sort to punish all the English hee could get, in reuenge of that partiality.

quelled, so tunc England also; and whetted on the French King, to enter on the Land, promising him all the helpes of the Church and Papal power. But the said King, not only refused to visit in offer, (as having no title to England, themselves also knit by hundred, and by three, their Servants being Sisters, the attempt kindly for Christians, &c.) but further ratified the former truce, and enlarged it with the addition of more yeares, because King Leois was prepared to make warre against the Infidels, which voyage King Henrie would no hinder, but advance. And that nothing might disturbe the peaceful life, with which the King of England was most delighted, David Prince of Wales departed out of the vale of the dying, (as Paris elegantly saith) into the vale of the dead. The King seeing all things quiet and safe about him, doth now conuert his whole cares to the reformation of the inward males of his dominions, calling the estates of the land together for that purpose. To whom he there delivered in writing, sundrie * Articles of the grievances and oppressions of his Kingdom and the Church, 1. that the Pope extorts great Contributions of the Clergy, without the Kings assent, against the rights and liberties of the Kingdoms, 2. that Parsons cannot bestow Church living on fit men, but the Pope gives them to his Monks, who can make no English, (nor celebrate divine service, nor preach, nor keep hospitals, nor care for souls, &c.) but only beg for the Land with carrying away the Cane. 3. that the Popes Procurators and Pensi- ons are unsufferable. 4. that Englishmen are drawn forth of the Land to end their canies. 5. that the Pope by his non obstante overthrows Oathes, Customs, Charters, Grants, Statutes, Priviledges, Rights, &c. whereupon, the King, Bishops, Nobles, Abbots, and Priors, did all write their severall complaints to the Pope, requiring speeche redreffe of those infinite wronges to the King, the Kingdom, the Clergie, the Nation, and the People, who would rather die, then thus daily endure these oppressions. Notwithstanding sundry Prelates (either out of ambition or feare) vnderhand furthered the Popes desires, when secretly he craved an annuall tollage of the Clergie for maintenance of his Souldiers; and that the State should take no notice thereof, the Pope caused his Agents to make them * swear not to reveale that their Contributions to any maintaining for the space of halfe a yeare. Yet the King came to the knowledge thereof; and sent forth his writs, forbidding under great paines that the money should be carried forth of the Land. This the Kings displeasure was much augmented upon the returne of his messengers from the Council of Lyon, who related how proinde the Papal Cardinals the vassal complaints of the State, saying the King himselfe did Frederick, and holding his People as Schismaticks. Which incited the King to publish his Proclamation in Every Cite and Towne, that none of his Subjects should dare to contribute any money to the Pope: but it came to no effect, for that some * Papall Bishops and ambitious Clerks (of his Council) fearing the Papal threats, where so cause of feare was, drew him to raise his purpose unwea-rily, which he manfully undertooke.

(73) The Bishop of Worcester (a principall worker herein) was laid to * have had authority from the Pope to interdict the land, which perhaps was it which the King so grately feared, and which the Monke hid, was not worth the fearing. The Earle of Conwall also with others (who favoured not the Emperour Fredericks cause) laboured to change the Kings minde, so that the wonted extortions were as current as ever; in somuch that a Cardinal truly told the Pope, that England was to the Pope as Balaams Ass, which being so often wronged, bargained, and sold, it was no marvaile, if at length hee opened his mouth to complaine: and for themselves and their Romanes Court, they were like Ismael, * curse men hand against them, and theirs against every man. But if we should so often insist on the relation of this Kingdoms distresses, as the popes endless Corractions from yere to yere, and the States remedielesse complaints give vs occasion, we should but cloy the Reader with ruffall matter, which * Monks themselves have mouementally and copiously ended vnto vs, and set forth the too ferule affections of our owne Ancestors, who still entreated new consulations about the disease, but neuer brought the medicine vnto a perfect receipt. For vpon fresh angariations from Rome, the King againe assembles his State to thinke of redreffe, * the common-wealth, as well of Laity as Clergie, being brought to the point of utter defection, as the liber was neuer heard in any age, whereof they againe made their lamentable complaint to the King, whose duty it was to protect the land from such wronges and dangers. Their only remedy was againe to write letters to the Pope, which slender meanes he could as slightly put off; and thought to stop the clamour for the present he promised never to send any Legats into England, but on contrary of the State, yet daily did he send his raking Clerks, with the power, though not the Title, and Ensignes of Legats, both into England and Ireland, so to delude the King, and still pursue his Subjects.

(74) The State of the Kingdom still requiring reformation, there assembled againe at London certaine Prelats, Earles and others, at the Kings commandement, where after so much purloining by others, now the Kings owne errand and affaires was to get money for himselfe. But they (who gaue such way to the Popes collections) were now all close-handed, and open mouthed; for, besides their vnderfull vpbaying the King with some over-sights, they vtrally and seditionously charged him to haue done contrarie to the example of his magnificent Predecessors, in that his chief Justice, Chancellor and Treasurer were of his owne choosing, and not by the Common Council of the Realme, as they ought. The King inwardly touched herewith, yet seeing no other helpe, promitteth redresse and change for the better. Whereunto they answered; that they would expect a while with patience, and as the King shall carrie himselfe toward them, so will they performe their obedience to him. Sothe meeting was adourned from that Candlemas till Midsummer; at which time also there was nothing done, but all parts rose discontented. The cause of that discontentment was, for that the King, instead of satisfying their audacious demands, answered them, That they sought to bridle him at their iurie places, prouide forbidding that in him, which was lawfull for themselves. For that curie private man may vse, what, and whose Counsel he list; for the matter of a familie presure or remane what officers in his house he list; which yet they fauorably denied vnto him, their Lord and Soueraigne, as if Seruants and Vassals were to rule their Lords; whereas indeed he is no King but a servant, who must bow at others becke. That therefore he would neither place nor displace either Chancellor, Justice, or Treasurer as they thought good. Remouing helpe hee required money at their hands, to reuocall such forreine lands as concerned affeill them as him, to see it done. Hereupon the Parliament brake vp, and the King was left to furnish himselfe otherwise so well as hee could, euen by sale of his Jewels, Plate and other precious stuffe after a dishonourable manner.

A.D. 1249. An. reg. 33. Simon Earle of Leicester comes with his own out of Gasaigne.

(75) The affaires of Gasaigne (which one Gasaigne de Biard had greatly troubled) by the manhood and wit of Simon Earle of Leicester were now brought into better quiet, which made his presence returned, as it seemeth for more supplies, which went againe with him very acceptable in the Court of England. The King intending to furnish that enterprise afresh against the coming spring time, left no meanes without thought of, which either by Art or strong entreatie he could vse, to replenish his exhausted Coffers. In which he emboldned too much the Royall name and dignity, calling some (and perhaps truly) whose boutique he cramed, that it was more almes to ayle him with money, then one that went begging from dore to dore. Meane while the king neglects not his administration of Iudice; for, whereas the whole Countie of Hampshire swarmed with felons and murderous robbers, himselfe so ordered the matter, sitting in person in Winchester Castle, that the infamie and danger of those places were cleared by hanging the Offendors; many of which were very wealthy, and some the kings owne seruantes. Walter de Clugford also (a Baron of the Marches of Wales) for enforcing an officer (whom he had otherwise handled badly) to ear the kings writ, waxe and all, ran so farre into the kings displeasure thereby, that while he liued, he was made the lesse able to feed himselfe; paying to the king a very great sum of money, and hardly escaping without confiscation of his whole patrimonie. The king desirous to be friends with the Citizens of London, to whom of late he had bene ouer-hard, publicly reconciled himselfe vnto them, whom for that cause he had commanded to appeare at Westminster, and there immediately reuelled the badge of the Crosse at the hand of Boniface Archbishop of Canterbury; but whatsoever his intention was, it neuer came into action on his part. In the meane time contrarie to his Fore-fathers example, he so much abridged the expences of his house, and his Almes, that he vnderwent some dishonourable imputation. Neurtherlesse he wisely wound himselfe out of many a Merchants debt; whereto he wrung great helpe from the Jewes, (as the ordinary Clippers and defacers of his Coyne,) and the forgers of Seales and Charters; from one of whom hee had at times drawne thirthe thousand markes Sterling, besides two hundred markes in gold.

(76) It seemeth an Inseparable qualitie in his nature, to be extremely violent, in doing whatsoever hee had a mind to doe, and that sometime without the due respect to secular Maiestie; as in the Course hee tooke for aduancing his half-brother Athelmure to the Bishoprick of Winchester. For not contenting himselfe to haue sent his messengers to the Countie by them to worke the election, hee came thither in person, where the Chapter being in the Cathedral Church, hee entered, and placing himselfe in the Presidents seat, makes to them a speech in the nature of a sermon, taking for his Theme those words of David: Justice and Peace kiss each other. Wherupon hee shewed them, That whereas Justice belonged to him, and to such as had the rule of Nations, and to the Clergy caluallise and Peace, both these should that day kiss together if they elected his brother for their Bishop: For which he gaue them many reasons, but concluded, If they did otherwise, they should feele his Princely displeasure. When therefore they published to the King their Choise, they did it with this reservation (because Athelmure was to remaine vnder the title of the Elect of Winchester, for that he was not a Priest) if such an election might stand by law, or lawfull fauour. But the Pope, who meant to make his aduantage hereof, as well as the King, exacted of him for confirmation of the same election, five hundred Markes of Church reuenues, to be paid ouer vnto the Earle of Burgundie sonne a child; which makes * the Monke to breake forth into this bitter lamentation; O Pope, the Chief of Fathers, why dost thou suffer that the Christian world be defiled? worthily, therefore art thou * driven out of thy owne Cite and Ste, and like a runawaye and another Chem, art enforced to wander vp and downe. O God, thou God of iust reuenge, when wilt thou draw forth thy sword to imbrue it in the blood of such oppressors? Though in these vniuersall abuses, the Pope would neither redresse himselfe nor others, yet God raised vp a stout and learned Prelate, Robert Grosset, Bishop of Lincoln, who undertooke to reforme the Monks and Friars; but they (who knew Rome was from the beginning * Asylum Latronum) appealed to the Pope. Wherupon the aged Bishop going to his holinesse, tolde him that all offenders ceased, by his opening his bosome to such as brought him bretheren who snatching him vp with angrie Countenance and speech, sent him home with reproach. The Pope was at this time at Lyons, where not long after the Colicell breaking vp, Cardinal Hugo made a sermon of offence to the Citizens; whereas amongst other benefices which the Pope lying in their City had brought them, he tolde them this was a * Principall, that whereto at their coming there were three or foure Whore-houses in the Lyons, now at their departing they left but one; and indeed that reached from the East-Gate of the City to the West. Whereby wee see, France had some part of the Popes Almes, as well as England.

And to spare his owne charge the rather, he inuities himselfe sometime to this man, and sometime to that, but no where concerning himselfe with his diet & hospitage, vnlesse both he, his Queene & some Edward, yea and chiefe fauorites in Court, were prebent with great and costly gifts, which they tooke not as of Courttesie, but as due. This was the vnhonourable face of the Kings estate at that time. But in the depth of his want and rigour of his Patrimonie, he could not thus vt himselfe against the sinnes and aduancement of his Priuies and Favorites, so that it was become a common murmur in England; Our inheritance is connerred to almost, and our houses to strangers. The matter seemed the more grievous, for that their pride and violence were intolerable. About this time the clause Non obstante (brought in first by the Pope) was taken up in England by the King, in his grants and other writings, as Non obstante priore mandato, Non obstante antiqua libertate, &c. This our ancient Author calls an odious and detestable clause; and Roger de Taverham Iustitiar, fetching a deepe sigh at the sight thereof, cried out both of the times and it, saying, "it was a firebrand derived from that infernal fountain of the Clergie."

(78) Another of the Kings Iustitiars, and a learned Knight, Sir Henry de Bath, (whose Lady, because her life was well defended, filled him with pride,) was so confidently greedy, the better to satisfy her ambition, that in one circuit, hee appropriated to himselfe about two hundred pound lands. Corruption in Iustice (which must needs be supposed to be there, where excessive wealth is gotten by the Officers of Iustice) is but a landie ground-woke of a vainly-hoped greatness, and may well be reputed in the number of crimes totius; and this moved a Knight, Sir Philip de Aris, to appeach him before the King, both for vnfaithfullness in his office, and treason against the King. The King had no hold of himselfe, after hee was once thoroughly kindled. Bath knows it, and therefore writes to his wives friends to come strong in his defence, that the King should not dare to call him to his trial; yet withall hee fectles all secret meanes how to appeare the King, who vnderstanding of this combination, was the more enflamed. The Earle of Cornwall his brother could not appease him; so, not though hee knit vp his intercessions with these minatorie words: We must not forsake Gentlemen in their right, nor in preserving the peace of the tottering Kingdom. In March there was holden a Parliament at London, there the King caused Bath to bee sharply prosecuted. Thither Sir Henry Bath repairs, strongly attended with Knights and Gentlemen of his owne friends, and his wives, to daunt the edge of Iustice, which hee deservently feared. The accusations were many, (for all mē were called to say what they could against him,) and among all, these two, most hainous: that hee troubled the whole Realme, and stirred all the Barons thereof against the King, so that a generall rebellion was to be feared, (which one of his fellow-Iustitiars did openly testifie); that hee had for reward discharged a committed Malefactor out of prison without punishment, in prejudice of the King, and to the perill of his affeete Iustitiars. The King was encouraged therewith, that seeing no other way to punish him, being so strongly backed, hee mounted into an higher place than before, and cries out, Whosoever kills Henrie de Bath shall be gilty of his death, and I here doe acquit him; and presently departs. Neuthelesse, although hee left behind him many men, who would haue readily executed the Kings terrible doome; yet by the wisdom of Sir John Maunsell, (one of the Kings private Counsellors) they were restrained. His wordes are worthy to bee remembered; Gentlemen, and friends, it is unnecessary for vs to put this presently in execution which the King hath so often commanded. It may be when his wrath is overblowne, hee will bee sorry hee said it. Moreover, if any outrage be done to Bath, hee here are his friends who will take all sorts of revenge. Sir Henry escaping thus from so present a danger, found meanes upon promise of money and great mediation of friends, to obtain his peace & safety; for at this time, Iustice and all things grew saleable. The North-East part of Wales was committed to Alan de Zouch, who had it in Farme for eleven hundred Markes yearly, whereas John de Gray (whom hee supplanted in the place) paid but five hundred: so miserable Wales was let out to such as would give most.

(79) Alexander the third, succeeding his Father in the Kingdom of Scotland, comming in Christmas to Turke, there espoused, though very young, the Lady Margaret, daughter to King Henry. There were present the two Kings in person, with a most choice multitude of either Nation, the English being in number about a thousand Knights, beside greater States, as Prelates, Earles and Barons, and of the Scots about fixe hundred Knights and Gentlemen, all of them well appointed. There was also two Queences, the Mother of the Bride, (who was to be Queene) and the widow or Queen Dowager of Scotland, who for that cause was returned out of France, attended vpon in toyal manner with many Lords and Gentlemen of France. The Scots were lodged in one place of the City by them selves. Vpon Christmas day the King of England gaue the order of Knight-hood to the King of Scots, and at the same time to twenty others richly apparelled. Vpon the next day the princely couple were espoused. Take a scantling of the cheere and multitude of guests by this. The Archbishop of Turke, who was Prince (as it were) of the Northerne parts (and the common host of all that most noble fellowship) which cost him about foure thousand marks, gaue toward that feast fix hundred fat oxen, all which were put in the first general seruice; and whatsoever the waste. Stage-play of the world might afford cyther for pompe or delight, was there all enjoyed. More worthy to be remembered, then that magnificent gluttonie (the natural vice of these our Nations) was the orderly and no childish action of the young Bridesome, in reconciling Philip Louell (whom King Henry had lately fined and dis-courted for taking Bribes) to the King his Lord. K. Alexander vndertaking the balliue, and finding a fere time, presents himselfe to the King of England vpon his knees, holding vp his hands, neither would hee rise, though earnestly requested, but with a gesture which seemed to draw teares of ioy and loue from the eyes of such as fate round about, prosecuting his intent, saith *My Lord King, your Maiesty knows that though I my selfe am a King, and through your goodness honoured with the title of Knight-hood, yet that I am withall both a Child, as well in age as in knowledge, and also an Orphan, my father being dead, and my mother leaving me, though at your sending for, she is now pleased to bee present, therefore from henceforth, and for ever after, I here doe take you, both for Father and Mother, that you may supply both their wants, and with your paternal care best protect all mine insufficiencies. The King smile able to refrain from tender teares, or to hold down his throbblings, laid no more but only this one word, Willingly. The princely Child replied there-upon: I will make experiment of that, and know it by proofes seeing you haue graciously heard mee husband in trying whether I shall reape the effect of my first joy. Then hee declared his request, and had it so that Louell was afterward Treasurer.*

(80) The State and fidelity of the Gascony was so desperately shaken and ploughed by the reuenges which Simon de Montfort to whom the King had given the government of their Country for six yeeres, had exercised vpon them, for that they had accused him to the King of tyrannous & pecciditorious dealing, and affirmed that his name ought rather to bee Simon than Montfort, that but for the vent of their wines, (in which respect their subiection to England was verie beneficiall to their Common-weale) it was thought they would generally haue revolted. But the King thought ready this to lesse Gascony, would yet needs hope to obtaine Normandie and his other lands in France without blowes. The King of France (whose conscience was wonderfully tender and sincere) had indeed written out of Palestine to that purpose, as thinking King Henries tide was better then his owne; but the French, among whom their Kings misfortunes in the losse of Damietta in 1218, (which was wholly ascribed to the Popes avarice, who for money released those who should have aided him, he had brought him into less regard than his excellent virtues merited, did unmercifully and constantly refuse, adding, that before the King of England should have any more land among them, he must pass through a thousand sharp Lances, and a thousand bloody Swords when the Lances were worst. On the other side, the King of England was but in little credit with his people: for, whereas (by an agreement between the Pope and him,) the Tenth of the Clergie through England during three yeeres should have been received toward his charges in his pretended journey to the Holy-Land, yet in a general assembly at Westminster very few were drawn to give their names to that service, notwithstanding that two Bishops and the Abbot of Westminster laboured in their Sermons all they could to stirre the people to that martiall Pilgrimage, and though the King himselfe in all their view took a most solemn oath, that within three yeere he would let forward the onlie reason of their unwillingness growing vpon suspicion, that he would forsake (as the Pope had given him example) draw by this colour the treasure of the Realme into his hands. Thus their diffidence of sinceritie in him, made him rather incline to foster and fauour strangers, & that with a kind of perniciacie, though himselfe by manifold neglects of his word, had wortheie bred that diffidence.

The common opinion of the Kings designe for the holy Land.

(81) The King could more hardlie find followers in such an enterprise, for that his people had no conceit of his valour, but said: What reason encourage him, who was neuer trained up in Martiall discipline, nor hath managed an horse, nor drawn a sword, nor charged a pike, nor shooke a Target, to hope for a triumph over the Saracens, against whom the Champions of France hath miscarried? or wherefore dreames hee of recovery of more land, who could not keepe that which he had in former parts? concluding, that he was a man only borne to debase their purses, to empty his own, and to multiply debts. This was the opinion of men, & behind his backe; but not onely of men, for Isabel Countesse of Arundel, widow of Henry Earle of Arundel, a young Lady reciting the repulse at the Kings hands in a manner which shee allowed to be hers in equity, durst say thus to his face: O my Lord King, why doe you turne away from myselfe? we cannot now obtaine that which is right in your Court; you are placed as a man between God and us, but you neither govern us, nor your selfe, neither dread you to venge the Churchs diuinity, as it hath not onely felt in present, but often heretofore. Moreover you doubt not manifestlie to afflict the Nobles of this Kingdom. The King fired at so free a speech, with a scornfull and angry countenance, answered with a loud voice: O my Lady Countesse! What? have the Lords of England, because you have tongue at will, made a Charter, and byred you to be their Oreator and Advocat? wherevato the Countesse replied: Not so my Lord, for they haue made more no Charter, but that Charter which your Father made, and which your selfe confirmed, swearing to keepe the same inviolably and constantly, and often extorting money vpon promise that the Liberties therein contained should be faithfully observed, you have not kept, but without regard to honour or conscience broken. Therefore are you found to be a manifest violator of your faith and oath. For where are the Liberties of England so often fairly expressed in writings? so often granted? so often bought? Therefore though a woman, and all the naturall layell people of the Land, appeale against you to the Tribunal of the iust full Judge, and Heauen and Earth shall beare us witness, that we are vfed wrongfully, and God the Lord of reuenges right vs. The King abashed at these words asked her, if shee did not looke to obtaine her suite vpon fauour, in regard how was his Kingdom? wherevnto shee answered: That seeing hee had denied that which the Law gave, how could shee hope to obtaine her suite by fauour? Therefore (said shee) I doe appeale to

(82) Thus harsh were the former yeeres to the King and Kingdom: let vs see what more gentle or rougher accidents rise vnto vs in the next. But it then the first little better appeares, for the King having bought out the time which Simon de Montfort had in the government of Gales (which now he giues to Prince Edward) was truly aduertised, that Gauis de Burd was turned Spaniard, and labored by all the meanes hee could to plucke that part from the English obedience. Alonso K. of Spain, claimed the same by vertue of a Charter made thereof by Henry the second, confirmed by Richard and John Kings of England. Simon Earle of Leicester thus displaced, to let the world see that hee would not for any preferment incur the suspicion of disloyalty, refused most honorable offers, which, (after the death of Lady Blanch, Queene Dowager, and Rectrix of France, the French Nobility made him, if he would with his counsell and Force be able to iustifie that Monarchie, while Leu in their king was absent. In the meane time the king of England (all old matters being buried in obliuion, vpon hope of future amendment) for aduancement of his martiall Pilgrimage had large aides granted him in Parliament, but vpon condition that hee should now at last, once for all forsake himselfe to goe on by a Law, not at his pleasure, confirming the Charters of Liberties, against the breakers whereof a most solemn curse was pronounced by the kings assent. The Archbishops, Bishops, and the rest of the Prelates pontifically apparelled, pronounced that curse with Tapers burning, which when they had throwne away vpon the pavement, where they lay extinguished and smoking, the King (having laid his hand on his breast all the while) were to keepe all Liberties vpon paine of that execratory Sentence, as he was a Man, a Christian, a Knight, and a King committed and crowned. The busines of Gales soone after called him to a neerer warre, whether vpon his promise made to the Galeses, hee failed, leauing his sonne Prince Edward, and his kingdom to the government of his Brother, the Earle of Cornewall, and the Queene his wife: his arrival requiring a light and flay to all the affaires thereof. Such Holds as held against him hee reduced to obedience, but with too faulty a Clemency sparing most open Traitors, whereas if an Englishman had offended, hee was sure to suffer for it, and that rather more then lesse.

(83) His feare now was, lest the Galeses should draw in the Spaniards, and relinquish his Souerainety. To prevent this, hee venge prudently and seasonably sent Ambassadors to Alonso King of Spain and Castile, to desire that the Lady Elizabet his sister, might be giuen in marriage to Prince Edward. The motion was well approved, and besides that they brought Letters Patentes from the King of Spain, in which, among all other Clauses it was contained, that the King of Spain did quit his claime and vnderright, which by vertue of any Grants from Henry, Richard and John Kings of England, hee had, or ought to haue. Herevpon hee lends both for his Sonnes (whom the King of Spain desired might be equiaied to him, onely with a noble intent to see and doe him honour) and for his wife the Queene. Among other Acts of sinceritie and love, Alonso sent to the King of England good aduise: that, after the example of good Kings and Princes, hee should be a Lamb toward his Subjects, and Seruitours, and a Lion to Aliens and Rebels. Simon Earle of Leicester with a gallant Troop of Souldiers offered his seruice to the King, who admiring the Earles charity, received him with all ioy possible: at which reconciliation the Gaſconers who feared him like lightning, were so appalled, that they came dropping in, and became good Subjects. That valorous Earle was thereunto moved by that great, free, and noble Prelate, Robert Grosseteste, called the * Maid of the Bannet, as being a great carbinen those dayes of the Popes vagantly courtes towards his State of England, again which hee wrote a famous letter to his Holiness, learnedly proving, that his despicable, abominable, foule-murdering Almon, did deserve him to be an Hereticke, worthy of death, to be a Antichrist, and to sit in the Chaire of persecution, as next to Lucifer himselfe, and that he had no power to excommunicate such as resisted those his edicts. With which Catholike Letter, the Pope was besides himselfe for rage, swearing by Saint Peter and Saint Paul, that he could find in his heart to make that daring Prelate a murderer of confusion to all the world for his swearing. But some wise Cardinals abused him from any sharper course against him; telling the Pope that all was true he said of their Courts abuses, that he was better than any of themselves, and one who had no Peers amongst all other Prelates for fancie or learning; and therefore it were best to hush the matter, for fear of stirring coales, especially sith it was knowne, that at length there would be a departure from their Church. This noble Prelate dyed this very year, with opinion of a Saint (in despite of the Pope, who would have had his bones thrown out of the Church) leaving this * Propheticall farewell at his verie last gaspe; that the Church would never see free from such her Egyptian servitude, but by the dint of bloody sword.

(84) Soone after the Queenes arriving in Gaſconie, when all things were rightly prepared, Prince Edward was thence sent into Spain, where, at the City of Burgos hee married the Lady Eleonor, sister to the King with great honour, having first received Knight-hood at his hand; which done, hee returns with his Bride to Bordeaux, from whence they all together came safe through France into England. What treasure this noble young Princeſſe brought in portion to her husband, wee cannot say; but the King forthwith gave his sonne Gaſconie, Ireland, Wales, Brifflin, Stanford, and Grantham. He had drawne upon himselfe a debt, in this and other his actions of above three hundred thousand Marks; the King of France being not long before returned from the Holy-Land, gave them both safe-conduct in their passage, and did to him, & his whole noble company all the honor which the wit of man, or the most goodly kingdom of France could afford. There were at Paris in this entertainment Beatrice the Countesse of Provence, and foure Queenes her Daughters. The King of England had in his owne Household traine, a thousand choice & excellent horse, beside Carriages, Snmpers, and Coarſers. Hee was lodged in the Pallace of the olde Temple, being an house almost capable of an Armie, where the next morning hee commanded all sorts of poore should be relieved with his charity and Almes. The magnificence of the great Fealt of the Kings, at the King of England charge, shall be expreſſed in our Authors owne words, who is bold to affirme, that Aſſuerus, Arthur, Charles the Great, had never any such. After dinner, the King sent to the French Lords, and men of Armes, Plate, Buckles of Gold, and other royall presents. The King of England late at the Table on the right hand of the French King, and the king of Navarre on the left. But the French King contented much in cuncties to the contrary, till King Henry obſtinately refused laying the King of France as his Lord, so should be for there was no reason, because hee held his Lands in France of him. To whom the most iust and gracious King Lewis with a sofe voice answered; It would to God every one had his right without offence, meaning such other lands as the English Crowne had right unto. At another time he gave the reason, why the Peeres of France would not consent to the restitution of Normandy, for that the Normans would never learn to keep their Borders in quiet. The English King did to himselfe, and to the English name great honour, in his whole behaviour and carriage, which was full of Charity towards the poore (a vertue for which in those dayes Kings chiefly sought to be commended) of Mercy, Magnificence, and all sorts of royall liberality and gentleness. The King and Court of France brought him an whole daies journey upon the way. Hee staid a while at Bologna for a wind, but returned safe, having peaceably measured a way through France, out of Gaſconie, which his martiall Nephews kings of England trode a fierward in another manner, drawing lines of blood and fire over all France, the most pleasant, rich, and spacious realm of Christendome.

(85) Eleonor Prince Edward wife landed at Dur in great State. On the other side, Edmund the Kings second sonne, by a King, which the Pope sent (so to ingage King Henry in his warres against Manfredus, the sonne of the late Emperour Fredericke) was solemnly inducted in the kingdom of Sicilie. The Ambassador was a Bishoppe, who forthwith departed, for indeed his errand was in few glorious, but in truth both delatory and unprofitable, as well because the King had already unreasonably interested himselfe in this quarrell, (the Pope having changed his vow against the Turkes, into this against Christians), as also, for that the Roman Armie which (by the Popes fetches) warred most at his charge, was (notwithstanding the Popes blessings) utterly overthrowen, before this syrie honour could be feild in the Lord Edmund, whom yet his Father whose credulity the Pope for his owne ends had shamefully inieigned, by drawing him into obligations of two hundred and fifty thousand pounds) openly termed and used as the King of Sicily, (for which also hee did this annexed Seale) highly pleasing himself in the variety of a waitfull Title to his owne, and his whole Kingdomes extreme impoverishment.

Anno 40.

(86) The Calamities of the Kingdoms in these exhaustings, was the more lamentable, because they were countenanced by the King, who should have repelled them. But the Pope having no so easie way to be supplied as by the King, nor the King any but by the People, both Pope and King were well accorded to grudge the people each for the others viz; the King to satisfy the Popes Avarice, the Pope to advance the Kings Ambition. The gaying of the Kingdom of Sicilie must be the colour, for which the King was resolved to goe in person; and therefore Edmund (the Popes Agent) sent to gather the Tenth of all England, Scotland and Ireland, for the Popes use and the kings, indifferently, had called called a great Counsel the former yeere, and adinured it till this; where he also required all the Prelates to hinder themselves to the Popes merchants, as having received of them a great sum of money, which was imploied to the use of their Churches. At which grieffull and vntre deuile the Prelates replied they would rather die then suffer such oppression, and that they held it a manifest Martyrdom to die in such a cause, then was the death of Thomas Becket. The Nobles also peremptorily refused either to recouer tithe, or to beare the charge thereof, being both impossible; the one for the strength of Ansfrède, the other for the present povertie of England. And indeed soone after the Pope and Ansfrède were made friends, and so King Henrie and King Edmund beguiled one of his great expenses, the other of his high hopes. The King was herewith wakened out of a sweete dreame wherein till then he continued, feeding his minde with the hope to leaue to either of his sons a kingdom; though neither so he rested quiet till he had almost throwne the Crowne into the gulphes of irreconcilable debts and viciarie. The young King of Scots and his Queene, about this time came into England to visite their best friends, the King and Queene of this Kingdom, which lay wholly open to their honor and vices. The King to let his sonne in law fee how welcome he was, did bestow vpon him the Earldome of Huntingdon; They and their Queenes with almost all the great Lords and Ladies of England met at Woodstocke by Oxford, from whence they came to London. The King was unwilling to denie his sonne in law and daughter any thing, for at their earnest suite he pardoned Sir Willielm de Lile, Knight Sheriffe of Northamptonshire, who was proued to haue practised by most foule suborned treachery to spoile another Gentleman of his estate: for which the said Lile had died a shameful, but a worthy death, by drawing and hanging, had not his wifes teares and prayers made the King and Queene of Scots their intercessors. Thus the young Princes returned into Scotland, worthily well contented.

Alexander king of Scots and his Queene highly encouraged in England.

Princes to compare themselves as those wickedly, judged worthy of death.

The King comes in person to the Court of Exchequer and makes orders there.

(87) The King much the frether to vndergoe serious affaires, by reason of the late comfort he had in his Childe the Queene of Scots, bestirres himselfe, and comes in person into the Exchequer among the Barons thereof, when the Court was set, and made sharpe orders against all Sheriffes and Baylies of Towns incorporate, who did not yeerly appeare at the Exchequer, to pay such money of the Kings as was come to their hands. At the same time all the Sheriffs of England were amerced, because they had not disfreined all those which had such estates in land, as the law limiteth to take the order of Knighthood, or pay their fines. Which of the Lords could say now, that the King would not prove a good husband! Howbeit the case of the people seemed nothing releued, for (saith Pieris) there were so many petty Tyrants by the negligence or conniueance of one, that the ancient State of England, when it had many Kings, seemed to be brought in againe.

(88) Occasions of expence like the heads of Hydra daily increased. The Welch (oppress by Geoffrey de Langley an officer vpon the Marches) rose in armes, and misliued one of those occasions, but that Prince Edward, to whom his Father had given Wales, was left therein to himselfe, for his Father could spare no money. The Prince therefore borrowes some thousands of markes of his wicke Richard, and with his owne and then wagheth Souldiers; his seruants behaued themselves most violently euery where, taking without paiement, or paying with blowes; and it was the humor also of their young Master, who had store of martiall and stirring fire in his boosome. The Welch therefore would not for any persuasions be drawne to lay downe weapons, but hauing about ten thousand of their country hurfemen, and many more on foot, tooke a solemn Oath, that they would stand together for their libertie and ancient lawes, holding it better to die with honour, then to live a wretched life in shame and seruitude. And indeed they did great things vnder Prince Llewelyn ap Griffith, by whose meanes they valiantly recovered all the Inland-countrey of Northwales, with other places; and in one fight slew above two thousand Englishmen, and drave the rest out of the field. They also spoiled the land to the very gates of Chesler. This they had the greater opportunitie to doe, for that the King, while he was Kingdome in the Clouds, and plunged himself into the Abysses of Vitiy, suffered some few, his sonne, his brother, the Earle of Gloucester, and his halfe-brothers with their families to trample rich and reason vnderfoot, and with his hatred to enrich themselves, his owne meanes daily consuming, and mens mindes more and more alienated from him, as men that despaired of redresse and iustice. The Welch also persisting in their enterprise, made Prince Edward retire in a bataille, and he complaining to his Father, had no other comfort but this: what is that to me? the land is thine of my gift. Put forth thy strength at first, and get honour in thy youth, that from thenceforth thy enemies may stand in feare of thee. As for me I haue somewhat else to doe.

The high road and noble conquest of the Welch.

(89) The greatest worldly forrein honour that (since Constantine) ever fell vpon any English subject, was at this time, in regard both of his birth and riches, deuised and tendered to Richard, Earle of Cornewall, brother to the King, to whom was sent an honorable Ambassage out of Germanie, who, in humble manner declared, that the Princes of the sacred Roman Empire had elected him King of Romane, beseeching him to accept of that their common chiefe. In testimonie whereof the Archbishop of Colen, high Chancellor of the Empire, Prince Elector, and other great Lords of Alemaine had sent their writings vnder seale, affirming, *That neuer was as one with so generall consent and vniuersall good liking elected to that place as he his name carrying it clearly without any contradiuision among them. Vpon receipt of this most honourable intimation and offer, there was much debatement in the Chappell where they sate vpon the Earles behalf, whether he should accept thereof or no; but while all of the flood in doubt the king pates in a deciding voice, saying: Let my brother be thought faint hearted, my spirit is so quick, that he would not refuse to accept this honor, which God can make it more to him. This made the Squadron of the negariques to giue way, and at last wile to become Neutrals, till all objections were answered, as they were all of them by one or other, concluding in their speeches to the Earle; *T hat he should bee warned, and withall stirred up to the service of God, in acceptance of this highest place, by the example of Robert Curthose Duke of Normandy (elder sonne of William the first, King of England) to whom the Kingdome of Ierusalem, for the content to rule the inheritance of Christ was offered, which he refusing to accept, did afterwards feele the grievous wrath of God, and neuer had happy daies after.

A. D. 1257.

To these and many other reasons the King, his halfe brothers, and speciallie the Elect of Winchester encouraged him with one voice affirming, that his honour would exalt the English name for euer: The Earle therefore putting on the main with a free and cheerfull voice answered: And I relying vpon the goodness of Almighty God, though I am insufficient, or unworthy, to assume the name of saintnesse, doe thankfully accept this burthen and honour, which Heaven (I hope) hath put into my hands. And then turning himselfe to the Bishops who were present, among which Richard Bishop of Bauger (from whose mouth our author wrote those things) was one, he concluded and said: Let mee before I depart out of this Chappell, doe, and suddenly be burnt with the fire of Hell, if I doe accept thereof either for ambition, or avarice; but onlie to restore the Empire (which God grant)

The English
emperor in the day of Richard was ever to be to the French

to a better estate, and to govern them, who have willingly elected me for their Lord, in modest, just and honourable manner. These words calied joyfull teares from oif many of the hearers, and the Ambassadors returned to deliver the oewes of this acceptance, who from thenceforth was King of Rome, that is Emperor elect, which title was vied till they receive the Crowne imperiall; though to all other purposes he is Emperor, so that King of Rome seems to answer to the Title of Caesar, which vnder the ancient Roman Emperours was given to the heire apparent of the Empire or Coadiucors. After the German Ambassadors were gone, the King permit-teth his brother to send some over to sound the truth of the Electors and Peoples affections, which (in regard the English were originally German, and by late affinity incorporated, and for that English (with Paris) was in a fort agreeable to the Alman tongue) they found entire, and with that certitude returne. The King of England hereby seemed to have his designs for recovery of Normandy, greatly strengthened, the Alman and French hardlie brooking one the other; but howsoever, sure it is that his brother the new King, had occasion to spend the golden Oyle, which was so long in gathering, to maintain the light of this Imperiall lampe; and without question hee might bee liberall, for he was reputed to possesse so much ready coine, as would every day for tenne yeeres afford him an hundredth marks vpon the maine stocke, without reckoning his rents & revenues in Germany, and the English dominions. The Earl was tooo after crow-

(90) In the meane time, while his brothers royall preparations were in hand, the King being for a weekes space at the Abbey of S. Albans, certaine matters of Oxford brought a great complaint against the Bishop of Lincoln, for some encroachments vpon the ancient liberties of that Vniuersitie, to whom the King was gracious and assigned a day, & Matthew Paris, whom the King in honor of his learned penes, admitted euery day to his table, and Chamber, laid to him vpon this Complaint;
* My Liege, for Gods love haue a care of the English State of the Church. The Vniuersity of Paris (the Nurse, and mother of many holy Prelates) is not a little disquieted. If as the same issue the Vniuersity of Oxford should be disturbed, which is the second School of the Church, yet the fundamentall base thereof, it is greatly to be feared, least the whole Church do fall to ruine. Whereunto the King made answere, God forbid that should happen at all; but chiefly in his daies. Which the Parliament then at hand, he accordingly prouided for, to their contentation. The memory of the King seemes by this to haue bene excellent, for beside that hee recounted to Paris all the Kings of England which had bene Canonized Saints, all the Princes Electors, and great Princes of Germany and France, he called to minde the names of about two hundred and fifty Baronies in England.

(91) At this Parliament, (which was exceeding great) holden at London, the King in sight and view of all the people, brings forth his younger sonne Edmund attired like an Italian of Apulia, (which Country is a member of the Kingdome of Sicilia) and vied this speech: Behold here good people, my sonne Edmund, whom God of his gracious goodnesse hath called to the excellencie of kingly dignitie; how comely and well worthy he is of all your fauours, and how earnest and praiseworthy they are, who at this pinch, would deny him effectuall and timely helpe, both with aduise and money. The summe of all was to draw a vast contribution from the Clergie for attienement of this shadow (it pro- ued no better) into his Coffers. Neuertheless he obtained a grant of about fiftie thousand Marks, vpon covenant that the liberties of the Realme should be reaily and finally once for ever established; which was done. There were present in this Parliamen six Archbishops, Canterbury, York, Dublin, Colen, Arles 10 Sicilia, and Taranton 10 Apulia. The politick Germans knew what they did in choosing Richard their King, for they saw a cloud of gold and silver would dissolue it selfe into shoures among them at his ar-riuall; and all elections of strangers came to their profit, because none is chofen that relies wholly vpon the rents of the Empire.

(92) It was a worthy care in this King, that when by the prouision of his brother Richard King of Rome, there arrived in the riner of Thames fiftie hie of German Ships, laden with come to relieve the great dearth, which then raigne through the Land, he caused proclamation to be made, *That no Citizen of London should buy any of that come to fure up, which they were wont to doe, to the intent they might sell it at the deare afterward, so such as wanted. But no warning, prayers, aduices, nor fensle of wants were able to make him frugal of his expenle; whereby he was miserably streightened, neither would the Laity in Parliament contribute anything, but (hammering some great attempts to their thoughtes) in plaine words concluded, That they neither would, nor could any longer endure such (they called them) extorsions.
Moreover they there vntered many granteances, and Simon Earle of Leicester complained of the dishonor and ioiroy done him by William de Valence, calling him Traitor; so that against the Session to be holden vpon prorogation, he, the Earle of Gloucester, and Marshall, confederated themselves and (pretending the feare of strangers the Kings fauorites,) determined to come strong to Oxford at Saint Barnabas day.
They also sent messengers to the King of France, praying at least so much assistance, as that he would not hinder the good purpose which they held of or-* ordering and fixing the troubled estate of England. They had also taken order to watch the Ports against strangers. Thus they prepared to abate (as it seemed) or banish the insolence and insolence of Peilounes and of other Forreiners, by whom the King was powerfully lewd, for they deprived of redress at his hands, who like another Protem (as Pars saith) took all shapes upon him to serve his turnes, and then slip out at his pleasure, no promises, or ties being strong enough to hold him. These were the beginnings of bloody evils, and the frede-sparks of those furious fires which afterward brake forth, from the sight and sense whereof, many thousands were taken by death, whose mortall stroke of pestilence raged over England, specially among the poore through scarcity of food.

(91) When the time appointed for the Parliament at Oxford was come, the infamous Earles and Barons (with whom^o sundry Bishops had taken Council against the King the Lords announced) repaired thither, and firmly propounded sundry trayterous Articles to the King, to which they required his assent. The chiefe points were, That the King would constrainedly keepe and observe the Charter of liberties, which he had of old granted, and severn to maintain unmovable; That such a one should be in the place of Chiefe Justiciar who would judge according to right, without respect to poore or rich, &c. Then they renewed their confidence, solemnely swearing, That neither for life nor death, nor love nor hate, they would be access to violent to their purpose, till they had cleared England (in which their lives and their Forfeitures were borne) from vsurpations and abuses, and had recovered lawfull Statutes. Those turbulent Nobles had yet a further plot, then all this; which was first broached (saith Mat. West.) by the disloyall Bishops, which was that 24. persons should there be chosen, to have the whole administration of the King and State, and speedy appointment of all great Officers, referring only to the King the best place at meetings and consultation of honour in publick places. And because they would not be crossed in their purposes, they came exquisitely armed and appointed, that so the King and his Adversaries should be enforced, if they would not willingly assent. To all their wickedness at the King and Prince Edwards as enforced to swear, for fear of perpetuall imprisonment, the traitor our Lords having by an Evil pleasure death to all that resisted. Whereupon all the Peeres and Prelates took their Corporall Oath to be faithful in this their infidelity, and made all who would abide in this Kingdom, to swear they would stand to the tryall of their Conscience: the Archbishops and Bishops solemnely asserting all that should rebell against it. The Monks themselves detesting this impudent treason, alke with what forehead, episcopal Priests, dar'd thus unpious the King, to advise against their future fidelity to him? This conspiracy they so prosecuted, that when Willelmus de Warenne the Kings halfe-brother, denied with Oathes to render up any Castle which was given him, the Earle of Leicester, and the rest of the Barons answered, they would rather lose his Castles or his head. This violent proceeding so terrified the Peilounes, that suddenly they left Oxford, and shortly fled into France, where also the Barons had made them odious. Hugh Bigod, brother to the Earle Marshall, was made chiefe Justiciar. The people, seeing whole wholy things, which made the Barons so rough and contemptory in all their conferences, that when the Lord Almaric sonne to the King of Almaine, refused to combine or take their oath, without his Fathers consent, they roundly bad him know, That if his father himselfe would not hold with the Barons of England, he should not have a farre word of earth among them. And besides a thing which might tend to their security, should seeme to be omitted, they viling the Kings name, commanded London to stand upon her guard, by keeping their Cities gates carefully shut, & by maintaining strong watches night by night, upon presence of danger to the Realme through the practices of strangers, and after they dispatched thither certain sic Agents, who in the Guild-hall made known their commission, which was directly to understand, whether they would immediately adhere to the Barons and obey their constitution, by manifestly and effectually supporting them in the common cause. Whereunto the Citizens descended, binding themselves thereunto under the publicke seale of London.

(94) The Barons did as yet forbear to declare, what those reformatorie Propositions should be, because the Earle of Gloucester (a principal man among them) was in danger of death, whose sickness did perplex & suspend their proceedings, & the manner of his maladie did put them in doubt of their owne safeties, making them grow in distrust of their Cooks, their butlers, and stewards, for the Earle his body breaking out into pestilence, and his haire, nailes, teeth and skinnie it selfe, falling away, was (as many others, of which some died) thought to be poisoned. But whether they were or no, the Peilounes and strangers had the blame laid upon them, to make them the more odious to the Commons. But the Earle partly reconciled his health in time by the benefit of medicines and diligent attendance. The Propositions were laid to have been tempered in the house of Elm a few after ward baptized. The King himselfe perhaps would not have beene soery, if that be, Simon Earle of Leicester and some few others of the Barons had bene with God, for howsoever his body was among them, yet his heart was not at quiet, which in this wise well appeared. For being in the month of June upon the river of Thames in his barge, the sky suddenly grew dark, and there ensued a terrible shower with thunder and lightning, of which the King impatient commands himselfe to be set on land at the next place which was Darham house, whereas then, the Earle of Leicester lay. The Earle being thereof certified came out to entertain him, saying, Sir why are you afraid? The tempest is now past: whereunto he answered with a severe looke: I fear thunder and lightning about me, because, but by the head of God, I do more feare them then all the thunder and lightning of the world. Whereunto the Earle replied: My lord it is in vain, and incredible that you should stand in feare of me, who have alwayes bene loyal both to you and your Realme, whereas you ought to feare your enemies, such as desire the Realme and abuse you with bad Counsels. The Barons therefore remaining time in their first purpose, sent messengers abroad to will all such as had bene wronged by the Kings halfe-brothers and other Peilounes and strangers to present their grievances to the Barons, and to prosecute them. Moreover (because sundry other petty-tyrants of the English nation, encouraged by their example, had exceeded their limits, in oppressing their inferiours) they procured the King to appoint four Knights Commissioners in euerie shire, to enquire of all such miseries, and certifye the same vnder their seales within a certaine time limited.

(95) The Barons in the meane time neglected not their enterprise, at whose instance (principally of Hugh Bigod the new chiefe Justiciar) Philip Lord the Kings Treasurer, for abuses committed in the Kings Forreills and game about Stony-Strawford, and many Officers of the Exchequer, were likewise removed, to give roome to such as the Barons better liked. The Sheriffs likewise of Shires, their practices, and extortions were diligentlly scene into, and it was ordained, that aswell the piers as takers of bribes should be severely punish. The welth seeing these round proceedings in England, the peace & reformation whereof they feared, labored for reconciliation but could not then obtaine it.

(96) Richard King of Romans, having a desire to see the King his brother, and his lands in England, not without a purpose to bring an Armie, or such a number of men as might greatly strengthen the King against the Barons, as they suspected, was advertised that they provided for his resistance as well by land as sea. This made him, his wife, and sonne, to lay aside that purpose, and to arrive in a priore maner at Dover with a small traine, in which there were onely two Earles, and about nine Knights. The king met him with great congratulation at the Sea side, but not King, nor hee could be suffered to enter into Dover Castle, because (forsooth) it was the principall Key of England, for the safeguard whereof they openly exacted an Oath of him at Canterbury in this manner. The holy Gospels being laid upon the Pulpit in the Chapter-house of Canterbury, the Barons reverently brought in thither the Kings of England and of Aquitaine, then Richard Earle of Gloucester (for Simon Earle of Leicester was gone with others into France, to deale with the King and States thereof about a perpetual league) standing in the midst openly, and in humble words called Richard King of Romans unto him, by the name onely of Richard Earle of Cornwall, who obeyed accordingly, to whom hee distinctly ministered the Oath following: Here all men that I Richard Earle of Cornwall have sworn upon the holy Gospels, to be faithful and forward to reforme with you the Kingdom of England, hitherto by the counsel of wicked men too much deformed. And I will be an efficient Assistant to expell the Rebels and trouble of the Realme, from out the same. This oath will I enforce upon paine to forfeit all the lands I have in England. On the other side (had the King known how to vicia) there fell out such dissention between the Earles of Gloucester and Leicester, that Leicester departed from England discontented, saying, he tooke no ioy to live among men so mutable and deceitfull. Nevertheless such means were used, that these two chiefe Captaines of the Barons, brake not forth into any further diuision. Thus while the Barons using the Kings name, disposed of all things, and Simon de Montfort Earle of Leicester, was gone with others to transact with the French about an indissoluble league, the King himselfe through desire not to be interrupted with foreaine matters, if warre should rise at home, or through want of money or better aduise, was induced (if not betrayed) to an act of little honour, though it carried with it the face of profit and felicitie quiet.

(97) For (the affaires of the realm thus strangely managed) the King in person suiles ouer into France, there to demand a penceable restitution of such Signiorities as Philip & Lewis (father of this Lewis) had iniuriously withdrawne from his father King John. The French replied, that no restitution was due for many respects, specially, because the * ancient grant made to Rolls the first Duke of Normandy, was not voluntary, but extorted by force and force of Armes, in the dayes of the weak state of France. The King having * no disposition to recover his claim by battell, and destitute of money wherewith to wage an Arme, but principally for that his owne Peeres and people stood on their guard against him, did * unwillingly raise a conclusion (the Articles whereof were, that the King of France should quietly hold the Dukedom of Normandy and Earldome of Angou * Maine, Anjou, Touraine and Poitou) for * three hundred thousand small pounds of Touraine, and upon promise to receive other lands to the yearly value of twenty thousand pounds. Payd (saith, that the repared limits of the English Pale in France, were from thenceforth the river of Charente in Gasconie and the mountains Pyrénées, and that hee should peaceably have Angoumois, Quercy, and Limousin, being Countries marching upon Gasconie, in lieu of the rest, yet so as the King of England should * hold them of the Crowne of France by homage and fealty. Upon these Articles the king acquiesced, and for ever renounced all his challenge to Normandy & the other lands, and thenceforth abridged his Seale, and changed his Seale, using a Scepter in place of a Sword: whereon these Monks and mockish verses were written.

(98) The King (at these unworthy rates) having secured himselfe from the French, laboured to vindicate the Regall power out of the usurping Barons hands (whose over-coppings at home had drinen him to those foraine indignities,) alledging, that the Oath which his sonne and hee had taken at Oxford, was void, in regard it was compulsorie, that the Barons also, who pretended the profite of the Realme, sought onely their owne honour and gain, contrary to their decrees. For his more security he takes the Tower of London, preparing force by the helpe of his brother King of Romans. There followed a grievous perturbation of the Realme, although at this time it brake not forth into the extremity, Armes being laid downe for a little space. Edward the Kings eldest sonne would not trauctie the oath he had made at Oxford, but held with the * Barons for the present. The King, the Queene, and his selected friends, still remaine upon their guard in the Tower; where hee (in the yeere before) had buried yve locks of the ancient Depository, or dead stocke of the Crown, to employ against the Barons. was notwithstanding brought about againe by the Queene's speciall diligence; and Deuor and Ancheſter Castles (whether hee went in person) are deliuered vnto him. This makes him refuse to partise the Barons; the rather also for that the French King (who much condemned the Barons vniuersall) had promised his assistance. Henry therefore thrusts out the Barons Chancellor, & Chief Iusticiar, placing Walter Mareschall & Philip Basset, men of much more loyall affections to their soveraign. The Barons hearing of this, hasten in Armes to Winchester, where the King was, who (having intelligence by his faithful Clerk, Sir John Mansel) got back into the Tower of London. The King of France was made Vnpire in the quarrell. The cause was heard at Amiens, where hee gaue iudgement with the King of England against the Barons, pronouncing all the Statutes and Acts made at Oxford, to be utterly void; provided neuerthelesse, that the Charter of Liberties which King John had made to the English nation, should in no sort be thereby infringed. This pronounced Simon Armes of Leicester, and the Barons, to maintain all the Statutes of Oxford, (because they were preccedently founded vpon that Charter) notwithstanding that iust iudgement which King Lewis had given. The secret confederacy with London Prince of Wales, misliked to the Barons no little encouragement; who about this time waited the Dominions of Prince Edward in the Marches of Wales. This iudgement of the French King did much disaduantage the Barons, of whom diuers being drawne with perswasions, gifts, and promises, revolted from Simon Mansel. There was now a striking of Townes and Prisoners on all hands. Prince Edward (who now was wholly for his Father in despite of the Barons) takes the Castell of Bristol, and fines the City at a thousand pounds. Simon Mansel encountereth his greatest reuenges vpon the Queene's friends which were Aliens, not sparing the Kings. Marching forward, he recouers Gloucester Castell, enters Worcester and Bridgenorth; lastly, surpriseth the Ile of Ely, subduing that lastnesse or fenny strength to the Barons wife. Sir John Mansel the Kings Counsellor, fearing the euent of things, flies secretly from the Tower where the King was. Henry comes to the King of Almaine, was after this taken by the Barons. Meane while Prince Edward fortifies Winſlor Castell with frangers. Mutual wearienes at length begat a desire of peace, and the King had yielded that the Statutes of Oxford should stand: but the Queene was vterly against it, not without cause; for it did enfeble the arbitrarion which the French King had made. The Queene's opposition in this point was knowne to the Londoners, which put the baser sort into so lewd a rage, that they being to throte the Bridge from the Tower toward Winſlor, which with dirt and stones and villanous words forced her to returne. Prince Edward vnder the conduct of the Bishope of Worcester, came from the Castell of Bristol (by reason of quarrell betwene his men of warre and the Barons) and contrary to his promise entered into Winſlor Castell; but afterward going forth to meet Simon Mansel at Kingſlow vpon 7 homes, with purpose to offer peace, the said Simon goes to Winſlor Castell, & would not permit him to depart. At London yet in a Parliament, matters were pieced againe, and the Kings side grew stronger daily.

by reason of their multitude, being about a thousand (such as William de Roffenger who then liued) of those only whose names were entered into the Matriculation books, amongst whom being so many young Nobles, the King doubted how they might be affected to the Barons. Whereupon many of them went to Northampton, where then the Barons were strong; and thither the King coming with his host, and breaking in at the Towne-walles vpon Passion Sunday, encountered his enemies, amongst whom the Students of Oxford had a banner by themselves advanced right against the King, and they did more awny him in the fight, then the rest of the Barons; which the King (who at length perswayed) had vowed sharply to reuenge, but that his Counsellors told him, that the Students were the fittest and kindest of the Great-men of the Land, whom if hee punished, once the English who new stood for him, would take Armes against him. The King there took Simon Mansel the younger, and fourteene other principall Barons and Knights Barons, forty other Knights, besides Esquiers, &c. Encouraged with this successe, hee advanced the Standard royall toward Northampton, burning and waiting the Barons lands whereouer hee came. To diuert this tempest, Simon Mansel halleneth to London, and attempts the taking of Rochester Castell, which John Earle of Warren defended for the King; who coming to raise the siege, takes Kingſlow Castell, which belonged to the Earle of Gloucester; then vnexpectedly falling vpon such as maintained the siege of Rochester, while Simon was absent, kills verie many, and scatters the rest. Then leueth hee the Castell of Tambridge, and therein the Countesse of Gloucester, whom, notwithstanding hee nobly set at large, as professing not to warre against Ladies; from thence the Cloud of power borne vpon the wings of indignation, speedes to Winchester, and receiues the Cinque-Portmen to grace, setting at last in Leuiss, where himselfe resided in the Priorie, and his sonne in the Castell, winneth the Barons first letters to him, protesting their loyal obedience to his person, but all hostility to their enemies which were about him.

(100) But the King flaming with desire of reuenge, lets flye by these vowed (but fained) fidelities; and returns a full defiance as to Trenton, professing that hee takes the wrong of his friends as his own, and their enemies as his. The King of Almaine, Prince Edward, with other of the Kings chiefe friends, sent their like letters of defiance. The Barons, loath to let it come to the hazardous and vnkind trial of Steele, (though they then encamped about six miles from Leuiss;) nor acquiescing themselves in this repulse, iterate their messages, with an offer to pay to the King thirty thousand pounds, in satisfaction of such hurts as their people had done through the Realmes, so as the Statutes of Oxford might stand. The King of Almaine (whose honour they had toucht, and did poore part of his liberities) hindered all harkening to any their offers.

(101) It came to a batell, wherein Simon de Mansel commands his traitorous Army to weare white Cresset on breast and backe, to shew they fought for iustice; great was the effusion of blood on both parts; chieftie of the Scots vpon the Kings side, & of the Londoners vpon the Barons side; a whole Battalion, (lead by the Lord Seymour) Prince Edward most furiously charged, and had the execution of them for about foure miles, which hee purified the more bloodily, in reuenge of the extreme disgrace which they had offered vpon London Bridge to the Queene his Mother, and after that the Garrison of Tambridge followed, and flew many at Croydon. But while the Prince spent himselfe in that reuenge, his Father (who, having his Horse slain vnder him, had yielded himselfe prisoner to Simon de Mansel) this while the King of Romanes, and others great Peeres were taken, and the whole hope of that day lost. There fell in all on both sides, about five thousand. Prince Edward returning from the slaughter of the Londoners, would would have reinforced the Battaille, but the Barons offered peace, which vpon the next day was concluded for the present, so that Prince Edward and Henry Iohn to the King of Rome, should also render them felues prisoners, and the two Kings, till such time as all quarrels might receive an happier conclusion by calme deliberation. Thus was Simon Earle of Leicester in possession of both the kings and of their elder Iohnes, so fortunate may Treason and Rebellion bee for a time, but in the end it speedes as it deferves.

(102) By this advantage this Kingly Rebelle got all the chiefe Castles of the Kingdome into his hand, leading his Sovereigne as his Prisoner about the Countrey (yet with all outward respect and honour) the rather to procure a more quiet surrender. The King of Rome here imprisoned in the Tower, Prince Edward and the Lord Henry in Dover. The Earle feeling now his owne greatness began to be lesse tractable; neither could the Popes authority interposing it selfe for the King, prevaile. For as the Pope by Apostolicke sentence before had absolved the King and others from his Oath to the Provisions of Oxford, so now he sent his Cardinall Legate to excommunicate all the Faunders of these Articles, comprisers of the King, but these men hauing the material sword to trust vnto made no reckning of the Spirituall, pretending they appealed to the Pope, or to better issues, or a generall Council, or to God himselfe: so great account made these crossed Iouliets of the Popes curle. Now withstanding the loyall blood of Roger de Mortimer, and many other high spirited men of Armes, could not brooke their Kings loyall base viage and dangerous estate, but make head, in vaine. For Simon treacherously combes himselfe with Leoris Prince of Wales, and with their ioint forces takes Hereford Castle: thertoe they remoue Prince Edward from Dover. The loyall band was hereby compelled to capitulate, and deliver hostages, & the fearfull point, to which England was brought at this present, but God (in whose protection it was) deliuered it. Simon and the Earle of Gloucester fall at debate about their Diuidend and shares in the spoiles, (for what euer they pretended for the Kingdome, their owne greatnes and gaine was the motive, and somewhat also the vnequall altitude of his said partner the Earle of Leicester, together with the perill of his Countrey moued him. Who thereupon confederates, with Roger Mortimer and his associates, to whom not long after, Iohn Earle of Warren, Surrey and Sussex, and William de Valence Earle of Pembroke with others are ioyned, and not long after, Prince Edward by escape from the Castle of Hereford, commeth in safetie to Wigmore. There were that laboured to attone the two Earles of Leicester and Gloucester, but offence and indignation had taken too deepe tooete. Meanewhile thow, & Henry are flew vp and down by the Arch-rebellious Earle of Leicester, to countenance thine owne destruction.

(103) The Prince therefore seeing that he must resolutely stand for the liberty of the Realme and of his Father, friends and posterity, raiseth an Armie, confederates himselfe with the people and Countiees of Hereford, Worcester, Shropshire and Chester. Gloucester hee enters by force, and drives the defendants into the Castle, which after yeelds. Simon Montfort with Leoris Prince of Wales, doe in the meane time spoile their enemies lads in Wiltshire & Gloucestershire, the King in person, not in spirit, being present. Prince Edward and the Earle of Gloucester on the other side, speed to the Castle of Kewenorth, kept against them by Simon, sonne of the Earle of Leicester; there they intercept the Earle of Oxford with about thirtene Knights Bannerets before they could reach the Castle, whither they were halting. Newes came then that the Earle of Leicester was returned with the King in his companie out of Southwiche, nere to Worcester. Thertoe the Prince aduanceth to fight with him. The Earle hearing of his approach, encampes at Kenilworth with his whole power. Vpon the third of August the noble Edward lets out of Worcester, and strikes betweene Simon Montfort and his way to Kewenorth, and the next day turnes backe toward Kenilworth; the Earle of Gloucester with his force, and Roger de Mortimer (as they had agreed) with his battailon, drawing thertoe by two other waies; so that Simon thus shut vp and enclosed, must either fight or yeeld. They ioinc in battaille in a goodly large field before the Towne of Kenilworth; where the Earles both being assailed on all sides, was with much laughter (of the Welsh especiallie) vnto the end distressed and distressed. At the houre of his death it thundered and lightened, and so great a darknesse spread the skie that men were amazed. The Earles head, (which was lent to Worcester Castle to the Ladie Mortimer) his hands, and feet, were chopt off. In this crall Battaille the King himselfe (being wounded with a lance) was almost slaine. Let vs now behold how this victorie is vied. The King being thus restored to liberty, calls a Parliament at Worcester, by authority whereof hee seith into his hands the Charters and freedoms of the Citie of London, and of many other Townes for their Rebellion. Those that were taken in the battell are committed to safe Custody, and all such as had been vpon the Earls side were disinherited, a terrible distribution being made of their estates to the Kings well deterring friends. Simon and Guy de Montfort, the Earles sonnes, were chiefe of the attained; their mother the Countesse with all her goods was sent in safetie out of England neuer to returne. Simon the eldest brother sought to preferre himselfe, and the remains of his Fathers misfortunes in the Ile of Achadne.

(104) The King meaning to take all refuge from him, is together with his brother the King of Rome, Ottobon the Popes Legate, (who was lately arrived) and a puissant armie, at Northampton, with purpose to oppresse him by warre. Simon had friends about the King, but the Earle of Gloucester maligning his restitution to full grace, it was concluded (vpon his submission) that he should lye in exile, and for his maintenance receive only five hundred marks by the yeere. But the Castle of Kewenorth would not yeeld, driving the King to an halfe yeeres siege; who also in the end was content to giue the garrison pardon for life and limme, licensing it to part with bag and baggage. In the meane while the other outlaws and disinherited men, made sundry excursions out of the Ile of Ede. Temperate men, desirous to pacifie all these evils, would gladly haue had the king to pardon those transgressions, and restore their lands vpon reasonable fines. This proposition found a sower enemy of Roger Mortimer, who had by the kings gift gotten much of their land; which moued the Earle of Gloucester (who fauoured the other courte) to indignation and distrust, so that he withdrew himselfe. Not long after which, hee by his messengers be sought the king, to remove strangers from about him, soe that the Statutes of Oxford were obserued throughout the kingdome, and to keepe such promises as he had made at Kenilworth. Otherwiese the king must not maruile, if the day that him selfe thought best. The Legate Cardinall Ottobon, about the same time (to hinder the growth of anie new rebellion) excommunicated the Bishops of Worcester, Worcester, London and Chichester for hauing adhered to Simon Montfort, and also declared that the Clergie were to pay their tenths, for seven yeeres next ensuing, to the king. On the other side, all the vndone and disinherited men (except the sonnes of Simon Montfort and Robert Earle of Derby) were offered to be put to ranfome, and for certaine fines to be restored to their lauds; but they required to haue them without redemption, expostulating with the king and Legate many grieuances. When words had no better operation, the King and Prince Edward besiege the Ile of Ely on all sides. This being known to the Earle of Gloucester, who (although hee had vnder his feale promised neuer to take armes against the King and Prince, but only in his owne defence) gathers a force

Then commands he the Pope's Legate, who lodged in the Tower, to yield vp the same; but he, as taking no knowledge of any such matter, repaired quietly to Pauls, there, by preaching to stirre vp people against the enemies of Christ in the Holy-land. (107) Domestick peace now beginning to shine in the English Hemisphere, Prince Edward his brother, the Lord Edmund, the Earle of Gloucester with many other Noble men of England, with intent of a more honourable warfare, take the Crosse vpon them at Northampton, by the demerit of Ottobon, who not long after returned into Italie. Then was the Kings peace proclaimed through England, all men being vpon paine of death commanded to forbear to make spoiles, or take booties violently, as they of late had been accustomed. The Prince, seeing the Realme thus acquitted, doth the more willingly (having his Fathers consent) yield to goe with Lewis King of Fraunce, into the holy land, who, toward his furniture in that voyage, lends him thirty thousand markes: for assurance whereof the Prince morgageth Aquitaine vnto him. But what true felicitie peace may we iudge it, when John de Warrens Earle of Surrey the Kings halfe-brother (vpon the increase of words betwene them) durst kill Alan le Louch the chiefe Iustice, with his owne hand in Westminster Hall? A plaine and fearefull example of favorites potencie. That all things yet might not run out of square, the King held a Parliament at Marlborough where the Seacutes called of Marlborough were enacted. The old King and his Queene henceforward enioyed the blessing of a quiet estate at home, with the more iusture to pray therein for their sonnes faire successe in Palestine, whose vertues had there raised an admiration of him among the Infidels. That quiet neuertheless was a little interrupted by an incendiarie outrage at Norwich, where the Citizens set fire on the Priories Church. The king being kindled with another kind of fire, swore he would in person fee a ransome taken; and dispatching first away Sir Thomas Trere, (before whom a great multitude were found guilty, and condemned to be drawne and hanged) himselfe, hazing in his company one Bishop and the Earle of Gloucester, followed; where beholding the deformed ruines, he could hardly refrain from teares. The Bishop hauing therefore excommunicated the noceat, and the King condemned the Towne in three thousand markes, toward the reedification of that Church, as also to pay one hundred pounds for a Cup weighing ten pounds in gold, he purposed to returne toward London. This publike act of zeale to religion and iustice, was the last which he did, as a King; for now he was come to that, which hee was to enter into as a mortall man: At the Abbey of S. Edmund in Suffolke, he fell greetously sick, where while he lay, * he caused the Earle of Gloucester to be sworn to keepe the Realme for his sonne; the Prelates, Earles and Barons of the land, being assembled to be present at his departure. Therefore after hee had in Christian manner prepared his soule, by acknowledging his sinnes, and receiving his spirituall consolations, he rendered vp the same to his Redeemer. His will was short, for his Creditors and the Poore shared all his goods. The space of time which he reigned, is almost an old mans age, and absolutely the longest number of yeeres, that euer any King of England reigned, not excepting E-thebert the first Christian King, if (which is * written by some) he reigned fiftie six yeeres, and as manie

The royall remains of this happily-dying Prince were with all the due pompe of exequies interred in West-

His Wife.

(108) Eleanor the wife of King Henry, was the second of the five daughters, of Raymond Earle of Provence, sonne of Earle Alfonso sonne of Alfonso the first king of Arragon; her mother was Beatrice, daughter of Thomas Earle of Savoy, sister of the Earles of Anjou, and Peter, and the Archbishop Raimond of Canterbury. Shee was married to him at Canterbury, January 24. An. 1236. reg. 20: Crowned at Westminster the 19. of the same month: was his wife 37. yeeres, his widow 19. died at Non at Almsbury, the 25. of June, in the 20. yeere of her sons reigne 1294. and was buried in her monastery, the 11. of September following.

His Issue.

Edward their eldest sonne was borne at Westminster, the 28. day of June, the 24. yere of his Fathers Reigne, 1239. hee was named Laurence, of his tall and slender body, made knight in Spain of Calfia King of Castile, created Earle of Chester by his Father, after the said male extinct of the former Earles, and succeeded his Father in the kingdom of England.

(107) Edmund their second sonne, borne Jan. 26. A. 1245. and of his Fathers reigne, 20. y. was surnamed Crooked-backe, of bowing in his backe; saye some, but more likely of wearing the signe of the Crosse, (anciently called a * Crouche) vpon his backe, which was usually worne of such as vowed viages to Iherusalem, as he had done. He was inscribed in the King of Sicilia and Apulia, and created Earle of Lancaster, (on whole person originally the great contention of Lancaster and York was founded) and hauing of the grant of his Father, the lands of Somers Manserf and Robert Ferrers, (disinherited in the Barons warre) was by vertue of the same grant Earle of Leicester and Derby, and high Steward of England. He had two wives, the first was Aveline, daughter and heire of William Earle of Ailemarke, by whom he left no issue, the second was Queene Blanche, daughter of Robert Earle of Artois, (brother of Saint Lewis King of France) widow of Henry of Champagne, King of Navarre, and mother of Iohn Queene of France and Navarre, the wife of Philip the faire. By her he had issue three sons and one daughter. Thomas who after his Father was Earle of Lancaster, and hauing married Alice, daughter and heire of Henry Leis Earle of Lincoln, was beheaded at Pontefract without issue: Henry Lord of Monmouth, who after his brothers death was Earle of Lancaster, and father of Henry the first Duke of Lancaster: John, who died without marriage: and Mary, married to Henry Lord Percie, mother of Henry, the first Earle of Northumberland. This Earle Edmund died at Bayn in Gascoigne, Jan. 5. CHAPTER X.

Ann. 1273.

Edward, who followed K. Henry in wearing the English Crowne, but far oot-went him in all repail vertues, was abroad at the time of his fathers death, still pursuing his high desires for the Italy Carres: wherein what he performed, being yet but a Prince,) against the publicke enemies of Christians, it shall not bee impertinent to touch, before we come to his actions as a King; having already remembered, with what valour and felicity hee had subdued his Fathers domesticke enemies, reled the peace of his Kingdome, and reestablished the raignes of Soueraignty in his Fathers hands, which those potent Rebels had formerly extorted.

(1) King Lewis of France, whose persuasions had enflamed this ooble-spirited Prince to assaume him in this glorious quarrell, having first set forth for the enterprise, lay now in siege of Tunis in Africa; where Prince Edward with all his forces arriving, the French King (greatly reioycing in his wished preience,) together with the King of Navarre, and other Princes of his Army, went forth to meet him, and received him in the kilfe of Peace. This place which they beleaguered, was (as then) not great, yet by reason of the situation,* it greatly impeached the Christians in their passages through those Seas; being built out of the scattered ribs, and washed raignes of that mighty and famous City Carthage, rual once in Massey and Ambition with ancient Rome, as contending with her about the Empire of the World. Therefore to secure the Mediterranean Seas, it was thought necessary to beginne that enterprise for Affa, with this in Africa; but oot long after Lewis yielding vppe his holy Soule to God at the siege, and sicknesse (by reason of the heates in those Regions, for it was August) raigning in the Christian Campe, Charles King of Sicilie, whom Lewis (before his decease) had sent for, to take charge of the whole enterprise, arrives; and after sharp reinforcement of the siege, (where Edward gave frequent proofe of his great valour and prudence,) Charles is content to forebear extremity, (to which the Saracens were brought) upon capitulations with them, contrary to Edward's mind, being wholly set to subdue, convert or root them out.

Prince Edward unwilling to any truce with the Saracens.

Paul. Atrop.

(3) Yet the points of the treaty & truce (though granted for many yeeres) carried shew of honour, being these: 1. that all Christian Captives should be set free without ransom: that in the Cities of that Kingdom, the Christian faith might freely be taught: 3. that all such as were willing, might freely receive sacred Baptisme: 4. that the Saracens should repay to the Christian Kings, their charges: 5. that the King of Tunis should remain tributary to the King of Sicilie. The siege hereupon was raised, to the griefe and indignation of Edward, who would not (as is reported) partake nor share in any of the treasure, which by reason of the truce was payed by the Saracens, as accounting it to be wickedly gotten, and contrary to the Tenor of the vow, which for the honour and advancement of Christian Religion had beene made. The celestiall fo seeming to confirme so little; for the wrath of Heaven (such our * Author) purified King Charles, brother to the late King Lewis, and finding him out upon the sea in his returne toward Sicilie, took severall revenge by terrible weather, as well upon him, as almost his whole Army, which perished in the waters, together with the impious treasure brought from Tunis, and all other his furniture of State and Household. Which when Prince Edward understood, hee swore by the blood of our Lord, that though all his Companions in Armes and Countenances should abandon him, yet hee and Frederick his * Lackey alone would enter into * Jerusalem, and keepe the ope which hee had made, whilst scale and body held together. A noble resolution, and as faithfully performed; but not with so final attendance; for the English hearing his fervent asseveration, promised with one heart to accompanie him, and that (in all likely hood) the more willinglie, because it is not obliuious, that the tempest had any way daniſhed Edward, or his fellowship. He forthwith therefore sets sail toward Alema, into which hee entered safe not about four daies before the City should have beene yielded to the Saracens, from which precipitation theſe ſcours out of England withheld it. The Sultan of Babylon, who lay about Alema with a puissant host, and had begun to assault the breaches; hearing this, not long after raised his siege, and without the fruition of his desire withdrew to his owne Dominions.

(4) Edward undoubtedly was not more tall of personage then stout of courage, and upon trust thereof, doing some things, which perhaps a Prince of his hopes, and fortunes, might with good reason have forborne. His advanced courage against those Infidels may be gessed by the like against a domesticke Rebelle. Among those who were out-lawed for Rebellion & Treason, after the battell of Bartham for partaking with Samuel Earle of Leicester, was one Sir Adam Godard a Knight of the parts about Windsor, who with certaine his Complices kept out of the way of the Kings officers, but made the Kings high-way between Wilt and Furham (which by reason of woods and windings was fittest shelter enemies) very dangerous for such as meant to passe, but doing most mischief to the lands and goods of such as were the Kings friends. Edward hearing of this mans singular courage, gets intelligence of a fit time, and comes upon him with a strong band of followers, but he, nothing terrified, prepares himselfe to fight for his life to the last gaspe. The Prince hereupon commands that none of his men should dare to interrupt their Combat, and forthwith with equall courage exchanged mighty blowes without winning ground each of other. Edward delighted with the bravery of Adams spirit, and proofe of his manhood, had him yett, promising him life, and his lands againe; who presently throwing away his weapons, enjoyed the full benefite of Prince Edward's promise. The happinesse of that age, when Sword and Shield were the ordinary weapons, and afforded much assurance in fight, might somewhat excuse the Prince from the note of temerity, which otherwise, in hazarding his princely person against a private Gentleman, hee could hardly have escaped. But here at Alema hee refused an occasion of putting forth the naturall strengthes of his firme-compacted body, till by the Sultans retreat the most honourable opportunities were subtracted.

(5) All this while did that renowned and vertuous Lady, Eleanor, wife of Prince Edward, endure with him an inseparable companion of all his fortunes, and was at Alema delivered of a daughter baptizd there by the name of Isabel. But if God had not better provided for him, there was not likely to have enjoyed any longer the deare company of her loving Lord and Husband. Amongst that bloody Sect of Saracens, called Assassins, who, without feare of torments, undertake (upon command of their * Superior) the murder of any eminent prince, impugning their irreligion, was one Assazam, often vied by the Saracen Admirall of Ippre, as a Messenger betweene him and Edward, whom the Admirall pretended exceedingly to honour for his heroicke parts of mind and body. The desperate wretch by this employment getting credite and access, upon his insinuation of certaine secrets to be imparted, Prince Edward commanded all men to void the Chamber, when looking out of a window, the Assassine suddenly with a poisoned knife gives him three wounds, two in the arme, and one neere the arme-pit, whom Edward presently with his foot threw to the earth, wrung the knife from the Treasour, (not without wounding himselfe in the hand,) and with the cresel of a Table smote out his hraines. Then calling in his people, hee commands that the body of the villaine should be hanged up over the Cities Wall, and a lue dogge with him. The Admirall hearing of this trayterous attempt, is * ſaid to have sighed for sorrow, for that hee never knew thereof, but meant himselfe to have become a Christian. But when the Christians understood of this cursed assault upon the person of so renowned a Prince, they ment in revenge thereof, to have forthwith invaded the Pagans whereſoeuer. But the Prince (whose first care was the safety of Christians) said, I forbid you on the behalfs of God, that none of you yet presume to assault the Pagans Army, because many of our people are gone to visite the holy Sepulchre, who shall every one of them bee murdered by the Saracens, if they shall now ſlayne any (though but small) creature at our hands. The second care was of his wounds, which by reason of the envenomed blade were feared to be mortall, wherein the Lady Eleanor gave so rare example of coniugal affection, as her immortal memory doth iustly impart glory to that whole Sex. For when no medicine could extract the poison, shee did it with her tongue, licking dayly, while her husband slept, his racking wounds, whereby they perfectly clased, and yett her selfe recovered no harme, so ſingular a medicine is a wises Tongue garnished with the vertue of lovely affection.

(6) Thus while Edward abode in forraigne parts for the generall service of Christianity, against the encroaching Enemies thereof, (contending then to that lamentable Greatnesse, wherein our vnhappie times behold them;) his Father king Henric dies, and Prince Edward had the defect of his presence supplied by the faith and care of such venerable and noble persons, as his Father left behind him at his death. Therefore Robert Kilmarly Archbishop of Canterbury, Gilbert Earle of Gloceſter, with other the chief chiefe Prelates and Peeres of the land, assembling together at the New Temple in London, acknowledged and proclaimed abſent Edward for their Sovereigne Liege Lord; and by the assent of his Mother, the Queen Dowager, provided for the common affaires of the King, and the good estate of the Kingdome. The first wces of his Fathers death were brought vnto him, when after his return from the Holy-Land (which fruite hee was * enforced to forsake, having long in vaine expected the promised aids of Chrilians, and Tartars,) he reſted himselfe in Sinſia, with Charles the King thereof; where to the immortal commendation of his pietie, and filiall affection (rare in Princes) it is recorded, that the death of his Father and Heire, coming first to his eare, and afterward of the King his Father, hee much more sorrowed his Fathers departure, then his Sonnes: whereat King Charles greatly marvelled, and demanding the reason, had of him this answer: I be left of Sonnes is but light, because they are multiplied every day: but the death of Parents is irreparable, because they can never bee had againe.

(7) Now, whether it was the terror of such reo-enge as followed the captivation of his valiant Predecessor King Richard, or his owne wiser carriage, for the calmer condition of the times, or all of them together, which secured him in his returne: certaine it is, that hee travelled in great safety and honour over land from Sinſia to Rome, where he was met vpon the way with all the Cardinals, gratulating the honourable successe of his Chetivrie against the Turkes, his late returne, and new Kingdome. At his instance Pope Gregory * excommunicated the bloody-handed Gay Marſhal (because * his person could not easily be gotten, by reason of his Greatnesse, and power) with all his receders, and (vntill amends were made) put their whole Dominions vnder interdict, for that the said Gay, (Sonne to Simon, late Earle of Leicester, slain at the battell of Emſham) in reuenge of his Fathers death (for which he mortally bated all King Henrie race,) had most butcherly murdered * Henry of Almaine, King Edward his neere kinsman, vpon his returne toward England, in the raigne of the late King Henry, as hee was devoutly learning God in the Church at Fleſche in Italye, which horrible act induceth a * iudicious Author to suspect, that Gay also had a hand in that Assassination on Edward, who had slain his Father. This Gay being afterward taken by the Admirall of Arragon, to gratifie King Edward, was kept in prison, & the death of Henrie reuenged * with him. From Rome hee iournaed through the Cities of Italy, where he was generally entertained with exceeding ioy and honour; and as he was * entering into Savoy, at the footte, or descent of the Alpes, very many of the Prelates, and Peeres of England met him, acknowledging their gladnesse for his safety, and their duties to his Sovereignty. In his passage, hee gaue notable proofe of his great prowesse and strength at a Turnement (or rather * battell) against * the Earle of Chaboun, and his Burgundians for the said Count being a gallant man at Armes, after many blowes with the sword betweene King Edward and him, throwing away his weapon, graipt the King about the gorget, and bung vpon him with the weight of his mailed body, in hope to cast him to the earth; but the King, sitting vpright, without any bending, put spurres to his lully horse, and lifted the Count to hanging about his necke, quite from his Saddle, carrying him away, till hee had forcibly strooke him off to the ground, who recovering himselfe, & comming to redeme his disgrace, had such entertainment, as hee was contented to yeeld. In our effeminate and degenerate age, to omit such an achievement of a King of England in his owne person, had beene hainous and picauncious. Thus his renowne encreasing with his progresse, hee had magnificent entertainment in France, of Philip the King, to whom (vpon condition to have such territories restored, as were promised to his Father King Henrie, when he sold Normandie to the French) hee did homage for such Signiorities, as he held of the Crowne of France.

(8) And as well to shew his owne moderation & princely temperance, (a vertue which maketh every man a King in himselfe, and Kinglike to Gods) as also his reuerence to the Crowne of France, whose Homager hee was for his transmarine Dominions, Gauſes de Biern, a valiant man of Armes, being in actual rebellion against King Edward in his Duchie of Gascogne, was admitted to appeale for triall of his pretended causes to the French King, as the superior Lord. Many of King *Edward*s friends and Counſellours were vterly aduerſe to this fauour, as well because the said Gauſes had drawne the King to no small charge, and labour, as also for that now he was brought by ſtraite ſiege to such extremities, as that hee could no longer hold out, and himselfe, having all that while put his confidence in walles of stone, and the weapons point, there was also little reason to allow him an ordinary ciuill triall of his pretends for taking armes, and many perhaps, both thought the example, preiudiciall to King Edward and his Successors, by giuing way to such appeales, and distrust of the iustice of the French Court: Contrary to all which, the King decreed, and it was fortunate with him; for Gauſes (not long after) was condemned in France, and sent with * an halter about his necke, to prostrate himselfe to iustice, or mercy at King *Edward*s feete in England, who pardoned him the forfeiture of life, & (when hee had for certaine yeeres kept him prisoner at Wincheſter) set him at liberty, and sent him backe to his owne, who remained for euer after gratefully firme and loyall.

(9) King Edward (his transmarine affaires thus being sealed) arrived in England, where hee was after so long desirings most ioyfully welcome, and there, in the Church of Wincheſter, the magnificent new work of his deceased Father, who had with great cost, and after about fifty yeeres spent therein, almost finished the same) hee and his deare Elder were anointed, and crowned by * Robert Wickham Archbishop of Canterbury. There were present at this solemnity Queen Elenor the Kings mother, * Alexander King of Scots, the Duke of Burgundie, with multitudes of Peeres and others: where (as * one faith) for the more royall celebration of this great feare and honor of so martiall a King, there were five hundred great Horſes let loose, every one to take them for his owne, who could.

(10) The finall abolishment of succession of the Wales bloud in the Principality, or cheifdom of Wales now ensued: but yet (as great matters vie) not first without some time, and certaine degrees. The originall was this: King Edward having lent for Llewelin Prince of Wales to his Coronation, there to doe him homage, he, exulting the same, was againe (for that cause) admonished to repaire to the Kings Parliament at Westminster: whither likewise hee fore to come, pretending it was danger to his person, but * directing his excuse to the Archbishops of Canterburie and York, and their Suffraganes, professed his readinesse, if it would please the King, rather to send a Commission for taking his Oath and fealty, (who here him a deepe displeasure, cure * since Llewelin had put him, being then but Earle of Cheshire, to the woe) or else, to appoint some indifferent place, or give to him for hostages the * Kings sonne, and Robert Earle of Gloucester, with Robert Bornell the Kings Chamberlaine. But King Edward dissembling the arrogancie of the demand for the present, went forward in his Parliament, where the first Statutes, called of Westminster, and among them the Statute of Mortmain were enacted. But after the Parliament, the King repaired to his City of Cheshire, being very neere to Wales, and Llewelin foreſollowed his comming thither also; wherefore the King, resolving (for deniall of homage) to seize vpon the whole Fee of the said Prince, marcht with an Armie into Wales; his good fortune there was accidentally augmented by a prize, which foure Shippes of Wylsh tooke about the Isles of Saile, wherein the daughter of Simon Montfort late Earle of Leicester, (who, according to a secret contract betwene their friends, went to be gauen in marriage to Llewelyn) and Amerch her brother were surpris'd, but hee found honourable vantage of the King her neere kinsman.

(11) Meanwhile, Llewelyn's affairs, by the manhood and diligence of Pain de Cambray, and others, who had tak't Wylsh in, and brought it to the Kings peace, thriving but poorly, and the said Prince feeling the foundations of his failete beginning manifestly to faile, and shrinke from vnder him, * faied for peace, and had it vpon such termes, which in likely-hood were none * Polidors Virgil would haue it (iceme) granted by King Edward, that he should leise his cast, and carry away against boys and mountaine. In the conditions of Peace which was proceed * with great difficulty of the most remarkable (as carrying the shew of a farre greater riches in the possession of the Welsh, euen at that time, then some preiudicated can easily beleue) * were these. 1. That the Prince should pay to the King for his peace and goodwill, fifty thousand pounds sterling, the payment whereof, should hee in the Kinges will and graces that is (as we conceive it) how much thereof the Prince should pay or not pay, and when. 2. That the said Prince should haue the Isle of Anglesey in Fee-farme of the King, to him, and to the lawfull issue of his body in generall taile, for five thousand Marks readie money, for * griffon, or a fine in hand paid, & the yearly rent of a thousand Marks. The rest of the articles (being about eight,) amounted to so much as a plain Conquest, or dissolution of the Principality of Wales, after Llewelyn's death, who was to enjoy the same, during his time vpon conditions.

(12) Now whereas the said Llewelyn had three Brethren, Daniel (whom King Edward fauoured) Owen, and Roderick, hee was enioyned to him at this conclusion (made by the Lord Robert Tiptot, and certaine other * Commissioners, vpon cyther side appointed) that hee should appeale and iustifie his said Brethren: but because Daniel was afterward a principall Actor in the calamities which fell vpon himselfe, his house, and his Country, we must not neglect to speake somewhat particularly of him. This Gentleman for some causes, * flying into England from his Brother Llewelyn, for his faithfull seruice to the State of England, was there honoured (contrary to the manner of his Nation) with the order of Knighthood, and receiued also, by the bounty of King Edward, for his maintenance, the Castle of Denbigh, with lands to the yearly value of one thousand pounds, and the Daughter of the Earle of Derby (being then a Widow) to wife: with all which bounty, the King did but enterteine a creature of his secrets, as * Pen (not improbably) doe affirme. The State of Wales thus compos'd, and the Castle of * Aberystwith (which seemes to be the same, that by another is said to haue bene built in Wylsh by Llewelyn being hault by King Edward for assuring those parts, the King (as he was manifest, and rollall) the more to tie Llewelyn's faith, gaue vnto him the Lady, of whose surpris at Seaw we haue mentioned, to be his consort, honoring the Nuptials with his owne presence, and his Queene. And whereas Alexander King of Scots came about the same season into England to treat with Edward concerning important affaires, and had formerly sent to the Welsh warres, certaine aides of the State, the said Alexander being ialous (on his Countreys behalfe) that those aides might be interpreted, to haue bene sent vpon duty, obtained letters testimoniall from King Edward, declaring that they were not sent of duty, or in respect of seruice done.

to gaine the Welsh Nation rather by his largesse, then puissance, hauing so honourably vied Llewelyn, hee could not yet retain their hearts, for whether it were (which * some, to amoute the more of ingratitude, & turbaulency from them, asseme) for that there was partiality vied by the English officers in distribution of iustice vpon the Marches, or (which seems to some as likely) for that they aspired vnto in their ancient liberty (being miserably seduced with certain * blind prophesies) the Welsh herooke themselves afield to Armes: for Daniel himselfe, whom the King had laden with so many benefites and graces, became to them a principall leader, and to giue them full assurance of his fastnesse to their cause (reconciling himselfe to his brother the Prince) hee sodainly and treacherously vpon Palme-Sunday leifed the Castle of * Hawarden, surprisng Joger de Clifford, a noble & famous Knight, whom the King had dispatched into those parts, as Iusticiar of all Wales, and slaying such vnarmed men as offered to resist that violence, whence marching, hee laid siege together with the Prince his brother, to the Castle of * Rodlan, doing many outrages, and killing all such as they could reach, yea so (as it is said) whole ransomes * they had taken, though against Llewelyn's mind. And while King Edward spent his Easter at the Fishes in Wylshire, and afterward visited the Queene his mother, who liued in the Nunnerie at Ambresbury, the Welsh vnder diuers Capitaines, had taken sundry of the Kings * strongholds and Castles in diuers parts. There are extant the * Copies of certaine grieuances, exhibited to Iohn Archbishoppe of Canterbury by the Welsh, as such time as of his owne accord (so say the said Copies) hee interposed himselfe (without the Kings leave) to settle their quiet, which Articles in shew, (for the answers of the English are not set downe) containe indeed sundry great abuses; but the fate of Wales had now insouled them all in a desolating warre, and made them vn capable of reliefe. For after the Archbishoppe had trauelled in person to the Prince of Wales, being then in * Swansea, and returned without any Conclusion made, * coming vnto Oxford, hee there sent out the lightnings of * excommunication against him and his seduced adherents: Wee say seduced, because they did capitulate in such sort, as if they had bene able to make their party good.

(14) But though the old British Principality was now to expire, yet it must be confessed, that as Llewelyn had an end vpon worth of his blood, being rather vnfavourably slain, then otherwise, so on the other side the same hapned no without revenge: for at one encounter in open field, Gilbert Earle of Gloster lost William Falewe (a younger Cousen of the Kings) slain in the fight, and foure other Knights, though at the same time also, many of the Welsh left their bodies dead vpon the earth, together with the victory to the English: but the day certainly which they had of King Edward himselfe, may not be forgotten, in which the Welsh slew the * Lord William de Audley, and the Lord Roger Clifford the younger, and got foureteeue Ensignes from the English Arme, K. Edward being enforced to enter into the Castle of Hope for his safety. These things, though not contemptible, but rather of some doubtful fauour, vsual when the ruine of a Nation is by God decreed, could not vphold the cause. For first the Prince, hauing vpon some occasion withdrawne himselfe with some few others from his Army, which then was in the land of Barth, was set vpon by two principall Gentlemen, Iohn Gifford, and Edmond de Mortimer, with their Forces, and there by the hand of one * Adam Franklin was runne through with an Horsemans staffe, who at the first being vnknowne, had his head broken afterward off, and presented to King Edward, at whose commandment it was * crowned with Iris, and set vp for a certain time vpon the Tower of London.

end of Leveille, betrayed by the men of Bath, who was the last Prince of Britaine blood; and with him (whom one Yvesher calleth the Captaine the prais, the law, and light of Nations, and another deaceith with as many ignominious attributes) the liberty of that people did also die. For it was not long but that King Edward subdued in a manner all Wales, & referring to himselfe the Coast-Towns & strengths toward the Sea, distributed the In-land Countreies to the Lordships followeth: therein prudently following the counsell of Augustin, who then under presence of defence for the Princes, had the bridling of all their forces at his pleasure. Nevertheless the whole flame was not as yet extinguished, for David the Princes Brother, and a chiefest firebrand in this fatal combustion, was at large: who being taken & brought to King Edward at the Castle of Exeter, could not obtaine admission to his sight or speech, but was armed, and sent Prisoner to Shrewsburie.

Thither the King, having seded the Seate of Wales, repairing to a Parliament which he had summoned, there to be kept after Michaelmas, caused David (having first had a Legall trial) before certaine Iusticiars for that cause appointed) to be severely put to death, by hanging, heading and quartering, whose head was kept at London, and his quarters in foure other principall Cities of England, to the terror of all ingratitude and disloyall persons. The Welsh line thus thrust from the Principality, King Edward upon Saint Michaels day had a soune borne unto him in Wales at Carmarthen, who also was called Edward, and raigned after him; and that with the birth of a new Lord, the Welsh might bee intred to new lawes, the King established (by example of K. John his Grandfather in Ireland) the English lawes and offices among them.

(16) But the King that becommeth not seeme forgetfull of his French affaires, repayed into France, where hee obtained sundry fauours, though they continued not long, and late in perion there with the French King in his Parliament at the City of Paris, as a Lord or Peer of that Realme, in respect of such lands as hee had in those parts. Nor may here be forgotten an Act of singular munificence, and charity in this renowned King, for the redemption of Charles Prince of Archie, sonne and Heire of Charles King of Sicilie, who had some years before bene taken in a battell at Sea before Naples, by the Gallies of Sicilie, fighting on the behalfe of the King of Aragon: for whose speedier enlargement, K. Edward disbursed thirty thousand poundes sterling, and gaue his owne Knights in hostage, till Charles had sent in his two sonnes, Robert and Lewis, pledges to Afonis King of Aragon: which done, King Edward returned into Gasaigne, and there rooke vpon him the Crosse, in full purpose to finish the journey which once hee had vntaken, and had in part performed against the Saracens.

(17) In the meane time, to purge England (whither hee was now returned) from such corruptions, and oppressions, as vnder which it groaned, and not neglecting therein his particular game, hee banished the lewes out of the Realme, confiscating all their goods, leaving them nothing but money to beare their charges. And whereas they by their cruelties had one waye eaten his people to the bones, & his Iusticiars (like another kind of lewes) had rained them with delays in their suites, and enriched themselves with wicked corruptions, hee (like a father of his Countrey) put all these from their offices who were found guilty (and they were almost all) and purged them otherwise in a grievous manner, being first in open Parliament committed. The particulars whereof, by reason of the most iust and commendable example, we will not thinke needesse (the order of naming them only changed) to recapitulate here. Sir Kalph Hengham, Chief Iustice of the higher Bench, 7000. marks. Sir Iohn Lauch, Iustice of the lower Bench, 1000. marks. Sir William Brookton Iustice, 6000. marks.

S. Salomon Bayshier, Chief Iustice of Affices, 4000. Marks.
S. Richard Bayshier, 4000. Marks.
S. Thomas Sudolton, 2000. Marks.
S. Alban de Hopton, 2000. Marks.
S. William Saham, Iustice, 3000. Marks.
Roger Lestrelher Clerk, 1000. Marks.

Adam de Strassum (beside other vices incredible) 32000. Marks. But with one Sir Thomas Wylford the Kings chief Iustice, (being found belike most falsly) he dealt farre more sternely, for hee not only seised vpon all his moveable goods and Jewels (which hee had done to others) but also vpon his immovable, and banished him moreouer out of the Kingdome, At which time the King constrained all his Iustices to sweare, that from thenceforth they would take no pension fee or gift of any man, except only a breakfast, or the like present. O omne and still necessary necessity, partly able to breake the pernicious combination of men that vnder the pretension of law & offices of Iustice make merchandize of honest justice, law, and conscience, which cannot in the end but bring forth ruine, and confusion.

(18) That tempest now, which * Thomas Erskine, a Scottish Rimer, is said to haue obscurely prophesied, alluding to the troubles of Scotland by reition of King Alexanders death; hapned about these times; which raised to great and bloody contentions, that it had almost blowne vpon the regalitie of that kingdome by the very roots. For when, by the violent fall from his horie, King Alexander had most unfortunately lost his life, that Realme was woefully destitute of any apparent heire, findry persons stading in competition for the same. These things were thought to be foretold from heauen by many * fearefull prefiges, as extraordinary Meteors, Floods, Fires, and Pestilence. But King Edward intending to suray that affaie, and being vpon his way toward the borders, the death of his royall confort, and Queen, which he lamented while himselfe did liue, called him backe to the celebration of her funerals; as her excellent vertues did well deserue. To our Nation here was a losing mother, & (saith * one) the Column, and pillar (as it were) of the whole Realme. In her honour the King her husband (who loued her aboute al worldly Creams) caused those many famous * trophies, or crosses to be erected, wherefoer her noble corse did rest, as it was conveyed from London thither to buriall in Westminster. Nor coule any thing, but the respect to other weighty matters, now presently in hand, with-holde our pen from paying to her memory a farre more copious commendation.

(19) Those mourning offices as mournfully performed, the King repaires into Northumberland, whither the greatest, and sighest persons of the Scottish nation being come, * themselves having fought to him, Edward makes claime to the superiority of Scotland, and requires that the Competitors would quietly assent to his award, alleging that the Crowne of that Realme was held of him: for more credit to which assertion he vouched sundry * books, and acts, whereunto the Scots replied, * That they were ignorant, that any such superiority belonged to the King of England; neither could they make answer to such things without a King the head, vpon whom it lay to heare such a denunciation, and protest, that other answer they sought as then to giue, in regard of their Oath, which after the death of Alexander their King they had made one to the other, and the same to keepe vnder paine of excommunication. Whereupon the King deliuered to them his letters Patents, in which hee acknowledged, that the coming of those Scots, on this side the water of Tweed, should not be at any other time vrged to preiudice, for committing againe into England: that is, That their example should not so be directed to an argument of King Edwards right over them, as if they were to come againe vpon duties, so prudent it seeme were those *P*atents of their Countreys liberty.

(31) Vpon full ventilation therefore and scanning of all rights, the maine doubt rested vpon Lord Bru and Balis, for therelike might seeme rather to affect the honour of having preceded title in blood to a Diademe, then to have colour to contend with either of them. Great was the adule, and deliberation (as there was cause) which King Edward took therein, for not trusting to his owne judgement, hee caused (saith * Heller Bottum) twelve of the best Clerks or learned men of Scotland, and twelve of England to concurre as Assessors with him in that great decision.

(32) While this weighty cause was in debatement, there fell out deadlie strife betwene the English and Normans, occasioned by one of them casually slain by the English, which mischief the King of France forwardly nourish, as thirsting for the duchy of Gales, which best he might attain by troubling the forreine affairs of King Edward, whom they saw now entangled at home in so weighty employments. Whereupon the Normans slew sundry of the English, and hung vp one vpon the mast of a Shippe, whom they had taken at Sea; but, ere long after, three score English ships encountering with two hundred fliee of Normans, laden with wines, after a most bloody battle (wherein many * thousands of the French were slain) tooke, with their whole fleet, their full revenge, and brought them into England.

(33) At last yet King Edward returning to Berwick, having with him the said twenty foure Assessors, as it were a iury of either nation, * and, with the good will and assent of the Scottish Lords, gave solemne judgement with Balis, as being descended of the eldest daughter of David, Earle of Huntington, a younger sonne of Scotland; whose issue (the line of the elder brother being extinct) was to inherit, without question. But the strife being betwene the descendants of the said David, of which the Lord Robert Bruce was also a principall, reasons of importance were produced, which drew many men's judgements, to incline to him, as having a nearer interest to that Crowne. But according to the sentence, * Balis was solemnly crowned King of Scotland vpon S. Andrews day, and, in Christmas following, repaired to King Edward, at Newcastle vpon Tyne, and there (against the minds of many Scots) did homage vnto him for the whole Kingdom of Scotland.

(34) Meantime the French King pursued the revenge of the Normans, demanding restitution and citing King Edward iudicially to appear to answer such wrongs, as were done in Aquitaine; who, (desirous to settle his owne affairs at home, or, as some write, * eager vpon a match for himselfe in France) while hee discovered either his unwillingness to appear in that kind, or to warre, suffered himselfe by a French designe to be meerey deceived, and put out of his possession of Gales, to the great mischance, and disadvantage of the English; whereupon King Edward highly incensed, called a Parliament at London, where John King of Scotland was present, and had the full consent of the whole Reame, to require that himselfe by the sword which was crafteden away by a coming to sick, * renouncing to the French his homage for Aquitaine. (John also was at the same time full of troubles, but the fires of rebellion, there rathly kindled, were, not long after, quenched with the blood of the Actors, and thousands of their Complices.)

(35) Balis having thus obtained the Crowne of Scotland, and siding his party, by the homage which he had made to King Edward, much embased among the Scots, who greatly repined thereat, for regaining their looses, * attempted a secret combination with the French against the English; which Edward ignorant of, and requiring him by vertue of his homage to aid him with all his powers against the King of France, * discovered (by Balis's delays, and trauceries) the said conspiracie. Whereupon hee advanced forward against the Scots with a pusillane armie to Newcastle vpon Tyne. The first blood which was drawne was of the English, of whom, the Scots * slew almost one thousand in a village vnder the leading of one Robert de Res, who had fled from King Edward: The City of Carlisle likewise was assaulted, and the County of Cumberland spoiled by seven Earles of Scotland, and their companies, which to Edward was not greatly displeasing, as was sad for that the first hostile acts were done by them, whom hee had a full purpose to subdue, that at last he might see John in Albion, which, had not God referred for other times, we might wonder hee effected not.

(36) King Edward therefore presented himselfe before the strong Towne of Berwick with a mighty host, there to surpise his entrance to a conquest of the English; and, after summons first to the Towne, abode one whole day, without offer of violence: The Townesmen refusing to render, had a victory of the English Mariners, who rashly entering, with twentie and foure Ships into the harbour, were repelled with the losse of foure of their vessels, which was soone reuenged by the forcible taking of Berwick, where * Heller Bottum saith, there was exercised great cruelty by the English. In the Towne, the Flemish Merchants (who were smothered by the English with fire) had a very strong house in the manner of a Tower, from whence they leuelled, at the entering of the English, with darts and iavelins, one of which casually slew Richard of Cornwal, a gallant Gentleman brother to the Earle of Cornwal, which in an army heated with former conuulsions, for the Scots vpon the slaughter and repulse which they had made of the English mariners, published certayne times in derision, together with the remembrance of many fresh shrewd turnes, might stirre vp bloody effects. After the Towne was thus taken, the Castle after blood not long out, but rendered it selfe. * Sir William Douglas, captain thereof, was detained prisoner, and (as some write) Sir Robert Bruce: others were suffered to depart, vpon oath to beare no armes from thenceforth against the King of England. The losse of this important Towne, and Castle was very gient, for it was the key, and common Bulwark of Scotland.

Berwick the key of Scotland.

(27) While the English, at this place, were busie to cast a very deepe ditch, to hinder the fodeine inroades of their enemies, John King of Scotland sent two religious men to the King of England with * letters; in which, alleging that he was by Oath bound to defend his owne kingdome, and people, he renounced his homage, and fealties, as extorted by violence, and void in itselfe, being made without assent of the three estates of his Realme. The resignation was admitted, King Edward commanding his Chancelor to record the same for perpetuall memorie, as a iustification of his proceedings.

(28) The Scots hereupon, vnder the conduct of the Earles of Raglan, Menth, Strathern, Ras, Athol, Marr, and other of their nobility, made an incursion into England, whence with the spoiles of two religious houles, and other booties they returned: But Patrick Earle of Dunbarre came to King Edward submitting himselfe, and the Castle of Dunbarre (by this submission being vnder King Edwards protection) was regained by Scots: For recouerie, or iurregaining whereof, the King sent John Earle of Surrey, and Suffox, and William Earle of Warwick, who were entertained with battel by the Scottish nation, of whom the English, *after cruell fight, obtained a victory of great importance, the chace holding about eight miles, in which the slaughter was not small. The siege of Dunbarre being reinforced, King Edward had it yielded vnto him, at his coming, wherein were taken three Earles, fixe or seuen Barons, besides many knights, and Esquires, which were all sent prisoners to diuerse Castles of England, and (if some say true) not putto the sword (as Heller transported perhaps with hatred to Edward writes) contrary to his word, and faith given.

(29) King Edward knowing as well how to vicia victorie, as to get it, having a present spirit vpon all advantages, and torries of fortune, takes the Castle of Backlough, and (for a small end to this affaire) marcheth to Edinburgh it selfe (the Chief Towne of Scotland) which * was shortly rendered: Then tooke they Striueling alio, and drave Balul to the * Castle of Farfart: where John Comyn Lord of Strabogie submitted himselfe to King Edward. About this time there came to the English campe great numbers of Welsh footsiders, with whom he releued many of the English footemen, tyred with service, sending them backe into England. Thither also came the Earles of Wylster with bands of Irish.

(30) The King of England prospering thus, pasteth with his army oer the * Scottish Sea, where while he kept the feath of Saint John Baptist * at Perth (or Saint John Towne) there came messengers from Balul, and the Lords his factors, to sue for mercy, which was granted vpon condition, that they should render themselves to him as his subiects. * Heller becometh faith, that after this agreement (wherein * Anthony Bishop of Durham was viced) John Comyn brought Balul, void of all kingly habiliments with a whietred in his hand, to the English campe at Montrou, where he resigned his whole right that he either had, or might haue to the Crowne of Scotland, into King Edwards hands, and made thereof a formall Charter in French, and at the same time also for feare of life, gave his sonne Edward for hostage, and assurance of his fealties, by which final dictaine, the Lord Braces right might seeme now vnquestionable. But this resignation being thus made, King Edward returnes to Berwick, where * all the Nobles of Scotland (as a Parliament there holden) were sworne to be loyal, and true subiects to King Edward for euer after: and * hercof a soleinne instrument was sealed by the said Lord: (of whom John Comyn of Baldmar was first) bearing date at Berwick in the twentie fift yere of the reigne of their Soueraigne Lord King Edward.

(31) In the thirte King, was sent to the Tower of London, and there was honourably attended, hauing liberty for twenty miles about. The Scottish Lords were confined within Trent, oer which River they might not passe toward Scotland, vpon paine of life: The custody of Scotland was committed to Iohn de Warren, Earle of Surrey and Suffox, and the Treasurers thereof to Henry de Crispingham, but William de Ormesby was ordained Treasurer, with this particular commandement, that hee should take the bomaiges and fealties of all such as held lands of the King. And the more to shew his purpose, vterly to dissolve the distinct Regality of Scotland, and to vnite it to the English Monarchie, as hee had done Wales, hee tooke out of Edinburgh the Crowne, Scepter, and Cloath of Estate, offering them vp at * Saint Edwards thirne in Westminster, if the Author mistake not, for at Saint Thomas at Canterbury, * hee offered vp Balds Crowne with another, and (besides many other Acts tending to the abolishment of the Scottish Name, which * Heller relates, as the burning their Records, abrogating their lawes, altering their forme of diuine service, and transplanting all their learned men thence vnto his Vniuersity of Oxford.) hee tooke out of the * Abbey of Scorne the * Mable Chaire, in which the Kings of Scotland were wont to be crowned, and sent the same to Westminster, for Priests to sit therein at Celebration. This Chaire is the same vpon which was engrauen the famous Propheticall Distichon:

Ne fallat satum, Scoti quocunque locatum Inuicent lapidem, regere teneant ibidem,

If Fate be right, where ere this stone is sight, The Regall race of Scots shall rule that place.

While by whomsoever it was written, we who now liue, finde it happily accomplished. But these great Acts of this yere brought to the Commons of England small commodity, vpon whom the charge of the warres lay heauily, and it is not often found, that the people gaine much by their Princes Conquests.

(32) The force of Scotland with a greater force being thus for the present broken, who would suppose, that he could once againe haue lifted vp the head, and that chiefly by the particular vertue of a pious man, as it after happened? which hee had the more opportunity to doe, for that the King of England was diuersly diuerted by occasion of warres in Gascogne for recouery of his owne, and for aid of his friends in Flanders, whom the French did assaile in hostile manner. The Captaine of the revolted troupe in Scotland, was one William Wallace (the sonne of * Sir Andrew Wallace of Craig Knight, though some * vpon heere say, write contemptuously of his counte of life, as of a publike robber) who, by the assistance of such as were outlawed, for refusing to doe their homage to King Edward, drave William de Ormesby (the Kings Iusticiary) out of Scotland. Which King Edward hearing, dispatched John Comyn of Baldmar, and the Earle of Burgham from their confinement, to the extent, that hee might by their endeuours, the sooner settle matters, but withall hee gave John de Warren Earle of Surrey commission to leade an Army: and the king (loath to be hindered from his other destinations) easily yielded to such requests as were propounded on the Scots behalfe for that time. The voyage which hee had in hand, was to transport from Winchelsea an Armie, to assist the Earle of Flanders his confederate.

him, taking them at advantage, as they were passing over a narrow Bridge, were vnto the Castle of Struelon: the slaughter of the English was not small. There Hugh de Cruglingham Treasurer of Scotland for King Edward, fell in battell, whose dead body for speciall hatred borne vnto him, the Scots did flie, diuiding his skinn among them. The King hearing of this ouertrowth, commands the Lordes of England by his letters to be ready to assult the said Earle William (his Captain or Guardian of Scotland) with their Forces, in the Countie of S. Hilary at Turke, and also to proclaime such of the Scottish Lordes as came not thither, enemies of the Scote; but they kept themselves within Scotland, and came not. Whereupon the English Captains marched to the rescue of the Castle of Reckisburgh, whence William Wallace fled vpon notice of their approach to raise his siege. But King Edward (aduerted of these accidents) hauing taken a truce for two yeeres with the King of France, by mediation of Bonifacius the Pope, who interposed himselfe (as tantum in iudex, sed amicabilis Compositor, saith Wolffingham, not as a iudge, but as a friendly Composer, made halt into England, where his presence was extremely wanting: but in his way home, at a Towne called Ardeburgh, all the Scots almost, which hee had brought with him to serue in the Flemish warres, forooke him, and went to Paris.

The Wolfe

(34) After his arrivall in England, hee summoned a Parliament at Turke, giving the Scots a day to appeare thereat; which they not doing, nor acknowledging that they ought to do, hee entred with a mightie Army into their Countrey, his Nauy laden with victuals coasting along; which by contrary winds being holden off for a time, put the Scots rather in hope of victory, by reason of the scarcity of provisions among the English; but three dayes before the Scots appeared, the shippes came, and plentifully refreshed the fainting soldiers. Hereupon the king led forward his people, and vpon the next morning, a terrible showe being heard from the Scottish host, the English ranne to armes; but the kings horse (afrighted with the sodaine tumultuous noise) as hee was putting foote in stirrup, threw him to the earth, and striking with the hinder heeles, brake two of his ribs; who neuertheless vpon the same horse proceeded in person to the battell. William Wallace, who had wonne to himselfe, by many his hardy enterprises a singular opinion among the Peeres, and people, having let his Scots in array (whose numbers far exceeded the English) vied cryes where this his short speech vnto them in stead of Orations, I haue brought you to the King, hee pisse him. For their more security, hee had * fixed betweene them and the English, certaine Pales or flukes, bound together with ropes, which the English Vauntguard brake downe, and came to strokes. The first which fled, were the Scottish Horsemen, leauing their Infanterie, or battels of foote, open to that great destruction which followed, the victory telling clearely to the English.

(35) Out Scottish * Annoth writes, that by reason of emulation against Wallace, the Scots burning in mutual hatred, made the enterprise easie to their enemies; which as it may bee verie true, so certainly there was scarce anie battell betweene the two Nations, in which more Scottish blood was spilt then in this, for thereof * Sebastian Marnier seems to meane, saying, that there were flaine three score and ten thousand, which though wee take not to bee the true number, (for some haue * three score thousand, * others not so many) yet shewes it that the slaughter was vast, as it could not otherwise bee, the Scottish footmen valiantly * fighting as it were to the last man. Blood * worthy to haue bene shed on both sides, against another * kind of enemy, then Christians, the deformity of which * offences may easily represent to us the blessed estate of * our new felicitie. This victory was obtained by the English vpon Saint Mary Magdalene day, at a place called Fewburke: from which William Wallace, opening his way with his Sword escaped. The Welshmen deferred ill of the king at this journey, for that they forewilled to charge vpon the Wallace, or fence of the Scots, in hope (the English being vanquished, which by the inequality of their numbers, they presumed would happen) that themselves might ioyntly with the Scots, execute vpon King Edward the hatred, which they bare him for the * evils hee had brought vpon their nation. After this victory the King tooke sundry places, and returned into England by Carlisle.

(36) The two yeeres truce formerly taken betweene the English and French, was now, by the interceding of Bonifacius Bishoppe of Rome, torced to a letled peace, who (among other things) brought it about, that K. Edward should marry the French kings sister Margaret, and Edward the kings sonne, the same kings daughter, about which Wolffingham hee aduanced not the good of his Realme by this match as any point. To this amity were added the greater strengthes of a domestike quiet, for the king (whom wars had together made renewed, & aged) graciously & wisely yeilded to confirm such grants of lawes and liberties as the Earles and Barons (the pretended Conseruators of the Peoples interell.) did declare, were by his promise to bee confirmed to them at his returne from Scotland: and which hee accordingly did, in a Parliament holden at London, vpon prerogation, in Quindena Pasche, where for their fuller satisfaction hee * left out this Clause in the end, Saluo iure corona nostra, saving the right of our Crowne: and what at this time was wanting, he made vp afterward in a Parliament at Stanford.

(37) But that he might not seeme willing to deny the Pope any iust request, or not to know the sweetnesse of an others freedome, hee deliaered to the hands of the Popes Nuncios, John the late King of Scotland, (vpon their assuming for King Edward indemnity,) whom they conueyed to his inheritance in France, where (vpon eury side vnfortunate) he remained as vnder the note of a false seducer, and of a persud person in King *Edward*s iudgement, and with out anie part of his regall office over the Scottish nation; who found that the peace which King Edward made in other places, did buttorne to their more grievous affliction (for albeit they had gotten Strinelyn by surrender of the English, and began with an immortall desire of their ancient Liberty, to assemble again vnder William Wallace, yet the time was not come of their deliuerance, for King Edward (according as it was formerly appointed,) having accomplished his marriage with the French Kings sister at Canterbury, made it his whole affaire, to finish the annexation of Scotland to the Crowne of England.

* Wall. Scot. 14.

(38) Hee therefore accompanied with his foane, and a dreadfull Army, pursued the matter so close, that whereas the Scots had gotten together againe in exceeding great numbers, vnder their severall Captaines, (whose * Enaie had caused Wallace to give vp all such authority, as the commonwealth of Scotland had formerly granted vnto him, for persecution of their freedomes,) and flying before King Edward, whose fortune in warre had worthily made him terrible that day (in Wolffingham iudgement) had bene irreuerably faill to the Scottish name, if the English had bene able to haue followed them in their Armour, over their bogges and mountains, or that the Welsh had with their naturall nimblenesse supplied the same. Sure it is, that Edward held himselfe so fast in possession, that hee neither would grant the Scottish Lordes their Ballio to raigne over them, (which they requested saith Wolffingham) nor suffer them to redeme such lands of theirs, as hee had giuen to the English among them.

ry letters from the Pope, which were brought by one Lambertus into Scotland: but the King swearing a * terrible oath, said, that he would not desist. Nevertheless the Scots, after a few days, requested the King to let them live in peace till they had taken counsel of the Peeres, and of the King of France, threatening that otherwise the Pope would take the matter upon him. But the King with a disdainfull smile answered: Hanc you done homage to me (as to the chief Lord of the Kingdom of Scotland) and now suppose that I can be terrified with swelling lies, as if (like one that had no power to compel) I would let the right which I have over you to (step out of my hand)? Let me hear no more of this for if I do, I swear by the Lord, I will consume all Scotland from sea to sea. On the other side, the Scots did boldly enough reply, That in this cause they would shed their blood for defence of justice, and their Countries liberty.

(40) About this time the King made his sonne Edmund, (who was borne at Caernarvon) Prince of Wales, and Earle of Chester, which so greatly con-censed the Welsh, because (in regard of his birth place) they held him as one of theirs, that when all friends did afterward forsake him (as the following raigne will shew) they always stucke most loyally unto him, expressing wonderfull love and affection, and bewailing his heavy fortunes in wofull songs, which neither the dread of his enemies, nor length of time could ever make them to forget.

* The V. Duff.

(41) But, in the matter of Scotland, the King not to seeme altogether to neglect the Court of Rome, addressed rather the Earle of Lincolne, and the Lord Hugh de Spenser with manifold complaints against the Scots, and justification of his owne proceedings; howbeit at the Popes request, he granted them truce from Hallowmas to Whitsontide. This very yeere, Cassian King of Thibet gloriously slew one hundredth thousand Turkes in a battell vpon the plaine of Da-mafsus, and was baptized thereupon, as acknowledging the victory to come from the fauour of God: the voy wher-of filled England, as other the partes of Christen-dome.

A.D. 1302.

(42) The iustice of the English Armes against the Scots, being now againe directly impugned by the Papall letters, comprehending sundry arguments on the behalfe of that Nation, King Edward in a Parliament at Lincolne published their contents, and by consent of the whole representative body of the Realeme, returned a copious defence of his whole proceedings, with protestation, first, that hee did not exclude any thing as a forme of judgement, or triall of his cause, but for satisfaction of his holy Fatherhoods conscience, and not otherwise. But whereas the Pope had required the King to stand to his decision for matter of claime, hee writes, that thereunto hee would make no answer, as having left that point to the Earles and Peeres of his land: who with one mind directly signify, that their King was not to answer in judgement for any rights of the Crown of England before any Tribunal under Heauen: and that (by sending Deputies or Attornies to such an end) hee should not make the said truth doubtful, because it manifestly tended to the dishonour of the said Crown, which with the helpe of God, they would resist, and with all their force maintain as with all men. So * ceased that Action, and the looser also, for that Remission had much to doe at home, by reason of some great controversies between the French and him. Meane time Sir Iohn Segraue, Lord Segraue, a renowned Soldier, was sent Gouvernour or Captain into Scotland, with an Army, after the Truce expired, which at the French Kings instance, King Edward had yielded unto for a time; Iohn Cumyn, who had also bene a Competitor for the Crown, was chosen by the Scots for their Governour.

(43) We may not here overpass a victory (in Roslin) which the Writers of that nation celebrate, when in the English were by them overcome, howbeit there is in our Writers much variety in that relation.

* Hist. Scot. lib. 14.

A.D. 1304.

It is the saying of Helior Bortin, that the English were about three for one, our ancient and later authors say that the Scots had farre the * more people; he assirms, that it was in the plaine field, ours that it was * an Ambush; he that the Scots did put to flight, and took the spoiles of three whole battels, in other of which were * 10000. English, ours, that the Scots by reason of their multitudes did only overtake the Vanguard, from which the attack of the other bat-tels was * foure miles off. All agree in this that the Lord Iohn Segraue (a Walfe Consey laith Helior) who had the point or vanguard of the English (whose Generall he also was) by diuiding his army into three part for their better reliefe, weakened in his whole force, that thereby, and his vnuadually forwardnes (impatient to lay for his other power) hee gave occasion to the Scots of such a victory. They had also taken the person of the said Lord Generall, but * Sir Robert de Neule, who with others was at disaine service, hearing thereof, came with his troups of horse, rescued Segraue, slew many, put many to flight, and brought away backe the rest of the prisoners, without the losse of any one man of his owne. The said Scottish Chronicle makes no mention of William Wallace, at this discomfiture of the English, but giues the whole glory thereof to Cumyn, and to Simon Fraser: whereas we attribute all to Wallace, and make no mention of the other, with farre lesse wrong to the immortall decess of Wallace; for hee vndoubtedly, was the only man, who kept vp Scotland, till neere the time of deliuerance.

(44) The Scottish Nation (as * Helior reports) had
* for their warrant in conscience, and justification of restance, the Popes indgement, who vpon ripe deliberation in their matter, perceiued (I thinke) that the Scots had iust allum of battell in defence of their liberties against King Edward: who not much esteeming the doome of that Oracle, vpon the other side was perswaded hee might proceed to subdue them wholly to his dominion: and therefore, (vpon report that the Scots were not only vp in Armes) but encouraged to greater attempts by this late successe, came in person with a dreadfull host, piercing therewith * through all Scotland, from one end thereof to the other; from Ros-burgh to Catnes, which is the farthest point in the length of that Land, being about three hundredth miles: whither he marched by small iournies, not an enemie appearing with power to impeach him. For they, vnable to make head, being continually wasted, did either for their safetie beake themselves to the woods, and Mountaines, with their Wallays, or wholly submitted themselves, * swearing to be true to King Edward, there being in all Scotland but one Castle (the Castle of Strirling) which stood out, and that also (vpon King *Edward*s returne from Catnes) was * absolutely surrendered to him; and therefore no great cause, why Helior should call King Edward false Tyrant for committing the Captaine and Garrison of that Castle to sundry Prisoners: So that had not God in his eternall providence, flourishing the liberty of that people, ordained some inaccessible places, and naturall strengths, where no Armes could march nor be maintained, the Scots had in all likelihood perpetually undergone the same fortune, which we the English were brought into, for want of the like, by Hirszum the first, and his Normans:

(45) Therefore let prophane discourses (with their * Father Epicurus and Lucrilius) blinde and trouble, as often as they shall desire to infatuate any thing against Gods wisdom in the Fabrick of the world, as if the * Craggs, and desert places, thereof, had no use in nature, when (omitting all other reasons of their being) the con-seruation of kingdoms, and nations was in them by them effected. We had an * Hereward in the Conquerours * time, as well as the Scots had a Wallace in this; and we might perhaps at this hour have bene without French mixtures, if God had provided our Country of such * Wallaces, and deserts as either they or the Welshmen did enjoy, in so far many hundredth of yeeres, after the ruine of

^a of their Monarchie in Brittain, upheld, in some sort, ^b their liberty, when the English had twice by Danes, and ^c Normans, in the meantime, utterly lost it.

(46) Scotland (with Helior) being in this manner subdued and all the strengths of buildings, and the Nobility thereof at King Edwards disposition, he hazing order the affairs thereof as himselfe thought best, left the custodie thereof againe to Seignior, and in his triumphall returne through England from Danfermelin in Scotland where he kept his brifmas, caused the Courts of the Bench, and Elschequer, which had bene seuen yeare kept at Turke (for the more commodie of his Scottish expeditions) to be reduced to London, their ancient residence. Moreover he appointed Justitars for Travelsmen, who were to inquire of Man-slaughters, Raffines, Disseifers, Boo-balers, Incendiaries, and other perturbars of the common quiet, and them to punish, by fine, death and otherwise, which brought to the Realme much rest and to the King much riches.

(47) But, the more to secure king Edward in the Scottish kingdomes, it was not long, but that William Wallace (whom an Earle of Scotland in the beginning of his resistances had honoured (saith Walsingham) with the girdle of a Knight-hood) was brought vpon prisoner to London, being cruelly taken at Glasgow by "one Sir John Monteth (though Polydore Vergilius saith the English took him in warre) where he had publicke triall at Westminster, and " denying that he was a Traitor to the King of England, was there for other his crimes as burning of Townes, taking of Cities, killing the English, &c. adjudged to death, which sentence was executed vpon him, and his head and quarters set vpon in several places vnder the Iland, his right leg at Perth or Saint John's Towne in Scotland, and his left at Aberdeen. This was the end of Wallace, whom his Country had once by common consent choosen for their defender, and " Captaine General of the same, for his desert towards her, doth place in glory faure above the Barres, as the only person, by whose example, the Scots had their spirits kepe awake and quicke vpon all occasions, by which they might recover the Government out of the hand of the English, whose reigns ouer them this Wallace neither by faire meanes, nor by force could euer bee drawne to endure, or looke vpon with a patient eye, whom though (with Hector " translator) we doe not call a Monarch, yet must we thinke his Country honoured in him, wishing many the like in our owne.

(48) Let no man now make doubt to write vp King Edward among the greatest of our English Monarchs; for (besides the whole Ilands of Britaine and Ireland) hee also held Aquitaine, which about twenty years before the King of France (entangled with troubles otherwise) did restore, and the City of Bordeaux of the owne accord lubmited it selfe againe to the English Scepter, as that wherewith it had formerlie becom so long, and well acquainted; and to gratifie the same Edward the King of France also banished the Scots out of his dominions. Thus was King Edward possesed of Scotland, which nevertheless (that the world may see Gods hand in translating of Kingdomes, being at point of his procreation) was not long after plucked from his loine; and the calamities which the Scots had suffered, whelmed backe vpon the English. Which peculiar art of diuine providence you will more easily acknowledge, when you shall beholde by howe naked an instrument he raised againe the Scottish Common-wealth out of that dull, in which for a litle season it seemed to lie buried.

(49) Wallace therefore being taken out of the way, the Lord Robert Bruce, between whom, and the unfortunate Baldwin the maine strife lay for the Diadem beholding the state of his Country, for which Wallace, without interit to the Crown thereof, had stood so long, and delirious to give it a new head by making himselfe King (whereby Baldwin surrender his other right was made more payable) had for this purpose entered into a conspiracy with Cameron, whose

disfellow thereof (as Sexts doe write) brought into apparent danger the Lord Brances life, who was then attendant in the Court of England. King Edward vpon the first difcowy of the plot not crediting the same, Brance, most constantly denying it, and calling the accusation, with good probability, vpon Cumyns enuie, had time, and warning to escape. For an Earle (saith Marcius) sent vnto him twelue Stiuelling pence, and a paire of sharpe Surres, presently vpon his departure from the King, which he wilyly interpreted to be a symbole of herdile flight. According whereunto he forthwith sped from London, where K. Edward kept Christmas, shooting his horses backward, that he might not be followed by their prints vpon the snow, and with his owne hand thrust his sword into Cumyns in the Church of the Friers Minors at Dunfries in Scotland, whom two of Brances friends with other morall thrusts dispatched. Brance knowing now noway to answer the fact, but by open defecation, which he did resolute vpon, did thereupon procure himselfe to be crowned King of Scotland about our Ladies day in March in the Abbey of Seane.

(50) Such an attempt as this could not be long hidden from King Edward, who hating at the whit-founde next after honored Edward Prince of Wales, his eldest son, with the order of Knighthood at London, sent him against King Robert into Scotland, attended with a troupe of noble young gentlemen, Amorie de V. eleve Earle of Pembroke; Robert of Clifford, and Henry de Fore being gone before with an Armie, and King Edward preparing to come after, appointing the Archebush of his own holl to be at Carlisle. Where, in Parliament, besides proudions for the warres, fandy consultations and counsaies were entered, for repelling another kind of eunnie no lesse dangerous to the State, to wit, the Pope, and his fill centuried extortions in this Land whereof precent complaints were made in this Assembly; and both the Clergy there ex^{ce} appealed from the Popes Swell, and his Cardinal-Legats excommunications: also the Kings Council was driven to enail some orders for brideling their ex^{ce}traneous depilations.

(51) Meane time Amyory de Valence at Perthin Scotland had put to flight King Robert Thome, & perswaded him to neer, that he tooke his wife, his brother Nigel-wal, and others, but himselfe escaped into the westmost Iles of Scotland. This hanell taken at the entrance to his Regallitie, draue his people into such despaiire of his future better Fortunes, that there remained only two friends vnto him, the Earle of Lenox, and Gilbert Haysh tell, as the Earle of Arbuth, at London, (who had twise revolted) and his brother Nigel-wal at Berwick, were put to death as all others his chiefe partakers were, or else kept prisoners in England. In which number was King Roberts wife (daughter to the Earle of Wylfer in Ireland) and his daughter, the Bishops of Glouster, and Saint Andrews, the Abbot of Scorne and others. The Countesse of Begowhan, sister to the Earle of Fife (then absent in England at his mannor of Whithorn in Leithershire, whose office was to haue crowned the Scottish King) was also taken, and because (in her brothers absence) shee had stolne from the Earle her husband, with all his great horse, to set the Diadem vpon Bruers head, it was deuised that shee should be fet in a wooden Cage (made * Crown-wife) vpon the wals of Berwick Castle, for all to wonder at. This ridiculous reuenge was held sufficient, without taking her life, though shee was a manlike woman, and did herein but the part of a noble spirited Lady. Thus was King Robert (both the Scottish translator of Boetius) brought to such misery, that he was sometimes naked and hungry without meat, or drinke, save only water and roots of herbes, and his life perpetually in danger. Howbeit, her newes forsooke himselfe, but as one that had him selfe trust in God, cherished an hope in his minde, at one time or other to recover the Crowne. In which condition hee exhibited himselfe to noble a spectacle as in

(12) King Edward also on the other side (like a Christian Prince) as hee had some yeeres before, by his speciall letter (directed to the * Archbishops of Canterbury), requested that publicke prayers should be made to Almighty God for him, his Realme and people, that the heavenly Mercy would direct his way and workes to the glory of his holy name, and advancement of the Kingdome: so now repayed hee with his Lords to Westminster, after this discomfiture of his enemies, there solemnly to render vnto God his humble thanks for the Conquest, whereof hee thus held himselfe assured. Which confidence drew him on so farre, that now (his turne being serued, as he thought against the Sentis) hee refused to stand to the confirmation which hee had made to his Barons, of such lawes and liberties as haue before beene mentioned, pretending that they had forced his consent: and doubtles, so great was the Kings faith thus to renounce what hee had solemnly iuror, (* though indeed it was in some necessity and enforcement) to the Popes warranting thereof (which certainly encouraged the King thereunto) so most execrable, who afterward abolished him (as other Popes had done to his Predecessors) from obseruance of that oath.

(13) The miraculouse deliuerance of Scotland was now at hand; for the noble Bruce, not staying till King Edward were dead (who was now about threescore and eight yeeres of age) came forth out of the Sestril lands with such powers as hee had gotten together, taking the Castles of Carrieke, Tannerne, and many other, doing many things about the opinion of his meanes. To put an end to all which troubles, King Edward resolved once againe in person (notwithstanding his age,) to enter Scotland with a mighty host, which hee appointed to attend him at Carlisle in Cumberland, three weekes after Midwinter day: where God visiting him with his last sickness, hee commanded his Sonne the Prince to repaire with speed vnto him, vnto whom being come, hee vetered many admonitions and precepts, the summe whereof was * this.

the Prince.*

(14) That he should be mercifull, iust and courteous, constant in word and deed, familiar to the good, and toward such as were in distresse alwayes pitifull. That after his death he should not haften to take the Crowne of England, till hee had honourably reuenged the injuries of his Father, and accomplished the present seruice. That hee should carry his Fathers bones about with him in some coffin, till hee had marched through all Scottish land and subdued all his enemies, for that none should bee able to overcome him while his Steed lasted marched with him. Moreover, hee commanded the said Prince to loue his Brethren, Thomas and Edmund, but specially to tender and respect his mother Queen Margaret. * That upon a paine of his malédiction, and curse, hee should not presume without common consent to repelle Peter de Gasne, who for alouing the tender yeeres of the Prince was seized vnto him, by common decree was hanged. That whereas himselfe, by the continual, and new attempts of Bruce, could not in person (according to his vow) make waite in the Holy-land, therefore hee should send his Heart thither, accompanied with fourscore Knights, and their retinues, for whose support hee had promised thirty & two thousand pounds of silver. That his Heart being by them couaned, hee did hope in God, that all things there would prosper with them. Lastly, That upon paine of eternal damnation, as the said money should not be expended upon any other use.

(15) With these admonitions dismissing the light young man from his presence to accomplysh to prouident was hee to the very end of his late affairs) the marriage with the French Kings Daughter, which had bene formerly agreede vpon between the Parents, hee advanced next to the enemy vnto Bergh upon Sands, where his lingering Dysentery encreasing (for that was the sickness whereof hee died, though one maleuolently sayth, hee died suddenly, without shewe of repentance for his finnes) hee took his leave of this world, after no lesse preparation (no doubt) for his owne soules health, then careful premonition for the carriage of his sonne, and ordering of his Kingdome. Which pious Princes raigne and life, wee cannot here that vp with a nobler Eloge, then that wherewith our Great and Iudicious Antiquary hath already depertrayed him, as a Prince of close reuerence, whose heretike mind God proportioned (as a most worthy man) a body enseruable, so that as well in beauty and goodly presence, as in wisdom and valour, hee was faine to the height of his Regall Dignity, whose flourishing youth his Deliance did exercise with many warres and troubles of the State, so to frame and fixe him for the British Empire; which being King, hee was managed with the glory of his Welsh and Northern victories, that by due desert hee is to be reputed a close honour of Brittain.

Edmundsburie* in Suffolke hath recorded in his booke of Englilh Annals, but other mention there is none, but onely from him: whereby it is likely that shee did not liue to be married, but that shee died in her childhood.

(66) Maria the fifth Daughter of King Edward and Queene Eleanor, is by Thomas Fitching of the Monastery of Whitby (who wrote the large Genealogie of the Kings of England and their issue) reported to haue deccased without Issue.

James*, at the Abbey of Saffron Walden in Essex.

(69) Beatrice, the eight daughter of King Edward and Queene Eleanor, bare the name of Beatrice Duchesse of Britannie her fathers sister: shee is by some Genealogists mentioned to haue liued till shee was marriageable, but yet no mention being made of her match, it seemeth shee died unmarried.

(70) Blanche the ninth daughter of King Edward, and the last of Queene Eleanor, is so mentioned by Thomas Fitching, and some others, but not at all by Thomas Ekesham a Monke, who made a Prodigree of the Kings of England, but shee is by the rest reported to haue died in her childhood.

(71) Thomas, the fifth sonne of King Edward, and the first of Queene Margaret his second wife, was borne at a little village in Yorkshire called Tratherton, June 1. in the nine and twentieth yeere of his fathers raige, Ann. 1300. hee was created Earle of Norfolke, and Earle Marshal of England, which Earldomes the last Earle Roger Bigod, leassing no Issue, left to the disposition of the King his father. He had two wives, of which the first was Alice the daughter of Sir Roger Hales of Harwich in Suffolk, by whom hee had issue Edward, who married Beatrice the daughter of Roger Mortimer the first, Earle of March, but hee died before his father without issue, and two daughters, Margaret twice married, first to John Lord Segreus, by whom shee had Elizabeth Duchesse of Norfolke, wife of John Lord Montbray (from whom the Montbrays & Howards Dukes of Norfolke and Earles Marshall descended,) secondly, to Sir Walter Manny a Knight of Cambray, and by him had Anne wife of John Hastings the elder Earle of Pembroke, and mother of Earle John the younger, that died without issue; his youngest daughter Alice was married to Sir Edward Montacute, and had by him three daughters, Elizabeth and Joan married to Walter and William two of the Effords, and Maud that died unmarried. The second wife of this Earle Thomas, was Mary the daughter of William Lord Rex, and widow of Sir Ralph Cobham, who leaving him without issue by him, shee was married the third time to William Lord Breoke of Breke.

(72) Edmund, his first sonne by Queene Margaret, was borne at Woodstocke in Oxfordshire, August 5 in the thirtieth yeare of the raigne of his Father, A. 1301. Hee was created Earle of Kent, and married Margaret daughter of John, and sister and sole heire of Thomas Lord Fitzwalter of Lyde in the Countie of Northampton, by her he had issue two sonnes and one daughter: Edmund his eldest sonne was Earle of Kent after his father, and died vnder age without wife or issue: John the younger was Earle also after his brother, he married Maud the daughter of the Duke of Gloucester, and died likewise without issue. His daughter was Joan, for her beauty called the faire Maid of Kent, first married to William Montacute Earle of Salisbury, and from him divorced, and remarried to Sir Thomas Holland, in her right, Earle of Kent, and by her, father of Thomas, and John Holland Duke of Surrey, and Earle of Huntington: and lastly, shee was the wife of Edward of Woodstocke, the Blacke Prince of Wales, and by him, mother of King Richard the second. (73) Eleanor the tenth daughter & fifteenth child of King Edward, and the last child of Queene Margaret his second wife, was borne at Winchester, the first day of May, in the five and thirtieth, and last yeere of her fathers Raign, being the yeere of our Lord 1305. shee deceased in her Child-hood, and was buried in *S. CHAPTER XI.

That the Mind is not derived from Parents, certainly the second Edward (called of Carnar-
non) might (if sooth-like) abundantly shew being of a most valiant, wise and fortunate father, an valike sonne; yet not to beginne our description of his courtes, with prejudice of his person, we will so temper our stile, that by his owne actions sincerely related, rather then by any ver-ball censures the man may be iudged. This cannot be denied, that whereas from the Conquest till his time, England though it endured (by Gods iust iudgements) many bitter, sad and heavy stormes through some headstrong ambition, or other sickness of mind in the Princes thereof, yet had the Men to sway and gouerne her, and those distempers were as the perturbations incident to vigorous dispositions; whereas vnder this Edward, who could neither get our keepe, it learned to endure the leuities of a Child, though his yecres, being about twenty and three, might haue exempted him from so great infancie of iudgement, as his taigne discovered.

(2) Neuer came Prince to the crowne with more generall applaude then he: so great hopes of doing well, his Yolowus father, Edward of Wincelster had left vpon him, besides the right of succession, whose last warning and terrible adirations you haue heard: with the * vnter contempt and breach whereof, to the destruction of himselfe, and his friends, hee in a manner anticipated his gouerne-ment.

(3) After that Edward had in his best maner provided for the * affaires of Scotland, where (as Dan- freys) many of the Scottish * Lords did their homage to him, as they had to his Father; the first task which hee gaue of his future behauiours at home, gave to pay for the necessities of his Court. The young Queene also tooke her selfe not to be a little wronged by this vngodly mans predomiance, & thereof sent her complaints to the king of France her father, which concerned injuries in the highest kind, as in her bed (the King being drawne by Gascon to adultery) and in her honour and maintenance. Whereupon the Peeres of the land, animated by the King of France, so confidently dealt with Edward, that his Earle now the third time did abjure the Realme: but (the King of France and his enemies making foraine parts vnfure for him to abide in) he returned in Christinas to the generall perturbation of the Kingdom, and to his owne certaine ruine, for that the Barons (his adherencies) had gotten him banished with this Proviso, * that if at any time afterward hee were taken in England, hee should be forthwith apprehended and suffer death. But an Angell from heauen could not seeme more welcome, then this most faithful friend (as that * Courcier calls him) was vnto King Edward, who * forthwith advanced him to be his principall Secretary.

(11) Vpon report of Gascons returne, the chiefe Lords, sitwell Ecclesiasticall as temporall (Walter Bishopp of Cantuery excepted, * who allowed the Kings affections towards Gascon) and procured him to breake the former agreements, which were made and sworn in the Parliament at London, consulted vpon a desperate course of reformation in this point, and made choise of Thomas Earle of Lancaster to be their leader. This Thomas was sonne of Edmund Earle of Lancaster, Leicester and Ferrers, second sonne of Henry the third King of England, and in right of his wife (after her fathers deceale, which hapned about this time) Earle of Lincoln, Salisbury, and (besides many other great Lands in Yorkshire, Cumberland, and Wales) hee had the Earldom of * Artoys in Franced, so that without comparison hee was the greatest subiect of the Kingdom.

(12) The Issue of which combination before we pursue, we may not bere in our way ouerslippe a strange alteration both here in England, and in all Christendome, by the vaine fall extinguishment of the Order of the Templars, wrought about this time by the procurement of the French King, who being so gracious with Pope Clement, that formerly * hee sent Ambassadors in crasse of his holinesse with great importunity, that thence of his Predecessor Pope Boniface might be burnt as being an Heretike, so now also hee so farre prevailed with him, that in the Council at Vienna this so highly esteemed Order, was vpon cleare proofe of their generall odious finnes, and scarce credible impieties, vtterly abolished through Christendome. The French King * caused 54. of that Order, together with their Great Master to bee burnt at Paris; and though that King hoped to conuert all the Lands of that Societie to his sonnes vse, whom hee intended to make King of Ierusalem; yet the Pope and Councell annexed their possessions to the Order of the Knights Hospitallers, called commonly Knights of the Rhodes. Notwithstanding in England (where such Papall commands went not alwayes for lawes) the heires of the Dauncers, and such as had endowed the Templars here with landes, entred vpon those parts of their ancient Patrimonies after the dissolution of the Order, and (saith our * Courcier) detained them vtill not long after, they were by Parliament wholly transferred vnto the Knights of the Rhodes, * or of S. Iohn of Ierusalem.

(13) King Edward was now at York, and Earle Thomas, according to that which had bene concluded among the combined Lords, who resolved to trie all extremities, rather then any longer to endure Peirs Gascon, (as being perswaded while that King bene breathed, peace could neither be maintained in the Realme, nor the King abound in treasure, nor the Queene enioy his loue) sent humble * petitions by honorable messengers to their Soueraigne, requesting him to deliuer the man into their hands, or to driue him from his company out of England. But the selfe-wild King * preferring the dearer life of one stranger before the loase of the whole Realme, would not condiscend.

(14) Afterward, Peirs (whom * the Estates perswaded with an Armie) being * enrutred for his life-guard to Amorie de Valence Earle of Pembroke, was left by him but one night at a Village or Manour called Dallingtoun betwene Oxford and Warwick, (being a place neither * farre enough off, nor strong enough) pretending to haue conuased him on the next day to the Castle of Wallingford, the said Amorie in the meane space departing to lodge with his Countesse, who lay hard by; but, the said Amorie conuising thereat (as our * Courcier chargeth him, who also writes, that hee tooke a solemne oath before the king to doe his best to safe-conduct Gascon, the king purposing in the meane time to labour his peace with the Lords * vpon any conditions) Gay Earle of Warwick with his people surprised him the same night, and took him to his Castle of Warwick, where in a place called Blacklow (afterward * Gascoffs) his head was stricken off at the commandement and in the presence of the Earles of Lancaster, Warwick, and Hereford, * as one of that had bene a subuerter of the lawes, and an open Traitor to the Kingdom. In which bold attempt, themselves (who yet pretended so much standing for the liberties of the land) did most vnadvisedly infringe a Capitall branch of the same Franchises, in putting to death an Earle, and so deare a friend of the Kings, * without any iudicial proceeding by trial of his Peeres, which caused a lasting hatred betwene the King and his Nobles.

(15) There wanted nothing now to King Edward but present meanes to reuenge the blood of his friend, or rather of his halfe-selfe, the lacke wherof did increase the sorrow hee tooke for his death, which being well knowne to the Lords, they resolved not to lay downe Armes, till they had provided for their security, and the performance of all such points, as concerned the temperament of the Regall power, that (vnder colour thereof) the Nobles themselves might finger some part of the Soueraigne government. The King was then at London and the Lords at Dunstable: but by the continuall interdealings of the Prelates, and of Gilbert Earle of Gloucester, who stood neutrall, the kindling displeasures were for the present allayed, vpon condition that the Lords should restore to the King all such things, once belonging to Peirs Gascon, as they had taken at Newcastle, which they accordingly did.

(16) King Edward neuertheless, as if his soule were ouercast with some blacke cloud, continued mourning, till it pleased God to enlighten the world with the birth of a young Prince, whose noble Acts did afterward redeme all the blemishes wherewith his Fathers infirmities had darkened the brightnesse of the English name, and at this present cleared the mind of the sorrowfull King his father: for vpon Saint Brices day, Isabel his Queene brought forth her first sonne at Windsor, which caused great reioycing through the Kingdom. Her French kindred and friends (which were there in good numbers of either sexe) & among them as chiefe, the Queens owne brother, Lewis the French Kings sonne, would haue had the Infant at his Baptisme named Lewis, but the English Lords would * not permit, who therefore was after his Fathers and Grandfathers name, called Edward. This was hee who afterward rayed the honour of English Chetierie to so high a point, by his famous victories in France and elsewhere.

(17) The euill will which the King bare in his mind against the Barons for their ouer-ruling his affections, and the death of Gascon, by sundry bad offices and sycophancies of the * French at Windsor was rubd so hard vpon, that it grew raw againe before it was halfe healed. Therefore in a Parliament at London the king sharply charged those pre-

Robert de Clifford, and besides other Lords, about fouen hundred Knights, Esquiers, and men of Armo-ries. Of the rest the slaughter could not bee but great, though much the lesse, in regard the Scots fought on foot. Heclor saith, that there were not slaine fewer then fifty thousand English, no Writer elie, that hitherto wee can meet with, exceeds the fifth part of that number; the riches gotten by spoiles and ranfomes of the English, were doubtlesse very great. Among the number of prisoners, the principall was Humphrey de Bohun Earle of Hereford, but recovered after ward by exchange for King Robert's wife, who all this while was detained in England. This battell was fought at Bannockburne neere Strathclyde in Scotland.

(26) From this overthrow King Edward cicing to Berwick, King Robert (who to his great glory, as having himselfe bene trained vp among the English, vied such as were taken prisoners with singular *humanity) sent thither to him the bodies of the Earle of Glyles, & Lord Clifford, that they might receiue honourable interment among their owne friends. But Edward (vnder whose vnfortunate lending the English name sustained in great dishonour and damage) withdrew to Torke, resolving therein onely Franceiske to assemble new force, and either to bee reuenged, or to die. But *all enterprises and attempts of that nature miscarried, for about twelue yeeres after, in somuch that great feare reigned among the Northern English, who lay open to the first bruits and violences of the Scots, out whom many faire dayes shone. And to augment the calamities of the North, many of the disloyall English * conspired with the enemy, and jointly spoyled the west parts of Northumberland, nothing being secure, but that which was defended.

(27) God, to bamble the English, who through long prosperities had forgotten both themselves & him, drew not backe his heavy hand so for seldom hath so terrible a famine bene heard of here, as succeeded to this overthrow: so that for moderation of prices, a Parliament was assembled at London: but (saith Wallingham) as if God had becne displeased at the said rate of (which not long after were repealed) things grew scarier day by day: and the death was generally such, that vpon Saint Laurence Eve, there was scarcely bread to be gotten for sustentation of the Kings owne family. This famine which lasted about two yeeres was accompanied with much mortality of people.

(28) But neither the dishonours taken in Scotland, nor innumerable afflictions and discontentments at home, made Edward suspend the celebration of his Geoffrey funerals; whose Body with great pompe he caused to bee transferred from the place of his former buriall, (which was among the Friers Preachers at Oxford) to Kings-Langie in Herefordshire, where hee in person with the Archbishops of Canterbury, foure Bishops, many Abbots, and principall Churchmen did honour the exequies, but few were present of the Nobility, whose great stomacks would not giue them leaue to attend. Some what also to sweeten these generally acerbities, Leuelem Brew and his two sonnes, were brought vp prisoners to London, having burnt many towns vpon the Marches, and committed some murders with their Welsh adherents.

(29) Meane-while the state of the Kingdome was miserable, there being no loue betwixt the King and the Peeres, nor any great *care in him or them of the common affaires; neuertheless they assembled at a Parliament in London, where no great matter was concluded: for the famine and pestilence encreased. The famine was growne so terrible, that horse, dogs, yemen and children were solde for food, and (which is horrible to thinke) the theues newly brought into the Gaols, were come in peeces, and eaten precisely halfe alive, by such as had been longer there. In London it was proclaimed, that no corne should be consuered to Brewers uses, which Act the King (moued with compassion toward his Nation) insinuating, caused to bee executed through all the Kingdome; otherwile (saith Wallingham) the greater part of the people had died with penury of bread. The bloodie flux or dysenteric caused through raw and corrupt humors engendred by cold meat and diet, raged euery where, and together with other maladies brought such multitudes of the poorer sort to their end, that the lining could scarce suffice to bury the dead.

(30) The King was now in so great dislike and distrust with the Lords and Barons, that they would not appeare at Clarendon, where hee held a great Council. To augment this fall afection, a certaine Knight belonging to John Earle Warren, stole away from Canford in Devonshire, the wife of Thomas Earle of Lancaster (chiefe of the Lords faction) not without the Kings consent (as it was said) and brought her to the said Earle Warren called at Biggar, with great pompe, and in despite of the Earle; whom one Richard de Saint Clare, a wreched, lame, and bunched backe Dwarf challenged for wife, pretending that he was formerly contracted, and had lien with her, which she (the greatest and noblest inheretrix of her time) did openly confesse, to her immortal infamie, incurring alas (saith Wallingham) the publike note of a most filthy trumpet. This deformed Elfe (having mighty second) durst herupon claime the Earldomes of Lincolne and Salisbury as in ber right, and in the meane time, the name and honor of Thomas the great Earle was baffold, as it were, by a light and wicked woman.

(32) Neither did the King seeme to haue any will or power to relieue the common calamities, but rather to concert his whole both wits and force vpon reuenges against the Lords, who vnder pretence of their exorced prouisions, maliciously withdrew their loues, seruice and duties from him, wherefore feeling himselfe thus weak and diffident, hee besought the spirittall assistance of Pope John the two and twentieth; who thereupon sent certaine Cardinals to sit all things in quiet without bloodshed. Betweene the King and Earle of Lancaster they established a peace, who, in a certaine plaine neere Leicester met, embraced and kissed each other; but when they could not worke the like with the Scots, they put that Countrey vnder Interdict.

(33) For they (as it is the manner of prosperity) after the victory at Bannockburne, which cleerly got them Scotland, did beginne to bethinke themselves of gaining new Empire in Ireland. Thither Edward Bruce Brother of King Robert had passed with an Army, procuring *himselfe to be crowned King thereof by fauour of some of the Irish Nobility, whom acquerthelike about three yeeres from his first entrance, the English vnder the conduct of the Archbishops of Armagh, and of John Lord Birmingham Iusticiar of Ireland, valiantly encountered, where, together with his late viurped Kingdome, hee lost his life. There were slaine in that battell many honourable Scots, besides the new King Edward, and about *six thousand others: his head was cut off *at Dundalk (saith P. Wallingham) but Malcolme Rector writes that he was slaine in the battell in Kille. Thus did God temper one with another, and the iust reioycement which the Scots had conceived of their so happy victory over the English at Bannockburne, was lowered with this loss.

(34) But King Robert (as a most expert and vigilane Prince) did not suffer this joy to continue long to the English, far by practise with one * Peter Spalding to whom King Edward had entrusted the keeping of Berwick, he recovered it from the English, first * Harding, by treatie, with Peace, Spalding, and treason; after it had remained twenty years in their possession; which when King Edward thought to have wonne againe, the Scots directed him from the siege, with incursions and slaughters of his people in other parts of England, not failing much of surprizing the Queene in a village not farre from York, where he solourned during the siege at Berwick, the plot being laid, and drawne between the Scots and some perfidious English, whom King Robert had moved for that purpose. But Spalding after the treason done had the reward of a Traitor, for King Robert put him to death.

(35) To give some breathings after these manifold troubles, a truce was agreed vpon and confirmed between the two Kings of England and of Scotland, for the space of two yeeres, which brought forth confusion and not refreshment. For thus it hapned; The King vpon the commendation of the * Lords themselves, had made Hugh de Spencer Lord Chamberlaine, who being at the feast of equall insolence, vices, and ambition to Gaufrin, so wrought that hee succeeded in short time to all the graces of familiarity and power which euer Gaufrin enjoyed, as in like sort to all his hatred and enuie. Hugh his father an ancient Knight, the better to strengthen his sonnes courtes, was likewise imployed, and grew in speciall fauour with the King, who afterward also created him Earle of Gloucester, but the father in manners unlike to the sonne, was ruined rather by a naturall tenderness, then any malicious will. The sonne, as hee was of shape most lovely, so the verie spirit is selfe of pride and rapine, carried him to all sorts of inrolkable behauiours and oppressions, that Gaufrin might with good reason seeme to be wished for againe. Against these two, who wholly swayd the vnfortunate King, Thomas Earle of Lancaster, and in a manner all the Barons of the Kingdome, (who meant the King should lose none but with their leave) did swell with such impatience, that (not contented with the waite of their lands) they neuer rested till by the terror of ciuill Armies those two fauourites (father and sonne) were banished; they thus reuenging vnder publike prettices both publike injuries and * their owne.

(36) In all contentions which hapned between the King and his Lords, Queene Isabel had euer therto bene a maker of Peace, doing therein worthy offices, but the rull statutes of the Earles of Lancaster and Hereford would not suffer her to continue any longer so: for the Queene being denied lodging one night at the Castle of Leedes in Kent, which belonged to the Lord of Bathmore (one of the Earles faction) the withdrew her good conceits, and was an author to the King of presently reuenging that dishonour, who vpon her complaint, came in person with many thousand Souldiers before the Castle, rooke the * Captaine, and put both him and all the men therein to shamefull death. Moreouer, longing to bee righted against the Lords for their late insolencies, marched on to Cirencester taking many Calibres, and believing others: The Lords (who little suspected any such ioudaie assault) providing in the meane time for their defence.

thority to be in danger) resolved wisely and manfully, to die in the quarrell, or to bring the Lords to be at his commandement. Meane time the iudgement giuen against the Spencers was reuerfed as erroneous, and their reuocation decreed at London by the Arch-bishoppe of Canterburie and his Suffragans.

(38) The Lords not all of a like temper began to misdoubt, and many of them forsooke their Chief, (the Earle of Lancaster) and rendered themselves to the King, or were apprehended; among which were the two Eggers Mortimers, who were committed to the Tower of London and others to Wallingford Castle. The faction weakened by this defection made head in the North, vnder the Earle of Lancaster, who now was to fight for his life. Thither the King marched, and with the onely few of his Armie, made the Earle to flee from Burton vpon Trent, whose forces in their retreat or flight behaued themselves outrageously.

(39) But Gods heauie displeasure, and the Arme of the Kings power left them nocio: for at Burrowbrigg, Hamfray de Bohun was slaine by a Wylliam, who thrust him into the body with a Speare from vnder the Bridge, and the Earle of Lancaster himselfe with other principall men, Barons and knights, to the number of about * fourescore and ten were taken prisoners, by a man of small fortance, Andrew de Heretley Captaine of the City of Carlisle, and Sir Simon Ward, * Captaine of Tork, who with great forces out of those parts, stopp their further passage at Burrowbrigg, as the Kings forces tooke all sieged from them behind.

(40) The third day after their apprehension, the * King in person being set in iudgement at Pontefract, and with him Edmund Earle of Kent, a younger Earle of Pembroke, Iohn de Warren Earle of Surrey, and among * others, the Lord Hugh de Spencer the Father, as also * Hugh Spencer his sonne; the Earle of Lancaster was brought before them, and had sentence pronounced against him * by the said Andrew de Heretley (created afterward Earle of Carlisle) and the Kings Iustices, the * Lord Beaufort, as against an Arch-Traitor; neuertheless, for reuerence of his blood (being the Kings neere Kinsman) drawing and hanging were remitted vnto him, but his head was stricken off the same day without the Towne of Pontefract.

(42) As for the said Thomas Earle of Lancaster, there are so many reasons why he cannot reasonably be iudged either a good subject or a good man, that we may worthily wonder why some at that time should repute him a Saint. Certainly, the wise and discreet old Writers are not so opinionated of him; but note his priuate life for * vicious, himselfe to be nothing * valorous, and of the publike * not well deservng, omitting his countemselous behauiours toward the King his Soveraign Lord in his discomforts, which as Walsingham forgets not to relate, so thinks he that the like was worthily vied toward that Earle himselfe, who, when he was brought prisoner to Pamfrist (his owne Castle but then surrendered) the whole multitude derided, and called him in scorn King Arthur: by which name he was designed (as some write) in the Southey Cypher intercepted, proving a conspiracy with Scots: but the very shoppes, where his and the other Barons original Treasons were forged, was the Parliament house, wherein from time to time, they forced on the King presumptuous and treasonous Ordinations, where-by the Peeres challenged, not onely to reforme the Kings house and Councell, and to place and displace all great Officers at their pleasure, but even a ioint interest in the Regiment of the Kingdome together with the King, which William Inge (a Iudge of the Common-Law) with other like flucklers, traiterously perswading them to be according to Law.

(41) Of his ill desertings toward the common-Weale (who for the good thereof could not digest any indignity) let this be a kind of demonstration: for when King Edward having by Strait siege brought Barnet neere to termes of yeelding, chanced once to breake forth (after his vaine manner) into these words: The Lord Hugh Spencer shall be captain of the Castle, when it is taken: the Earle forthwith with others of his affection abandoned the service: by reason of which departure, it was thought that Barnet was not as then obtained,* and that the enemy thereby had great advantage in all their attempts. The names of such Barons (besides Barncerts, and some few others of speciall note) as perished by hatchet and halber for this businesse, as out of so great variety of Writers we could now gather them were,

Nener did English earth at one time drinke so much blood of her Nobles in so vile manner shed as at this, which, whatsoever could be pretended (as doubtlesse their offence was capitally yet all was taken to be done as in the quarrell of the Spaners onely, nor was it unreuenged as will appeare: in the mean space their enemies not contented with their blood, procured also the confiscation of their citizes and inheritances.

(44) King Edward thinking that this exploit had made him terrible awfull to the Scots, as it had done to the English, marcheth with a mighty host into Scotland, from whence not long after (for want of victuals) hee was compelled to returne without the honor of any achievement, and being upon his returne, was suddenly by Scots assailed in the night, very narrowly escaping in his owne person, and with a few saved himself by flight, leaving his treasure & furniture for pillage, and so came sorrowfull to York. John de Brittain Earle of Richmond, was taken prisoner by the enemy, and the rest of the Country defaced with destructions as farre as to the walls of that City.

(45) Thus * passed this yeere, to the English full of losse, reproach, and lamentation, by reason of their intestine discord and the flames of their Nobles to the King infamous, and hateful also for his unfortunate journey into the Northern parts, &c. But these bloody and tempestuous winds blew some to profit; for * during the space of about five yeeres after, the fortune of the Spaners hugely encreased, and the Queenes decreased, who (for her relating toward the Lords, & expressing some dislikes of their rankly-growing weeds) was grown to beare a share in the persecution. And that these with such like violent men working upon the Kings inclination, were the onely Authors of that sharpe reuenge taken upon the Lords, for their particular and inglorious enrichment (for what else can we call the same, since that they bestride thereby their Soeraignes Crown and Life to speedie destruction) let it be by this in part appeare, and move the world the rather to pity the seduced.

(46) Among them who were condemned for rising with the Earle of Lancaster, there was one of a meane Familie, for whose life neuertheless, because hee had once served in Court, and was pleasing to some of the Grands, or Potent favourites therein, many interceded, and pressed the king so farre on his behalfe, that he brake out into their most vehement words: A plague upon you for cursed whisperers, malicious backbiters, wicked counsellors, envenomers, you for the life of a most notorious knave, who would not speak one word for the life of my neere Kinsman, that most noble Knight Earle Thomas? Had hee lived, wee and our whole Realme should have had speciall need and use of him. This fellow the longer hee lives, the more villanies hee will commit, as having already filled my Kingdome with his desperate outrages. By the soule of God hee shall therefore die the death he hath deserved.

(47) By this then it is evident, that these tragedies against the Lords were exploited by others in which it is plaine that this King (otherwise so devout to God, so good and so full of naturall good propensions) was fatally over-wrought by wicked counsell; though hee therein hee inexcusable, for good nature (as we call it) cannot suffice for publicke errors. But the condemned man was forthwith put to death accordingly; the King being most highlie offended, that none had entreated him on the Earles behalfe, whom (saith Walsingham) hee did in wardlie love. Neuertheless, hee had not long before created the elder Spaner Earle of Winchester, and deckt the plume of his fortunes with a toppe-feather taken out of the sad late Earle of *Lancaster*es crosse, that is to say, with the Castle and honour of * Devonshire, parcel of the Earldome of Lincolne. Having thus farre shewed the originall of the mischief, we will hasten now to the last Act or Catastrophe of our Edwards tragedie, onely wee will first remember some inter-curring matters.

(48) You have heard before, how that the Cardinals sent from the Pope, had (in favour of the English) put Scotland vnder Interdict; wherefore King Robert now at last dispatched the Bishop of Glouster, and Thomas Randolph Earle of Murray to Rome, for obtaining release and absolution, but they returned without effecting it. Whereupon King Robert moved to haue a truce for thirteene yeeres, which King Edward accordingly granted, and the Pope * then absolved the Scots. The matters of Scotland seemed thus to be sufficiently provided for during that time, and the rather for that somewhat before the morion for truce, the King had caused the newly created Earle of Archie Andrew de Herkley to be degraded, hanged, drawne and quartered for treason, which hee was constrained to haue entred into with the

Sent, vpon * whom he had before done speciall services, as hauing for that cause the Caille and Cite of Carle committed to his government. The truce with Scotland being thus confirmed, the King makes his progresse through the * Counties of York and Lancaster and the Marches of Wales, from whence the late Iudicious had their nourishments, taking wife & cheerful courtes for mitigation of Iulther there, and prevention of like inconueniences, by punishing their Authors severely. And Iustices * void of all corruption, were appointed else-where.

(49) In the meane space, the new King of France Charles the fifth, a most carnell enemy to the English mens possessions there, sought occasions of quarrell with King Edward, who while hee consulted at home how to order that affaie, the young La Roye Mortimer, one whom the Duell faith out * Courtier referred to kindle new diffention with, and to stirre vp a most miserable ciuill warre, hauing corrupted his Keepers, or (as some others write) hauing poisoned them with a slepy drinke, escaped out of the Tower of London, getting ouer cleirely without any empachment into France.

(51) Thus was the matter, and as it were, the Embriue, of their common destruction laid, and begun in the impotencie of a womans will, to helpe out the which with shrewd drifts and directions, they encrease her side with Adam Bishoppe of Houeford, by stripping him out of all his Temporalities as a Traiour, for that hee had supported the Mortimers in the Barons quarrell. This Adam (saith our Knight) was a man of most subtile witte, and in all worldly policies profound, daring to doe great things and fadious withall, who for this cause conceiuing deepe hate, and therefore easily growing deate to the Queene, made a great secret party. To which Thomas Burgh Bishoppe of Lincoln, who (for like causes) had beene kept from his temporalities (about two yeeres) ioyned himselfe. Neither would the Spenser auarice suffer them to weaken the multitudes of their enemies, for they told the Kings gracious fauour to such as had beene in the Barons quarrell, at so great rates that they by granting away lands and Manours to the said Lords Spensers for their pardons &c. verie many of the Nobles were empowenished. To be short, the royall power being in the hands of the Spensers and Roger Baldock Chancelour, or of their Creatures and Fauourites, this other faction had the generall discontentments of the Realme to worke vpon their advantage.

and negotiate her husbands affaie in France. Shee did so; and whereas before her departure, things were in great extremity betweene the two Nations, inso much that all the French were banished out of England, not they who were attendant on the Queen herselfe in neere place being spared, all matters by her negotiation and suite were quietted, vpon condition that King Edward should giue to his sonne Edward of Windsor (afterward King) the Duchy of Aquitaine, and Earldome of Peintre, for which the king of France was pleased to accept his said young Nephew homage.

(53) This was done, and the Prince sent ouer for that purpose to his mother, to the vtter vndoeing of the King his Father, and of all his fauourites. For the heire of England being in foraine parts, among the contrary faction, all the consufation was (vnder colour of ruining the Spensers) to accomplish further matters. The Prince, hauing (as Boys de France) done his homage for that Duchy and Countie to his vnckle Charles de Nauais King of France, (as also the Queene his mother) sent for backe by the King about Michaelmas, but the Queenes conspiracie being not yet ripe, shee deferred to obey, detaining her sonne still.

(54) There went ouer with the young Prince, among many others, Walter Stapleton, Bishoppe of Exeter, who perceiuing into what familiarity the Lord Roger Mortimer was growne with the Queene, which * seemed greater then either good with her honour or dutie, and seeing both him and other of the Kings enemies and fugitiues enioy that prauise in counsell, which was assigned to himselfe, who was now (as being none of theirs) * excluded, returned secretly (though valent for) into England, faithfully (as it became a good man) declaring his knowledge.

(56) The Queen, on the other side, fearing that the Spenser gold had laid traines to blow her whole proceedings vp in France, kept herselfe out of the way, till with the Prince, the Lord Roger Mortimer, and other their adherents, they were safely gotten into Hennault: There might be some other reason also and necessary to moue Queene Isabel to depart out of France, beside the doubt of that kind of corruption in the Peeres thereof: as to turne off a warre from thence being her native Countrey, which for her cause was afflicted in the Sea-breeches thereof; for Sir John Sturmius, Sir Nicholas de Reved, and Sir John de Felton, with the Naue of the Ports and of other places, had by commission from the King bestowed the narrow Seas, that they within a short time brought into England as lawfull prize, * an hundred and twenty Normans shippes of vessels. Moreover, whereas those two Bishopps which the Pope had sent, were returned forrowfull out of England, not onely without doing any good on her behalfe, but also without hope of doing any, they might easily be persuaded that the sword must doe it, or nothing.

(57) But in Hennault shee found most honourable and louing welcome of the Earle, where, therefore (without the consent or aduise of the Peeres of England) shee ensured (saith our * Author) that delight and terror of the whole world, her sonne, being then about foureteene yeeres old, to Philippa the said Ewies daughter, and with the money of her portion winged fouldiers out of Hennault and Germany to transport sport into England. These her friends expected her arrivall dayly, of which the Bishoppes of Hereford and Lincolne were not meanest: Her men and Naue being now ready, shee with her sonne the Prince, the Lord Edmond Earle of Kent his vnkle, * Almerie de Valence Earle of Pembroke, the Lord Iohn of Hennels, the Earle of Hennels brother (a valiant Gentleman) the Lord Roger Mortimer, and many other English-men of name and note, with aboute two thousand and seven hundred Hennages and German, vnder the leading of the said Lord Iohn, arrived at Oswell in Stafforde vpon the Friday before Saint Michaels day.

(58) Her arrivall being reported to the King (who was, poore Prince, not onely destitute of friends and meanes, but as it seemes, of courage, and counsell also) it did not at first seeme credible. The truth appearing, he demanded assistance of the City of London, whose answere was, That they would honour with all dutie, the King, the Queene, and Prince, but would shut their gates against forreiners, and traitors to the Realme, and with all their powers withstand them. In this answere the King and his few friends reposing no assurance, he committed an errour worse then that former of sending his sonne out of England, by retiring himselfe into the Welsh, with his inseparable fauourites the Spaners, Baldock and others there, to raise force against the Queene: but before hee went, hee left his other sonne, the Lord Iohn (called of Eltham) in the Tower of London with the Countesse of Gloucester, the Kings Niece, wife to the younger Spaner Earle of Gloucester committing the Tower it selfe to Sir Iohn de Welfon, who was well provided of men and victuals. Hee commanded all men also to destroy and kill the Queenes partakers, none excepted but her selfe, her sonne, and Edmond Earle of Kent, the Kings brother by the Father, and that none, vpon paine of death, and losse of all that they might leefe, should aid or assist them: and that hee should haue a thousand pound, who did bring the Lord Mortimer head. Thus took hee his last leaue of London, and in a manner also of his Rule or Domination.

(59) On the contrary part, there repaired to the Queene the Earle Marshall and Henry Earle of Lincolne, the Bishoppes of Lincolne, Hereford, Ely, and of Batons, Knights, and armed Souldiers no small multitude, whom aswell to retain, as to draw more, letters and rumors flew about, declaring (though falsly) that the King of France had in the aide of his sister sent fo many Dukes, Eazles, and others, that England could scarce suffice to feed them. This, for such whom the opinion of warlike strength would winne: but those whom shew of Religion might moue, it was as cunningly, and as falsly spread, that the Pope had excommunicated all such as did take armes against the Queene, and (the more to countenance the fiction) that two Cardinals employed about the Premises, were seen in the Queens Campe. Then was it proclaimed that the causes of her coming were to deliuer the Realme from the misleaders of the King, which were named to be the Spaners, Roger Baldock Bishoppe of Norwich, Lord Chancellor and their Followers; all others to be safe, and that nothing should bee taken from any other subiect without true payment; but finally, that he who brought the younger Spaners head should haue two thousand pounds. The things first thus ordered, the Queen with her sonne and whole power pursues the King (as it had bene agreede by the Councell of warre) taking first her way to Oxford: where the "whole Vniuersity being called together, In the presence of the Queene, the Prince, Roger Mortimer and the rest of that troope, the Bishop of Hereford (the Queenes bosome Counsellor) preaching to them on this Text, My head, my head ake, deliuered to them the reasons of the Queens coming with her Army, concluding (more like a Butcher then a Diuine) I haue aking & lirk head of a kingdom, was of necessary to be taken off, and not to be tampered with by any other physlike.

(60) The Londoners in fauour of the Queene, and hatred of the Spaners committed sundry outrages, besides bloody sacrifice in cutting off the Bishop of Excesters head, and some others (whom the King had made Guardian of London) in their popular fury, among the which one of them was a Citizen of their owne Iohn de Marshal, who had bene of the younger Spaners acquaintance. The Tower of London they get into their possession, placing and displacing the Garrison and Officers therein at their pleasure, vnder the name of the Lord Iohn of Eltham, the Kings second sonne, whom they proclaimed Captayn of the City, and of the Land. They also set at liberty all prisoners, which by the popular Queens commandement was done through the whole Realme: and all banished men and fugitiues were rrouked; who all * flocking vnto London, brought no small increase to her forces.

(61) Whither in the meane space doth wofull Edward flie? what force, what course, what way takes hee poore Prince? O fearful condition of lo great a Monarches State, when a Wife, a Sonne, a Kingdome are not trusted, and those onely are trusted who had nothing strong, but a will to liue and die with him. The Queene passing from Oxford to Gloucester (onward to the siege of Bristol Castle) grew all the while in her strengths: like a rowled snow-ball, or as a River which spreads still broader from the fountaine to the Ocean, * vnto acquirit cunode. For thither repaired to her (for the lone of the young Prince) the Lord Perey, the Lord Wake, and others aswell out of the North, as Marches of Wales. But Edward (hauing left the Earle of Winchester, the elder Lord Spaner, in the Castell of Bristol for the keeping thereof) meditates flight with a few into the Isle of Lande in Seuerne Sea, or into Ireland, & while hee wandreth about not finding where to rest safe, his roiall credite, name, and power, (like a Cliff which falling from the toppe of some huge rocke, breakes into the more pieces, the farther it tolles) are daylie more and more diminiſhe as they ſcatter, till now at last they are come vnto a very nothing. After a weeke therefore spent vnto the Sea, Sir Thomas Blant forsaking him, and committing to the Queene, he came on shore in Glamorganſhire, where with his few friends hee entrusted himselfe to God, and the faith of the *PP*ſſ (who indeed ill loued him) lying hidden among them in the Abbey of Neath.

(63) The King not appearing, Proclamations were every day made in the Queens Armie, declaring, * That it was the common consent of the realm that hee should returne, and * receiue the gouernement thereof, so as he would conformance himselfe to his people. This (whether Stratagem or Truth) not prevailing, Henry Earle of Leicester the late Earles Brother, Sir William de Zouch, and Robert de Harwell a Welſhman, who all of them had Lands in those parts where the King concealed himselfe, were sent with coine and forces to discover and take him. The Queene and her people lay in the City of Hereford, the Episcopall See of that great Arch-plottor of her coaries Adam de Orleton, where by aduise and consent of the Lords, her sonne the Duke of Aquitaine was made High-Keeper of England, and they as to the Caſſar of the time, did ſwear him ſtately. And he uelſo the Bishoppe of Norwich was made Chancellor of the Realme, and the Bishophe of Winchester Treasurer.

(65) What will not money, diligence and faire words doe; with corrupt dispositions, even to enervating, of all bands of either religious or civill duties? By lach means therefore the desolate, sad, and unfortunate King, * came into the colde of Lancaster hands, and with him the younger Lord Spencer Earle of Gloucester, Robert Baldock Lord Chancelour and Simon de Reding, there being no regard had to the detention of any other. The King was conveyed by the Earle from the place of his surname to Mannouth, to Ledwiche, and so to the Castell of Kentworth belonging to the Earle of Leicester, who was appointed to attend him, that is, to keepe him safe. The other three, Spencer, Baldock and Reding were strongly guarded to Hereford, there to be disposed of at the pleasure of their most capital enemies.

(67) The Lord Spencer and the rest, * on whom William Trassill the lodge gave sentence of death, being now drawne to Hereford, the said Lord being clad in his coat-armour, was most despitely dragged to the place of execution, where being first hung upon a gallows fifty foot high, hee was afterward headed, and cut into quarters: they who brought him to the Quene, having the promised summe of two thousand pounds distributed among them for reward. His head was set up at London, and his quarters in foure parts of the Kingdom. Simon de Reding was hanged ten foot lower then hee in the same place.

(68) This Execution (saith Maltingham) was done upon a Munday in revenge of the death of Thomas Earle of Lancaster, whose blood was likewise shed upon a Munday. Robert Baldock late Lord Chancelor was committed to the keeping of the Bishop of Hereford, who after a time caused him to bee brought up to Hereford-hall in London, where the ravenous people (not without the Bishopps of Herefords secret approvement as was said) tooke him violently away, and (though he were a Priest) thrust him into Newgate, where they vied him so vandoily, that albeit they had no accusation, but onely for being faithfull to his Sovereigne, wherewith to charge him, he was not long after died in prison to whom (saith De la Moire) might be applied that of Quintilian, Turquebanus vocat quinquaginta occidit.

(69) The mournfull King being at Kentworth Castle, there repaired thither the Bishops of * Winchester, Hereford, and Lincoln, two Earles, two Abbots, foure Barons, * two Iudges, three Knights for every County, and for London, and other principall places (chiefly for the fine Ports) a certaine chosen number, selected by the Parliament, which then the Quene and her Sonne held at London. The Bishops of Winchester and Lincoln (as it was agreeed upon) came thither before any of the rest, willing to give the King to understand what kind of Embassage was approaching, as to prepare him by the best Arguments they could to forsake the desire, and expectation of their new moulded common-weale, which could onely be by resignation of the Crowne, that his Sonne (whom the body of the then conspired Seare had elected) might reign in his stead.

with other reasons drawne out of common places, thoroughly studied for that purpose, that (though not without many sobs and teares) hee finally did not dissent, if his answer were truly reported (which * som doubt of) unto the Parliament. For they tolde him that the Common-weale had conceived to be reconciliable dislikes of his government, the particulars whereof had beene opened in the general assembly at London, that it was resolved neere to endure him as King any longer. That notwithstanding, those dislikes had not extended themselves so farre, as for his sake to exclude his issue, but that with vniuersall applause, and joy, the Common-weale had in Parliament elected his eldest Sonne the Lord Edward for King. That it would be a very acceptable thing to God, willingly to give over an earthly Kingdom for the common-good and quiet of his Countrey, which they said could not otherwise bee secured. That yet his honour should be no less after the resignation, then it was before, onely him the common-weale would neuer suffer to reigne any longer. They finally durst tell him, that vniuersally hee did of him selfe renounce his Crowne and Scepter, the people would neither endure him, nor any of his Children, neither should they, but disclaiming all homage and fealty, would elect some other for King, who should not bee of the blood.

(71) The whole Company sent by the body of State (if it may be called a Body which then had no Head) thence from London, where it attended their returne, being placed by the Bishopps of Hereford, according to their degrees, in the Presence Chamber at Kentworth Castle, the King gowned in blacke came forth at last out of an inward roome, and presented himselfe to his vassals, where (as being Pruiue to their errand) sorrow strooke such a chaine into him, that hee fell to the earth, lying stretched forth in a deadly swoone; The Earle of Leicester, and the Bishopps of Winchester beholding this, rane vnto him, and with much labour recovered the half-dead King, setting him vpon his feet. As soft as heeny as this sight was, were not yet of any adoe or effects of compassion expressed towards him at this present, so settled (as it seemed) was the hatred and asperion. The King being now (we cannot say) come to himselfe, but to the sense of his misery, the Bishopps of Hereford declares the cause of their present Embassage, and running over the former points, concludes as before, saying, (as in the person of the common-weale) That the King must resigne his Dukedome to his eldest Sonne, or after the refusal suffer them to elect such a person as themselves should iudge to be most fit and able to defend the Kingdom.

(72) The dolorous King having heard this speech, brake forth into sighes and teares, and being (saith his most fauourable reporter) more ready to sacrifice his body for Christs cause, then once to behold the dissolution of his honours, or (through his occasion) the perpetual disturbance of the Kingdom, (as knowing, saith he, that a good shepherd should give his life for his flocke,) made at the last his answer to this effect, * That hee knew that for his many sinnes hee was false into this calamity, and therefore had the lesse cause to take it grievously. That much hee sorrowed for * this that the people of the Kingdom were so exasperated against him, as that they could vterly abhorre his any longer rule and souerainety: and therefore hee besought all that were there present to * forgive and spare him being so afflicted. That nevertheless he was so greatly to his good pleasure and liking, (seeing it) could none other be on his behalfe, that his eldest Sonne was so gracious in their sight and therefore hee gave them * thanks for choosing him to be their King.

(73) This being said, there was forthwith a proceeding to the short ceremonies of his resignation, which principally consisted in the surrender of his

*Disarm and Ensignes of Majesty, to the vic of his son the new King. Thereupon * Sir William Trussel (as being a Judge who could fit them with quills of law to colour so lawlesse and treasonable a fact) on the behalfe of the whole Realme renounced all homage, and allegiance to the Lord Edward of Carrmaris late King.*

(74) The forme of that renunciation, as being obsolete, you shall have in the like * obsolete words of Trewe, which was this: I William Trussel, in name of all men of the land of England, and of all the Parliament Proceutors, refigne to thee Edward, the homage that was made to thee sometime; and from thee time forward, now following, I desie thee, and proue thee of all royal power, so I shall never be bound to thee as for King after this time. Which being done, Sir Thomas Blunt Knight, Secward of the household, by breaking his staffe, resigned his office, and declared that the late Kings family was discharged.

(75) Edward being thus dekinged, the Embassie rode joyfully backe to London to the Parliament, with the resigned * Ensignes, and dispatch of their employment. Here (for that this seems the last houre of his raigne and kingly state) wee will make a stop, referring on for the rest to the next Kings life, vnder whose name and abused authority they were acted.

(76) Notwithstanding, wee may not forget in all these doings to call to mind, who it was that sat at the helme of State, overlooking, and overruling Queene, Prince and all; to wit, the most ambitious and vindictive man living, Roger Lord Mortimer of Wigmore: for, as for the * Queene, when shee was (God knows how farre guilty,) aduertised of her husbands dethronization, shee outwardly expressed so great extremity of passion (notwithstanding that at the same time shee was tolde of her sonnes surrogation) as if shee had bene distraught in her wittes: which the Prince her sonne (then about fifteen yeeres of age) beholding, hee made an oath, neuer to accept of the Crowne against his fathers good will; and thereupon it was (saith Walsingham a Writer wortheie of belief) that the said Embassie was sent to Kewenarth Castle, (where the now no more a King remained) to worke his assent, whose answer therunto (saith * another) was by those Messengers related at full, and fuller then in truth it was sent by the King; but the Peeres then in Parliament made their vic thereof, in procuring such a Prince to take the rule of the, whom they hoped, by reason of his tender yeeres, themselves should be able to rule and overmaster.

Shee was his wife twenty yeeres, and his widow thirty, and lived threescore and three yeeres. Shee died at Wallingford in London, the two & twentieth of August 1357, and was buried in the middle of the Gray-Friers in London, the 27. of September following.

His Issue.

(78) Edward (surnamed of FFindfor) the eldest son of K. Edward and Queene Isabel his wife, was borne at the Castle of FFindfor, the thirteenth of October, the yeere of Christ, 1312, and the first of his fathers raigne: hee was created Prince of Wales, and Duke of Aquitaine, in a Parliament holden at Turke, Anno 1322. and in the troubles of the Realme and absence of his Father, in an assembly of Lords met at Hereford, and in presence of the Queene, was made L. FFindfor of England by a common decree: vnto whom all the Lords made their fealty, in receiving an Oath of Allegiance to be faithfull and loyall vnto him as to the Lord Warden of the Realm: and shortly after, the Father deposed, hee was crowned King of England, by the name of Edward the third.

(79) Isabel (surnamed of Eltham) the second sonne of King Edward and Queene Isabel his wife, was borne at Eltham in Kent, the 15. of August, and yeere of Christ, 1315, and at twelue yeeres of age was created Earle of Cornwall in a Parliament, Anno 1327. and third yeere of the raign of King Edward his brother: hee died in Scotland unmarried, in the flower of his youth, the tenth of his brothers raigne, and yeere of Christ, 1334.

(80) Joan the eldest daughter, and third child of King Edward and Queene Isabel, was borne in the Tower of London: shee was married being a child at Barnes the eighteenth day of July, in the fourth yeere of the Raign of King Edward her brother, 1329, to David Prince of Scotland, sonne and heire apparent of King Robert Bruce, whom hee succeeded with in one yeere after in the kingdome, being but seven yeeres of age, and was the second King of Scotland of the name of David; shee was his wife twenty and eight yeeres, and being come into England to visite her brother, shee decaied here without Issue, in the two and thirtieth yeere of his Raigne, 1357, and was buried at the Gray-Friers in London.

(81) Eleanor, the second and youngest daughter, & fourth child of King Edward and Queene Isabel, was the second wife of Reginald the second, Earle of Gloucester, married vnto him with a portion of fifteen thousand pounds 1332. being the sixt yeere of the raign of King Edward her brother, who being the Vicar generall of the Empire, the Emperour Lewis of Warre, created him first Duke of Golden: shee had Issue by him Arnold and Edward both Dukes successiue after their Father without Issue: the later of them leaving his Duchie and his wife to his Nephew William Duke of Gold his halfe sisters sonne.

But this his worth did not diſplay it ſelfe, vntill hee had plucked the ſway of things out of the hands of the Queene his mother, and of that aſpiring danger and tempeſt of England, Roger Mortimer who wholly poſſeſſed her.

"sure, and will, have taken vpon vs the gouernance of the said Kingdome, and as the manner is, haue receiued the Fealties and Homages of the said Prelates and Peeres. Wee therefore desire that our peace for the quiet and calme estate of our people should bee inuolubly obserued, do will and commaund you, that presently vpon sight of these presents, you cause our Peace to bee openly proclaimed through your whole Bailly-wicks, forbidding all and every one on our behalf, vnder paine and perill of disheritour, and losse of life and limmes, not to presume to violate or infringe our said peace, but that every one pursue or follow his actions, and complaints without any manner of outrage, according to the lawes & customes of our Kingdome: for wee are ready & alwayes wilbe, so admitter full right to all & singular copinants, as well poor as rich in our Courts of Iustice. Witness our selfe, &c. in the Calends of February vpon fiftenth daye Candlemas Eue.

(2) First therefore there was procured for the Queene mother so greata Dowry, that the young King had carce a third part of the Kingdome left for his maintenance; which exorbitant estate, in tide the Queene, in the vie was Mortimer, and from this treasonable defalcation and weakening of the roiall maner, hee snatched his owne deuices with authority and riches; so that his hatred against Spenser was not on behalfe of the Common-wealth, but for that any one should abuse it for his private but himselfe. Lastly, when they had certaine intelligence, that sundry great persons and others, as the whole order of Priests-preachers, tooke party of the late Kings captivity, and seemed to consule for his deliuerance, they knowing that by recovery of his former estate, their iust confusion must follow, they resolved to strengthen (as men supposed) their other impieties with murder.

(3) For albeit the Queene in her outward gestures pretended nothing but sorrow for her Lord & husbands distresse, yet in stead of bringing to him her person (which the deposed Prince did wonderfullie) shee onely sent vnto him a fine apparell & kind letters, but contrary to the lawes of God and man, withdrew her selfe from nuptiall duties, bellowing them as the game went, which will blasphemous as freely as of meaner Dames vpon the bloody Adulterer Mortimer, fathering her absence vpon the state, which (she faigned) would not suffer her to come vnto him. The deolate Prince was hereupon taken from Kenilworth Castle, by expresse order from the young King at their procurement, for that the Earle of Lancaster (Lord of that peece) was suspected to pity too much his calamitie. Hee was deliuered by Indenture, to Sir Thomas de Courmay the elder, and Sir Iohn Maitland, two mercenarie and most vnworthy Knights.

(4) These two Instruments of the Dinell, hauing conducted him first to the Castle of Corf, then to Bristol, and lastly in great secrecie, and with more villanous disguise, then it became either Knights, or the lowdest varlets in the world, came out of Sir Thomas de la More, you may read at large in the collections of Iohn Stew to the Caille of Barkley, where after many vile deuices, executed vpon him in wine, they more then barbarously murdered him.

(5) Neuer was the fallacie of pointings, or Ambiguities of Phrase more multiceously vied to the destruction of a King, or defence of the Contrary, then in this famous Parricide, for it is said that a bloody Sophisme conceined in these words was sent;

"Adus ar dum occides a nolite timere bonum est

Tested King Edwards hand Refuse to feare I count is good.

Where the Comma or pause being put after Nolite, bid them not to make him away, but after timere, insinuates a plaine encouragement to the fact.

(6) The 'physic' which is said to be the Author of this ambiguous Riddle, sent by the Lord Mortimer, was Adam de Trevelan, who vterly denied any such intention, when the Murderers for their owne iustificacion, produced the writing it selfe vnder Queene Isabels Seale, and the seales of the other Conspirators, and therefore the said Bishoppe Adam was the cause, why Gernay and Maitland were with terrible menaces shaken vp, pursued and outlawed, who more pursued with the memory and conscience of so iustious a Tragedie, fled out of England. Gernay after three yeeres banishment, being discovered at Massels in France, and apprehended, was conuicted backe, but had his head taken off at Sea, in his passage, lest he should reuale too much at his arrival, but Maitland lay hidden in Germany a long time, doing penance.

(7) This Parricide was committed about 5. Mathers day and (that you may note what confidence they had in their Art of secret murder, as also an ordinary mockage of the people in like cases) the noble body was laid forth, and many Abbots, Priors, Knights, and Burgesses of Bristol and Gloucester were sent for to see the same; vpon which, although there appeared no manifest outward sign of violent death, but the skinnie all ouer whole and vnbroken, yet the cry of murder could not so be smothered, but the meanes and manner came to light. This happinesse certainly the poore Prince had, that after his imprisonment hee reformed his life in so pious & Christian sort, that it gaue occasion when hee was dead of disposition, whether hee were not to be reputed a Saint, euens (by our Authors) there was the like Question concerning Thomas Earle of Lancaster, though beheaded for apparat Treason. His body without any funeral pompe was buried among the beundells in their Abbey at Gloucester, and so (saith our passionate author) the stately height of the Angels Kingdome receiued this Scholler, and Disciple of Christ, thus rest and spoiled of his English Kingdome.

(8) The young King was now vpon the borders of Scotland with a puissant Armie, where also the Queene mother, and Mortimer, with many other Nobles were present, and hauing enuironed the Scots (who had pierced into England with inuasive arms) in the woods of Wyndesore and Stanhope Parke, made sure account of certaine victorie; but by the treason of the said Lord Mortimer (as afterward was laid to his charge) they were suffered to escape out of that mischief, and the young King with griefe returned inglorious after an huge waste of treasure, and perill of his owne person.

(9) For while the English heult thus held the Scots, as it were besieged Sir Iames Douglas in the dead of night, with about two hundred swift horse assailed the Kings owne Pauson, and missed so little of killing him, that a Priest his Chaplaine a stout and loyal man was slain in his defence, and Sir Iames escaped backe without hurt, but not without honor for his bold attempt. In the Scots Campe a notable, that the English found five hundred great Owes and Kine ready killed, a thousand furs full of flesh, ready to be roasted, five hundred Cawdrons made of beastes skins, full of flesh, ouer the fire seething, and about (12) About this time died drunken with leiprie, Robert Bruce King, and recoverer of Scotland, and the most approved Warriour of the world in that age, by whose losse it was loone found, how much the vertue and fortune of one man are worth in any Nation. But before hee died, that peace was made with the Saxs by the meanes of the Queene and the Lord Mortimer, which is so much dispraised by our Writers, and in the end proved capitall to the principall Actor Mortimer.

(13) For this treaty it was that the King (then in his Minority) fealed Charters to the Scots & Normans, whose contents were contrary by the Queene, the Card Mortimer, and Sir James Douglas, without the priuety of the English. There was also directed to them that famous Euidence called the * Baynes Hill, and the King acquired them of all * claime and pretence of right to the Superiority of Scotland, rendering backe fundrie Jewels taken by the English from the Scots, among the which was one speciall, called the Blacke Croffe of Scotland. There was it also granted, that * all Englishmen should leaue their lands in scotland, vntill they would inhabite vpon them, and become Liege-men to the King thereof, besides many other things to the high discontentation (as was the humor of those times) of the English Subjects. Moreover, vnder the specious colour of refection of damages, King Robert was to pay to King Edward thirty thousand Marks sterling, with which (as the meed of treasor) the Lord Mortimer was afterward publicly charged, and for the same, and other his crimes was executed as a Traitor. Finally, vpon the twentieth of Iuly, David Bruce Prince of Scotland, a child of seuen or eight yeeres old, and sonne and heire to King Robert, married Jane, sister to K. Edward at Bernheke: by which peace the English were made obnoxious to some reproache, the Scottish Nation in force, calling the late Lady, Jane Maile-Peace.

(14) And therefore saith one of this part of King Edwards raigne: that drawne aside with euill aduise, by reason of his age, he committed many foule errors in State, at the beginning of his Government: which is also the generall opinion of all our Writers, whereto this verse is by some applied;

Vapuri terra, sapientie fontibz garræ,

*Where Children Rulers are,
There oft is woe and war.*

(11) The said likewise about this time Charles the Fair, King of France, (to whom King Edward had not long before done homage for his Dutchie of Gafingnes) the third and last sonne of Philip the Faire, King of France, by whose deathe the Crowne of that noble Kingdome, deuolued to this our Edward King of England in right of his mother Queene Isabel: And because vpon this Title King Edward did afterward claime the said Crowne, we will bereaue for all infidels you in the iudice thereof.

(16) Three sonnethere were of King Philip the Fair, (to wit, Lewis Hurin, Philip le long, and Charles the Fair) who all successively reigned in France once after the other and none of them leaving any Issue, at such time as King Edward made his claime, the whole right seemed to be in Isabel the onely Child of the said Philip which had any issue, for an other sister which thoe had died an Infane.

(17) This tale thus seeming plaine, was not for such accepted by the French, who received to the Crownne Philip of Valois, whose father Charles of Valois was younger Brother to Philip the Fair, advancing the Brothers house before the daughters sonne, not following the propinquity or descent of blood, but the melody of love, vpon which ground they had also firethly put by Isam daughter of Lewis Hutin, preferring Philip le long her vncle. The French in barre to her unwill, pretended a fundamentall law or estate, by which no woman was inheritable to the Crown of France, and in defence of that opinion with blood King Edward afterward with so much toyle and clamour, though that very law made Edmonds title the stronger (as himselfe truly pleaded) hee being the Male, albeit his right defended by the Female.

(18) This Title to so glorious a Monarchy though it accrued to the English, by this match with Queen Isabell, yet doth willingham * freely pronounce, That neither that affinity, nor any other contrivall; with the French, was ever enabled or brought any benefit to England: which opinion as it may seeme strange, so will it be answere a wide Readers paine in the fruse, to observe through the course of our stories, whether the said Graue Writer had iustt occasion to so speake or no. Another conceit there was of this Edward's marriage with Philippa the Earle of Holland's daughter, which about that time was consummed, though Philip de Valois (king of France by intirall as our Annales report him) was her vnder, her mother being his owne sister.

(19) Their blood now at home against the stream of the Queen, and her Lord Mortimer absolute way, some great personages, who did not wholly allow their doings, among which was the Kings vncle, Edmond Earle of Kent, whose death they thorly procured. Meane-while the more to despise and dare their outdookes, Roger Mortimer was created Earle of the Marches of Wales, at a Parliament holden at Salisbury: at which time also Iohn of Bitham the Kings Brother was made Earle of Cornwall, and the Lord Raier of Ireland Earle of Ormond. From whence the Lord Henry Earle of Lancaster and sundry other of the Peeres, feeling the King's troden (as it seemed to them) vnder foot, did absent themselves, meditating ciuill armes for redresse, who notwithstanding (by the labour of Simon de Mopham Archbishop of Canterbury) was reconciled: This Archbishopspe very worthily also excommunicated all such as had any hand in the sacrilegious parricide of that noble and loiall Prebte Walter Bishop of Excester, for any waies vollied him, their aiders, complices or abettors whatsoever. But after the Coronation of Philip the yong Queene, in another Parliament at Winchester, the said Earle Edmond was condemned for conspiring to deliuer his brother, late King of Scotland, whom (likely inough by Mortimer's practise) he was drawne into an absurd beleefe to bee full alive. Thus, for deuiling to set a dead-man at liberty, this noble Earle Edmond the kings bial vncle had his head stricken off, though from * Noone till six at heaht, bee blood at the place of death without the Gallies-gates, none being found to behead him, till a base wretch of the Martriall-sea was fent, and did it so little conscience did the malice and ambition of his potent aduersaries make of shedding the Roiall blood, which by Gods iustler iudgement was not long venged, pace did now approach and summon Mortimer to a bloodie account; for the young King adding himselfe to ferious thoughts, and putting on the Maie before his yeeres required, easily saw his owne peccell in the others potentia. The Queene his mother (to the common dishonour and griefe of the Kingdome) being generally bruted to be with child by Mortimer, hee vpon this aduise suddenly and aduenturously surprisid the proud man at Parliament holden in Nottingham with whom were the L. Geoffrey Mortimer his sonne, and Sir Simon de Bedford, who all three were fene prisoners to the Tower of London, vnder a strong guard. Which done, the king by common consent of the Parliament tooke into his hands his mothers excessive Dower, & put her to a narrow penison of one thousand pounds by yeer, circumscribing her within as narrow * limits for her abode, but doing her yearly the honour and comfort of once or twice visiting her, though otherwise scarce thinking her worthy of life, in regard of her priuacie with Mortimer, and his many heinous practices.

(22) Oh, what enchantment are Honour and Power to the minds of men! how suddenly, and how strangely doe they blow vp the flame with the contempt of others, and forgetfulness of themselves! Certainly the frail estate of mans constitution is clearely seene in this high Lord, who drunken with felicitie, and fearing neither God nor man, fell into vtter confusion when leath hee feared. The probable manner whereof is worthy the relating. There was in the Castle of Nottingham (and at this day is) a certain secret way or Mine cut through a rocke, vpon which the said Castle is built, one issue whereof openeth toward the river of Trent, which runnes vnder it, and the other vttereth it selfe fane within vpon the surface, and is (at this present) called Mortimer's hole; through this, the young King well armed, and strongly seconded, was conducted with drawne swordes, by some his trallie and (sworne seruants, (among which was that braue Monticote, whom his vertues vnder this King raised to the Earldome of Salisbury, &c.) vp to the Queenes Chamber, whose doore (so fearlesly he blinded affliction) was vnlocked, and with her was Mortimer (the kings Malice as the rumour spread him) readie to go to bed, whom with the slaughter of a Knight, and one or two that resisted) they laid hold vpon. This was not reputed a slender enterprize, in regard that in Mortimer's retinue were not fewer (they say) then one hundred and fourescore Knights, besides Esquires and Gentlemen.

(23) The cause for which hee was condemned in open Parliament at Westminister, these ragged * verses following comprehend, which without any disparagement to their makers iudgement, might verie well haue bene in Prose, but for deuotie and change wee haue here inserted them.

- Five heinous crimes against him some were had,
1 First that he caused the King to yield the Scot (To make a peace) treason that were from him got.
And therein shall the Charter called Magna, 2 That of the Scots hee had broked priuy game, 3 That through his means Sir Edward of Carnaruen, In Berkeley Castle most traitorously was slaine.
4 That with his Princes mother hee had leue, 5 And finally with pulling at his pleasure, Hee robbed the King and Commons of their treasure.

But the most barbarous murder of the kings father, and specialle the dishonourable peace and contract with the then professed enemies of England, were principallie insisted vpon as heinous treason. Hee was after sentence ignominiously drawne to Tyburne, the common place of execution, then called the Elms, and there vpon the common Gallows was as ignominiously executed, hanging (by the kings commandement) two daies and two nights, a publike & glad some spectacle. There died with him Sir Simon de Bedford Knight, & John Deuere Esquier, as well for expiation of the late King Edwards death, as in complement, as it were of so great a mans fall, whose liars doe seldom, or neuer perish single.

(24) Now came Scotland turne about to suffer againe most grievous losses and afflictions, an ordinarie effect of Childrens gouernment, whether Children in age, or in discretion: for the Lord Edward Balliol hearing of King Roberts death, and the tenderage of King David his son and heire of that Balliol, to whom king Edward the first had aduised the Scots crown, with such voluntaries as hee could raise (though his Father the Lord John had * released his claime to king Robert, and though King John was in fauour of his sister Iuan Queene of Scotland, would not openly at first support him) embark his life in Yorkshire, and invaded that Realme, where, vpon his landing, he slew Alexander Seton at Kingor and about nine hundred others, putting the rest to flight. Not long after (that no mischief might come alone) neere to the water of Ery, at a place called Dupplin, where the Earles of Mar and Arerch, with two puissant armies of Scots, for the defence of their young King David lay encamped, the said Lord Edward (whose small numbers, not exceeding three thousand English, the Earles as securely and as fatally condemned, as the English vnder Edward the second had condemned the Bruce and his Scots) obtained of them a wonderfull victorie. Balliol (who neere, or rarely, leaues any otherthow purely to the manhood of the English) will needs haue this discomfite effected by a Camoflage, the Balliol and his English with others passing the water of Ery by a Flood in the night, when the enemy little suspected it.

(25) The slaughter euen by his report was miserable: for there were slaine (saith he) the Earles of Marre and Carricke, and three thousand of the Noble, beside Commons. Our * Writers agree that this Flood was passed in the night, but that the fight endured from Sunne-rising till three of the Clocke afternoone, and that, besides the Earles of Marre, and Carricke, three other Earles, Monteth, Athol, and Murray, twelve Barons, eight hundred knights and men of Armes, beside about thirtene thousand other, lost there their liues. Of the English there were onely slaine thirty and three * Esquires: so that not without cause this victory was attributed rather to power diuine then humane.

(27) King Edward considering those foiles which his father had endured, and the opportunity of the time, neither holding himselfe lyable in honour to that contract made on his behalf by the predominant sway of his mother and her Parauour Mortimer, as wherein hee tooke both himselfe, and the rights of his Crowne to haue bene wronged in his minority, which in point of gouernment hee was more bound to respect then his Sifters estate, and for that hee was informed that the Towne and Castle of Berwick belonged to the Crowne of his Realme, hee raised his power, and hauing with him Edward the new-crowned of Scotland, hee laid siege to that Towne and Castle in May. But before hee did this, there is who writes, that hee summoned his brother in law King David to doe homage and fealty vnto him, which when David would not yield to doe, nor confesse hee ought, no more then his father King Robert, hee made that a ground for the iudice of his warre, as repuing the Acts and releases at Northampton void.

(28) To the refuges of Berwick, Archibald Douglas Earle of Angus, Gouernour of Scotland for King David, came with a puissant Army, and gaue King Edward battell at Halidon-hill, where with a lamentable slaughter of his people he was vanquished and slaine. This battell deured in a manner all the remainders of the Scottish Nobles which preferred it selfe at Dupline by retreat, or by absence from that field. There perished besides Archibald, the Earles of Rut, Sutherland, and Carrick, three sonnes of the Lord Walter Stewart, whose issue afterward reigned in Scotland, when warre and death had made way to that line, by extirpation of the Male-Competitors in the races of Bruce and Balliol, and at least foureteen thousand others, with the losse (say large) of one Knight, and ten other Englishmen. Our Writers affirm that the Scots were at this battell, threethou thousand strong, and that there were slaine eight Earles, 1500. horsemen, and of the common Souldiers sixe and thirty thousand; which is not improbable, for so much as Hector confesseth they were stopp'd in their flight, and put to the sword vpon all sides without mercy.

(29) Hereupon Berwick was rendered, which the King of England detained as a supposed parcell of his Patrimony, and distilld the Balliol to the gouernment of the Scottish Kingdome, with sundrie Lords and others of the English. And now the blood-tialties and cruell scores seemed cene betweene the two puissant (though then ynkind) neighbours, and Edward thoroughly redeemed the dishonour sustained at Bannockburn by his late father, deliuering his younger yeeres from that contempt, in which his enemies might otherwise haue holden him, as they had done at the entrance of his reign, playing vpon the English with Truffles and Rounds, of which this one is euerie where noted;

Long beard's heart's selfe, painted hoods mistleffe, Gay coates graue mistleffe, make England the mistleffe.

(30) As for the fabrication of poisoning Earle Thomas Randal, and the hanging of Sir Alexander setons two sonnes, contrarie to faith and law of Armes, at Berwick with the like staines which one would haue leaue vpon this victorious Prince, were haue found no colour of warrant but his owne liberty of snooching, which therefore our freedome of not believing him shall as easily take away and cancell. Neither would wee so farre haue touched this iarring string of discord betweene these two Nations, but that each out of their owne harms of old, may haue the more true sense of their felicity, by their new harmonical concordance.

(31) After that the Nobles of Scotland had unanimously confirmed Balliol in the kingdome thereof, and sworn vnto him faith and allegiance at Perth, hee returned to the King of England at Newcastle vpon Tyne, where hee (submitted to Edward King of England, as his Father had done to Edward the first, and with the like successe; for by occasion of such his submission, our Writers say, the Scots (as before they had done) fell off againe, which auersion, or defection was augmented vpon private quarrels, and titles of inheritance to lands of great value, betweene powerfull Competitors, and by other particular reuenger, to which a people so continually exercised in fight and batteles were not slowe prone.

pile of London) Edward king of England hauing with him the Balliol, and a sufficient Army, persuaded so much, that there was no apparance of rebellion; whereupon hee rooke backe with him the Lord Edward Balliol late crowned king of Scotland (of whole stedfastnes hee was (with Hector) iawraies zealous, & returned, leauing David Comus Earle of Athol, gouernour for the parts beyond the Scottish Sea, with sufficient force and authority (as was judged) to take in such strengthes as yet stood out, but needed not his royall power or presence for their expugnation.

(33) The King of England hoping now that all was well there, had newes brought vnto him not long after, at the Parliament at London, that the Scots were out in Armes againe; whereupon hee obtained aid of money from his Subjects for correcting their attempts, promising to goe against them in person. The Lord Robert Stewart, sonne of the Lady Marianne Bruce, daughter of King Robert (vpon whole line the remainder of the Crown of Scotland had bene elated) was the man that first lifted vp the head of his Country in this dangerous, sad, and desolate condition (though put into action vpon a priuate incurie done vnto him by the Earle of Athol) to whom diuers did adhere, though the quarrel seemed properly to be the said L. Robert, for that if the Bruce were cut off, his hopes perished in them. The Earle of Murray and hee were then chosen gouernours for King David's party, but by reason of the diligence and yert of David Earle of Athol, they were not ablees yett to comene, or effect any thing against the English. uerthelesse it was not long before they slew the said Earle David, at this Parliament the King of England purposed to goe vpon his owne charge into the Holy-Land, and to send the Archbisshoppe of Canterbury to deale with Philip de Valois King of France, for appointing a certaine time, wherein they two with their vaied forces, might take their voyage thither, from which the desire of obtaining the Crowne of France, vpon the fore-mentioned title, did quickly diuert him.

(34) Meane-while, in accomplishment of the Parliaments expectation, King Edward after Michaelmas landed againe into Scotland with an Arme, and sent his Nauie to the Forth The Sea-Force where of, spoyled the Coasts on both sides of the Forth, or Scottish Sea, and putting on land in Saint Colme, they spoyled the Abbey; which Sacrilege, Hector notes was severely punished, the whole Fleet being battered with tempest, and some of the ships perishing. At another time also the like sacrilege being perpetrated there, (hee saith) that the ships wherein the valswall prize was, sunke sodainly to the Sea-ground without any tempest. The King himselfe comming to Perth, to order the Scottish affaires, whiles hee abode there, the Earle of Murray one of the Gouernours was taken Prisoner, who was after deliuered vpon Exchange for the Earle of Namur, (who the Scots by like Art had taken) or as Hector will haue it, for the Earle of Salisbury.

(35) By the mediation of the French, the Scots had a short truce granted them. But about the end of May, the King lent his cousin the Lord Henry, sonneto Henry Earle of Lancaster, with a great Arme to the aid and seruice of the Lord Edward Balliol King of Scotland, which waisted all the Countries about Perth, where, while they lay, the King with a very small Company came sodainly vnto them, and from thence pierced farther one way then euer his Grandfather Edward had done, suffering first by death (the common furies of warre) to worke vpon all that might suffer destruction to establish a Conquest. Hee marcht vp as farre as Elgie and Bugaban, and in his returne to Narre, burnt the Towne of Aberdeen, in reuenge for Sir Thomas Rastoun, a Knight, whom the Towne-men thereof had slaine. The Lord Robert Stewart had great landes in those parts, for Murray and Bugaban were his, which also might might the rather move this severe proceeding: which done, King Edward having repaired sundry Castles there, and leaving Scotland to the new King thereof with forces competent, came back into England. But at this and other times, the Bailie, in requital of this aide and friendship, granted to King Edward and his Successors sundry Castles, as Edinburgh, Hedderburg, Peebles, and two thousand pounds yearly rent for the Fee-farm of Blackburgh, Edinburgh, and other places; last of all, his whole interest in amplest manner, referring only to himself, a certain yearly pension from the King of England.

(16) Who to enlarge the magnificence of his royal estate and amplitude, as meditating farre greater matters than those vnpromisable warres (the bodies and treasure which were employed and spent therein, being able to compensate farre more noble achievements) created Prince Edward his eldest son Earle of Chester, and Duke of Cornwall, and at the same solemnity fix other Earles, & twenty knights, one of which Knights was Thomas de la Mure, whose name hath beene often cited as an Author.

(17) There was in speciall credite with King Edward, one Sir Robert de Artois, who being banished by the French King out of those parts, and made (by King Edward) Earle of Richmond, laboured earnestly (vpon hatred to the French King for his private discontentments) to draw him to claime the Crown of France as his most lawfull right, and as that which would indeed enrich his people with spoiles, and rebelle his owne greatness by the Conquest: The motion though by reason of the highnesse and difficultie of the enterprise, it did not at first prevaille; yet at last by the enill fate of France wrought out to himselfe a wonderfull allowance. Many consultations pulling of the matter, it could not be so concealed, but that the smoake thereof discovered the breeding fire. This in the present was very happy for the state of Scotland, which (saith Heitor) was in appearance so enriched, that if the King of England had continued his warres it should have come without any hope of reliefe to utter ruine. It was also a cause, why the French (who hitherto had supported the Scots, but not as if so neerely concerned themselves) put in the more fully and roundly, seeking by all means to weaken and annoy the English, alwell in Scotland, as in Gascogne, and where else fouler.

(18) That we may with the lesse confusion, and fewer interruptions, deliuer our selues of the French warre which now approached, we will here in one view tender vnto you the Scottish affaires, from this time for ten or eight yeeres, till about the siege of Calis by King Edward, who was laste alighted in England from the former expedition, but the Bruce party (vnder their chiefe leader Andrew Murray) issued from the Loughes, Mountaines, and other their places of retreat and fastnesse, to reuendace their cause. King Edward once or twice sent Armies, vnder valiant Generalls to support the Baileis possession against their violence, whose successe was variable till the death of Murray. After whom the L. Stewart tooke charge for the Bruce side, and (vpon the advantage of King Edwards slacknesse, to finish his Scottish affaires, the matter of France so far preponderating it) endeauoured to prepare a quiet entrance for King David. The aide of the Lord William Douglas to that purpose was very available, howbeit not alwayes fortunate, being ouerthrowne in a set battell by Sir Thomas Berkeley at Blackbourne, hauing there with him King Edwards power. To the vpper part, and as it were deciding stroke of these late miseries, there arrived great store of munition out of France, at such time as the Lord Robert Stewart hauing lien ten weeks at the siege of Perth, was almost ready to haue abandoned the same in despair. Perth being rendered, the Bailie (whose the quarrell was) betooke himselfe into England, hauing small strength of his owne in the hearts and affections of the Scots, who reuolued dayly from him. Vpon sure intelligence of all these matters, King David, his Queene, and many honourable French, and Scots, returne, and till the quarrell of Philip de Valois put him into vnfortunate Armes against the English, the afflicted Realme of Scotland enioyed a kind of rest and quiet.

(19) It was not now the iustice of his Tide to the Crowne of France, which only made King Edward vnderneath his conquering sword against the French; for Philip de Valois king of France iniuriously withheld sundry Townes and places in Gascogne. To remedy which violent wrongs the king of England had addrest Ambassadors, though without any good successe.

(40) But, that the world might take true notice of his iust proceedings, the main causes for iustificatio of his design vpon France (whereby the common cause against the Turke was neglected) himselfe in a copious Epistle, directed to the Colledge of Cardinals, doth publicly declare to be these;

1 His Tide to the Crowne of France, which Philip de Valois unjustly detained, for that himselfe of any Male lining, was the neerest in blood to the late king Charles his uncle.

2 That his Agents and Ambassadors desiring to put the cause to ciuill triall, were not onely not admitted to bee heard, but were driven away with feare of their liues.

3 That the Court of the Tutius Petri, in giving the Crowne from him, (who was then under age,) did therein leaue the office of Iudges, and were no better then robbers. And therefore their proceesse made to his prouidence during his minority, was by all lawes void and frustrate.

4 That Philip de Valois invaded the Duchie of Aquitaine, which belonged to the Crowne of England, and added such places and lands as hee had so wrongfully gotten to those which hee had so wrongfully withheld, detaining all alike.

5 That hee had aided and assisted the Scots in their risings against him, when as by reason of neare kindred he should rather haue holpen him; and finally declared by his doings, that his honour, power and life it selfe, were hated of him.

(41) King Edward neuertheless (knowing that words were little worth in such a case) to strengthen his quarrell with friends, by the aduise of his counsell, and of his Father in law, the Lord William Earle of Hereford sought to confederate and write vnto him the Nigh and Low Dutch, Princes and people, which lay most commodiously for his vses. But the better to hold them together, hee was aduised to seeke the amity of the Emperour Lewis of Bawars, with whom hee made (as by the euent was manifest) but an vnpromisable confederation, though for the present it seemed to serue his vses with the countenance: more to his aduantage were the singular endeouours of some other his priuate instruments, as chiefly of Jacques de Arteau, a wealthy Burger of Gans, one of a rare dexterity of witte, and so popularly acceptable among the Flemings, that he seemed to sway Flanders more by far then the Earle thereof, whom they had expelled. By the speciall diligence of this Jacques van Arteau, and of one Siger de Courtray a Noblemans of Flanders, there was prepared among the Artizans of those parts (whose chiefe enrichments depended vpon the handling of English wool, as Cloth-workers, Weavers, and the like) a mighty party for the English against the French. This amity with England (as most profitable for the common benefite, and weale of his Country) the said Jacques most constantly supported to the death.

(42) Meane while King Edward (the life of this high affaire) proceeded in all things with ripe deliberation and iudgement. Therefore to let the Flemings know the want of his friendship, hee had for some yeeres before inhibited the transportation of his Wools; which, and for that the English were in a manner become all one with them, by king Edward's marriage with the Lady Philip, not a little advanced the practise of James on his behalf; which was sped at last, by occasion of * an overthrow given to the French-Flemings, who under the conduct of Guy the Ballard of Flanders, brother to the Earle (both of them being wholly French) were placed in the life of Calais to emperch the arrival of the English, who tooke the said Guy, and slew the most part of his people. This victory was achieved in the quarrell of the king of England by the Earle of Derby, the Lord Beauchamp, the Lord Reynald Cobham, the Lord Walter de Mauny (an Henne-way) and other of the English Captaines: Of the fame and lucky fortune whereof the said Dr. Aris- totel, and other of the kings friends, made so wise and sensible use, by letting them see the English were able to protect them, that the Flemings (with- out any great stay) became his firme confederates, in presence of the Earle of Gelder at Gennet, notwith- standing that at the same time the great K. of France, and their own naturall Lord, the Earle, laboured all they could to the contrary.

(43) But as king Edward was (in the mean space) wholly intent, vpon furnishing himselfe with all convenient things fite for his warre, (having Cap- taines and Souldiers, such as his owne soole heart could wish,) so when hee found that the industri- ous Dutch by their manual labours, grew to so great strength and opulence, that their friendshipp bred riualltie in puissant Monarches, hee, like a fa- ther, regarding the publike weale of his Country, ordered that all Clothworkers, who would repaire hi- ther out of forraigne parts, and exercise their trades, should haue free accesse and sundry priuiledges. By which inuitation as very many were drawne, so was it the principall cause of aduancing that honest, best and most beneficial Trade in the Kingdome, to the great enrichment, strength, and honor thereof. The English Nation was very desirous to set forward this warre, and therefore contributed plentifully, and the King made bold with Lombards, and the moue- able goods of such Priories in England, as were Cels to Monasteries in France, thereby to make his coffers fuller.

(44) The warre which all this while seemed but to be talked of, did now beginne to blaze (and in- deed a blazing sturre of 30. dayes continuance, was supposed by some to forerhew it) whole first torch was lighted by the * French at Southampton, which they almost wholly consumed to ashes, but they with losse of their Capitaine, (a younger sonne to the Sicilian King) and about three hundred others, * were driuen away the next morrow. The French had sundry shippes of warre or Gallies, which vnder colour of passing to the Holy-Land, the king of France had (with purpose to affaile our Coasts) assembled, as the * king of England charged him: which losse, yet was not long vanquished, either Nation grieuing o- ther with mutual mischiefs.

(45) To appease and extinguish this deadly quar- rel, there came from Pope Benedict the 22. two Cardinals hither; but one of them in a speech to the Clergie, seeming to fauour the French faction, John Archbishopp of Canterbury immediately stood vp, and protested, that the Cardinals Arguments were vaine and frivolous: whereupon they soone after departed, and it was euerie where published through England, that the King had right to the Crown of France, which also he meant by honorable force to prosecute. Norwithstanding, King Edward for avoiding Christi- an blood-shed, gaue instructions to the Cardinals, that vpon certain equal conditions, hee was wil- ling to make an euertlasting peace with the French, & would haue bene verie glad (the hazards of warre considered) to haue taken any honest or propor- tionable offers, on impediments whereof was this, that the French would include the Scots within the Treatie, whom King Edward would not admit that into, as purposing (when hee had singled them from supplies) to make a full and absolute annexation of their obediences to the English scepter: for the la- bout and hopes of the Cardinals proved vaine.

(46) Philip de Valois in possession King of France, had sundry great and high motives to embolden his standing-off. First, the regard of honour, and pro- fite, and the abundant meanes which hee had, hauing the whole puissance of France (the fairest kingdome vnder heauen) at his commandment. Then a con- fidence which hee reasonably conceiued (so to direct, or distrust the English forces, by the assured aid of the Scots, as that it should finally ruine the whole en- terprize, if not also the principall Actor Edward himselfe. Again, considering the valnes of the enterprize, hee judged King Edwards wealth not to bee proportionable, but did well hope, that a shorr dalliance would consume his treasures. Moreover, hee judged perhaps, that the very thought of selfe of conquering France, was no better in Edward then a young mans dreame, considering the Realm of Eng- land was farre inferior in bignesse, and multitudes of Subjects, and that there was a Sea between, the crossing whereof must double the charge. Lastly, for the friends which King Edward had procured in Dutchland with wonderful largesse, hee knew, would not be held together but with infinite cost and ex- pence, and that by some good meanes or other, hee should make them in whole, or in part vnpro- fitable.

(47) For iustificacion of his cause hee had no slender colours, or reasons. As the before alledged law or custome of France, which they called the Escheq, by the which the French exclude * Gynocritacie, or FFemmes Government in chiefe. Then an Act of the whole French State, by which his right was acknow- ledged and established. Thirdly, King Edwards birth place, by which hee seemed to them a stranger, and for that cause was farre the lesse capable, or rather was directly incapable of popular goodwill among the French. Lastly, for that King Edward in the * beginning of his raigne (though when hee was as yet vnder age,) did in his owne person, both doe his homage to this very Philip de Valois, as to the king of France, for his Duchie of Aquitaine, and also * by his Letters-Patents vnder seale did tell us as much. This homage (the more to be remembered becaus * some attribute much of K. Edwards discontent to the hauty manner of Philip in taking the same) was performed at Amiens in Picardie. It troubled King Edward greatly, to see himselfe making submissiua to the viceroy of that Souerainetie, which hee thought beluged to himselfe, but to let the French see what kind of Prince hee was, hee came in so royall manner appointed, as if hee meant to haue stricken them with feare or admiration: Earles, Ba- rons, and 1000. horse hee had in his retinue. At the day, his robe was of crimson veluet, powdered with golden Leopards, his crowne on his head, a sword by his side, and golden spurs on his heeles. To receiue this Duke for the Duchie of Guyen and Earldome of Ponthieu, Philip de Valois sat crowned in violet veluet, semined with golden lillies, with all the other Ensignes of royall maiesty, but the ho- mage was done only by word (if * one say true) and not in that full manner which Storres mentioneth. Probable it is, that the houghty carriage of Philip did greatly incense the Spirit of King Edward, being one of the most gallant in the world.

(48) There is among Writers much time, and labour spent in description of King Edwards iourney, stay and contracts of amity made in Dutchland; but in regard that no greater matter was effected there- by, then the purchase of an opinion of magnifi- cence & noblenesse among the Queenes Country- men and Dutch-landers, few lines shall serue to com- prehend the narration. the young Prince Edward, many Earles and great Captaynes, with a gallant Company of men of war, failed to Antwerp, whom Lewis the Emperour met at the City of Colein, where amity was confirmed, and King Edward was constituted his Lieutenant, with full authority to gouerne in his name on this side Colein. By reason of which Vicegerencie King Edward made out his commandements, and did many things to his advantage and profit. Howsoever it neither lasted long for Lewis within a while dishonourably reuoked it, and did vndoubtedly scarce quit the cost for the brainery of that meeting was so exceeding great, as Edward easily won the general opinion of a very noble & puissant king. Polydor writes, that Edward refused not the office, yet would not exercise the same, because he would not displease Pope Benedict, whose enemy the Barbarians was.

(42) This Emperour (whom belike the Pope hated, for being as proud as himselfe) took it ill, (as it port went) that the King of England humbled not himselfe (at their meeting) to the kisse of his foot. But it was answered; that the King of England was a King anointed, and had life and member in his power, and therefore ought not to inhume himselfe, so much as an other King that was not anointed. After his returne to Antwerp with his new power, hee seriously prosecuted his affaire of confederation with the Lords and people of Dutchland, among whom (with great loose and fauour) he and his royall family abode above an whole yeere. The principall Nobles which entered into this league against the French were these. The Archbishops of Colein Prince Electors; The Duke of Brabant, The Duke of Guelderland, (who had married the Lady Isabel King Edwards eldest sister, and about this season was of an Earle created a Duke); The Marquis of Salick, &c. And finally, the Hanse townes.

(43) The Flemings, being the most necessary part of this association, in regard of their neerenes to the French, would not engage themselves in an offensive warre against the Crowne of France, unless King Edward would first assume the Title and Armories of that Realme, as the only lawfull King thereof. This Proposition was thoroughly debated, and the law of Armes allowing it, hee with the common assent of the Flemings and others, took the Seale and quartered the Flower de Lize with the Leopard, or Lions of England, as here we see annexed, albeit wee see his former Seale also adorned with two Lize or Lillies; whether in token of his mothers French descent, or as a covert note of his own right to the French crown it is vncertaine.

(44) Polydor Virgil must have a warlike and fashionable Reader, or hee will bee thought to bee of opinion that William the Conqueror bare his Leopards quartered, then which nothing is more vntrue, nor more unlikely. Others againe may suppose, that we haue not here described them according to their right bearing, as certainly according to their present bearing we haue not; but the truth is, the golden Lillies of France, which now are borne in triangle, were in those dayes borne, and aduanced Semi.

(45) And whereas the Armories of France are placed here in the dexter and more honorable quarter, yet there are probabilities, that it was not so at this their first conjunction For in the Seale of Queen Isabel (this King Edwards mother) the Armories of England, as being the Armories of the husbands line (and therefore to haue precedence) were marshalled where now the Flower de Luce line. But whether to gratifie the French, or because that was the more ancient and greater Monarchie, they were in this Kings reigne disposed as here we see.

acknowledge him their Lord and rightfull Soueraigne. These proclamations or admonishments thus diuulged, he burnt and spoiled the North parts of France vp as farre as Tourne, though the time of the yeere were very vnseasonable, and contenting himselfe therewith for a beginning, gave place to the sharpensse of Winter, returning to the Queen his wife at Antwerp where hee kept a roiall Christmas. In which City this yeere was London (afterward Duke of Clarence) borne.

(47) His affaires growing ripe in those parts, he leaues his Queene and Children in Brabant, as an assured pledge of his returne, and about Candlemas shippes himselfe for England, where in a Parliament at Westminster, he obtained liberrall aids for impetration of his intended Conquest. In lieu of which louing assistances, hee granted a general large pardon both for trespasses, and of all Aides for making his sonne Knight, and for marriage of his daughter during all his time; forgiving also all arrears of Farmers and Accountants till the tenth yeere of his Reigne, and all old debts due to any of his Predecessors. Finally, hee confirmed that famous Magna Charta, and of the Forest with some other.

(48) There was no talke now hut of conquering France; Mullers taken throughout the Kingdom, Armourers and trades of warre (to be cherished even in the securest peace) were full of employment, and the desire of battell waxt feruent every where. Meane Meane while to hold the world in suspence of the successe. God distributed the fortune of attempts diuerly. Bordeaux (the capital City of Aquitaine, and then Englishe) gave an excellent testimony of her loyalty, not lesse of martiall witte and valour. For the French Armie coming before her, she to abuse their hope, set open her gates, and displayed vpon her Towers the golden Lillies, as if shee were theirs; but the French which secretly entered, found little good hospitality. Sir Oliver de laucham was Captain and Lord Warden there for King Edward, who with his Garrison-Souldiers, and aide of the inhabitants, slew of them great multitudes, and preferred Bordeaux. But in the opposite parts, William Montacute Earle of Salisbury, and Robert Vfford Earle of Suffolk, after many honourable deedes performed for aduancement of King Edward's affaire, were by the French taken Prisoners, while presuming too much vpon their courages and fortune, they ran too far into their danger, at the Towne of Lille in Flanders.

(16) But King Edward being ready now to repulse the Seas, had certaine intelligence that the French lay in wait about Sluice in Flanders, to intercept him with a mighty Naue of 400. shippes, who therefore prepared accordingly, intending to open his way by force. He set saile from Hornwich vpon Saint John Baptists Eue., toward the Coast where his enemies attended, strengthening himselfe with the Northern Naue of England, which the L. Robert Marley brought vnto him, so as hee had in all about two or three hundred saile. His battels hauing the advantages of windey and sunne, hee set on the French with incredible furie and force, in the very mouth of the Haue of Sluice vpon Midsummer day, where beganne a most bloody and terrible fight, the end whereof set the Garland vpon King Edward's head. Himselfe was wounded in that fight and lost foure valiant Knights (Montbrun, Laitner, Beller, Peyngers) with sundrie other of his English faime therein. But the slaughters of the French party were lamentable, for thirty thousand are confesse to haue perished, not halfe of their shippes escaped vtaken or vnscue. A greater glory then this, the English are scarce found to haue achieved at any battell sea.

(17) The Cronic of France seemed already to bee placed vpon King Edward's Temple, so much was attributed to this great victory, but such a Conquest was not the worke of one day. Which King Edward well vnderstanding, refreshed his victorious Armie, and augmenting it with his Confederates forces (which repaired to him on all sides) marched forth, hauing one of the most puissant hosts that euer any King of England led, as wherein were nere an hundred thousand Souldiers English, and Dutch. Hee had also in his Company the Dukes of Brabant and Guelder, and many other potent members of the Empire, and (as some write) the imperiall Eagles displayed in the head of his Armie, as hee that was Viceperent of the sacred Roman Empire. In this wise hee approached the Northern parts of France, where expoling all to spoile & fire, hee fite downe with his whole Forces about Tourney, meaning to take in the fimey as well to bee a state of Warre, as place of sure retreat and refuge.

(18) Philip, though iustly grieved with his wofull losse sustained at Sea, yet to encounter, and crush so great an euill in the first approaches thereof, had provided such an Armie, as hee deemed the Maiestie and greatesse of that renowned Kingdom. With this speake of an hundred thousand fighting men assembled vnder his command, and that besides Princes, Dukes, Earles, and other illustrious Persons, there was the valiant old King of Bohemia, and Lewis King of Nauarre. King Edward hearing the same, drew forth his people into the open field with purpose to giue battell.

(19) It may seeme a thing greatly tending to King Edward's glory, to remember the offer which he lent to King Philip before hee laid his siege to Tourney. In which, without filuting him by any other title then of Philip of Faleys, hee challengeth him, for avoiding the effusion of Christian blood, to fight with him hand to hand in single battell; or (if that misliked) then each to bring an hundred to the field, and trie the event with so small an hazard; or otherwise, within ten dayes to ioyne full battell with all their forces nere to Tourney. Whereunto Philip made no direct answer, neither with his honour could, alledging that the letters were not sent to him, the King of France, but barely to Philip of Faleis. Near the selfe, hee gaue him to vnderstand, that his meaning was to beat him out of France, hauing hope in Christ (from whom hee deriued his power) to doe so.

(20) The honour of the warre in those ages cannot bee enough commended, in which the noble old formes of hostility were put in practise, by defiances, Heraldes, and publick assignations of day and place of fight, and not by stalking surprises and vnder-hand dealthes, more nerey resembling high-way robberies, then lawfull battell.

(22) It is not meet that the name of that person who did performe to himselfe an office, should be concealed. It was a woman of honour (but at that time professed a Nunne in the Abbey of Faversham) the Lady Lane of Faleys, sister to this Philip, widow of William late Earle of Hereford, and mother to King Edward's wife; her charitable endeavors were strongly holpen by two Cardinals, who solicited peace together with her. Great interest of mediation she had in either respect, here a brother, there a sonne in law, and shee failed not to pite them both. The Truce was concluded; the rather for that King Philip was aduised from all parts, not to let his whole fortunes vpon the Die and chance of a Battell. And Edward (on the other side) meaning nothing lesse, then not to haue profected the war vpon the encouragement of his late Sea-victorie, was so destitute of money through the fault of his Officers in England, as hee was the sooner drawne, if not enforced to embrace so honest a colour of returning from the siege of Tourney; which neuerthelesse did but deferre the miseries of France, not determine them: & whereas that glory, which the vpper hand in this Iourney would haue brought, could not haue bene pure and meere vnto him, because the Dutch (whose aide hee vied) would haue claimed no small share therein, the English Cheualrie only had the name and burthen of such great Acts as after followed.

(23) The chiefe Articles of the truce were; That it should endure till Midsummer day; then next ensuing, and that the Prisoners should bee set at liberty without any ranome on both sides, vpon condition to render themselves againe, or pay their severall ranomes, if peace were not in the meane time concluded. By vertue of this treaty and truce, the Earles of Salisbury and Suffolke were deliuered. Here it troubled our W. Vfford, that King Edward should bee left so destitute, and need by the avarice or fraud of his officers at home, as for that respect to giue over so faire an opportunity, by which hee might as it were by a continued line, and hyndisling and pressing vpon the shippes of his late success.

celle haue happily proceeded, when as yet his friends were vncorrupted, and in presence; and therefore becomes the vnworthinesse thereof towards lo worthy a Prince, adding; "T hat if in very deed they had scanned and exactly weighed with themselves the Acts of all the English Kings past from the very first Monarch, they would not haue found that euer this Island brought forth a Prince of such excellency, as so" corrupted yeeres.

(64) King Edward greatly disconcerted with such of his officers, through whose default he was thus in a manner constrained to let slip the present prosecution of his designe, returned with his Queen into England, to take reuenge of their misdemeanors, where hee committed some to prison, put others from their places, and so belittled himselfe, that by occasion thereof much displeasure grew betweene the King and John Archbishoppe of Canterbury, who complained of manifest violence done against the Liberties of the Church and English Nation, comprehended in Magna Charta. And whereas the King did openly charge the Archbishoppe to haue bene a principall perliuader of his entering into league with the Almains against the French, willing him to take no care for treason, because himselfe would for him abundantly furnish from England, out of the lease of granted subsidies, and profits of the Crown: and thus through defect of the Archbishoppes performance, hee was not onely constrained to gaze ouer his hood for the present, but also to embogge himselfe in the Bankers and Viuers bookes, the Archbishoppe thereunto made answer: "That hee desired in open Parliament it might appeare, through whose default the City of Tournay was not taken, and directly laid the whole blame from himselfe and from his, upon such as were daily Courtiers, (whom Walsingham calls Antichreyst, Englishmen for the King) who serving their owne turnes with the generall abuse, would expose him and his vnwisely to the enuy of their fact." Yea, some there are, who, more then so, will haue the Archbishopp seeme to practise against the Kings further good fortunes in France; which, if it be true, it is no hard matter to find out the principall motive thereunto.

(65) For certainly the Pope (Bonifize 12.) was nothing pleased with the successes of Edward, at least wile with the war it selfe, as pretending it was pernicious to Christendome; the blame whereof the French charged vpon the English, as vnlawfully claiming, as the English did vpon the French for vnlawfully detaining. This Pope therefore interposed himselfe, and puts "Flanders vnder interditt," as hauing disloyally let it their own Earle, and their chiefe Lord Philip, King of France, committre to their Oath and Allegiance; but they for their defence and iustificati- on answered, that Edward was the onely lawfull King of France, and Philip (to whom they had sworn) a meeke usurper, and therefore notwithstanding that Interditt, or the Papall decision of the controversie, they persisted still in their adherence.

(66) But the more to draine and weaken the mighty frame of the English suppositions, Lewis of Bearer the Emperours Jodainely (by such practices as were vied on behalfe of the French) recalled his Vicar-shippe or delegation, which hee had made to Edward, to exercise imperiall power in lower Germany, offering his best helpe notwithstanding, (as hauing power from Philip to that purpose,) to procure him honorable conditions as a Mediator betweene them. The pretence of his falling from King Edward, and concluding amitie with his enemy, was for that King Edward without his priuie, had consented to a Truce at the City of Tournay with Philip.

(67) To these reuocatorie lines King Edward made this wile and noble answer: That the Emperours zeale to make attoneement hee could not but greatly commend, wishing, that at the instance of so potent a Mediator, an honorable Peace (if that were possible) might bee made; but his Title being cleare enough, hee meant not to make doubt-full by putting it to any arbitration. That it could not but bee admired, why he should now enter amitie with Philip de Falsy, the wrong-doer, lieth, hauing scene his apparent right, hee had entered with him into league against the said Philip: That it was also agreed, that he might conclude any temporary Truce (though not a final accord) without his consent, it need should be, as in this case at 7 yeeres it was. That this reuocation seemed to bee made somewhat abortiuely, for so much as the Imperialis had promised the Vicar-shippe should stand good till hee had conquered France, or the greater portion thereof. Dated thus Londini, Anno regni nostri France, 2. Regni vero nostri Anglie, 25. But Lewis of Bearer to Edward thus inconsistent, and faith-breaking, continued toward Philip steadfast, without either amending Philips fortunes thereby, or himselfe increasing in Iustice or honesty, that it might easily bee scene hee was endued with qualities, which ill became the Imperiall height.

(68) You haue heard a part of great King Edwards victorious fortunes in battell, both by land and sea; bee not ignorant of his Pietie (the soueraigne ornament and safety of Soueraigne Princes,) whereof in one act of his wee will tender vnto you in the stile of that age an Essay and rable. Hee hauing a purpose to pursue his enterprise for France, after sundry Christian and holy considerations of Gods iudgements, and of his owne estate and rightfull cause, hee comes his speech to his Bishoppes in these words. Cum istius agnitionis sitis, &c. Seeing therefore you are ordained of God on the behalfe of men, that you should offer gifts and sacrifices for sinne, liken wee heereby you to the premisses, and not to our onely, but to the publike dangers, powring forth prayers to the most high for our happy successe, supplying the place of Moses, so that wee and ours may preuaile against aduersaries, in the lifting of your hands to heauen; and that God would bee the rather pleased to enlarge his fauour towards vs, (the number of Intercessors being multiplied,) cause preachings and processions and other officers of appealing his displeasure, to be mercifully exercised through our Cities and Diocesses, that the God of mercies would extend vnto vs, and our Armes the hand of his Benediction, and so direct our Acts in his good pleasure, that they may redound to his glory and our profite, and to the commoditie and quiet of all our faithful Subjects. This Edward, was indeed to beginne at the right end, for euen the Heathen taught, "to bequeene with Gods, and thy following successes declared that thy prayers were acceptable.

(69) And now once againe the French and English powers were at point to trie their fortunes by battell, vpon siding with others Claimers, as erit they had done for their owne. The quarrell was founded vpon a title to the Duchie of little Britaine. Arthur Duke thereof had two wines; by Beatrix his first wife, hee had two sonnes, John (afterward Duke) & Guy; and by Isabel his second wife, hee had John of Monfort, Duke John liuing without issue, assured to Iane (daughter of his brother Guy who died before him) the Ducall Crowne of little Britaine: vpon which entaile, Charles of Blois (Nephew to Philip King of France) marrieth the Lady Iane, who in the life time of Duke John, was (by agreement) put into full possession; but Duke John being once dead, John of Monfort traileth warre as the pursuing heire male. Philip King of France tooke part with Charles of Blois, and Edward king of England with the Lord John of Monfort.

(70) Great and bloudie mischiefs sprang out of these truly supported fictions, which had now drawne King Edward thither in person; and little Britaine (which may well in a fort bee called Wales in France, the Britons chiefly the Britons Britumet, or ruder Britons, declaring at this present by their language, and sundry locall Names, as Lamen, Triguier, &c.

King Edward's success in Lewis Emperours.

&c. That their kinsmen are in Wales and Cornwall) was become the field of Mars and martiall furies. But the powers of those two mighty Kings being vpon point, before the City of Nantes in high Britaine, to cut out their diuers haies in fortunes Patri-mony, with the edge of the sword, loe againe God inclined their hearts (as if he would faile haue done nothing but then his vengeance in the scabbard) by the careful diligence of two Cardinals, to accept of a truce, which was concluded January the 9. at the Priory of Maistre, vpon laudry points, whereof these (as to the purpose of our Story) are the principal.

(71) That the two Kings of England and France should find certaine of their blood royall to the Court of Rome (by a day certaine) there to argue their leuall titles, and rights to the French Monarchy, not as before a Judge, but as a friend * indifferent to both, and that the King of Scots, and the Earle of Hennault, should likewise send to giue their assent for so much as concerned them.

(72) That eithers friends, adherents, and sequels, should be comprehended in the truce, and that the truce should extend it selfe to the titlers in Britaine and their sides; and that the Cardinals should doe their best to obtaine absolution from the sentence of Interdict executed vpon the Countrey of Flanders.

(73) That the truce should continue for three yeeres; that prisoners or mouables taken on either side should be mutually discharged; that traffique and passages should be open; and that all other things should stand as they did at the time of the truce made: which being fauily engrossed in an Instrument, two great Peeres of each part, took oathes vpon perill of the soules of their Kings, to obserue the contents sincerely.

(74) The possession of the City of Fumes in base Brittain, the Englishmen still kept, that if settled peace followed not vpon this truce, they might haue some hold and certaine footing-place, from whence to make head againe, and march into the heart of France. In this warre Robert de Artois Earle of Richmond, a principall instigator of King Edward, died of a wound, and John of Monford did not long after lose this truce after whose death most part of Brittain came into the hands of * Charles of Navarre.

(75) King Edward returning home after the Truce, neglected not his domestick affaires, but enacted the Statute of Praemun, vpon this occasion. Pope Benedict being dead, Clement the 6. succeeded, a man of singular learning, but * extremely profuse in giuing, who, by way of Praemun, had bestowed sundry choice Benefices in England vpon Forreiners. For preuention whereof (as of a thing which the King and Peeres would not endure,) it was made high Treason by law, for any to bring such Papall pro-uisions into the Kingdome. And for insatisfaction of his so doing, he directed that letter vnto the Pope which was so * excellently pend, as did not onely moue admiration, but astonishment; and indeed this printed age affords few so graue and solide. In which Parliament also the Lord Edward, the Kings eldest sonne, was created Prince of Wales. He was so renowned a Gentleman, (why doe we say he was, as if he could at any time cease to be, whom fame hath made immortal!) that the high praise before giuen by Walsingham to his father, as * exceeding all the Princes which went before him, may be paralleled in the Scenes surpassing in martiall deeds, all the Princes that haues lined after him.

his courage know him worthe of such a sonne,) brake irrefraile forth into these words. Though Lewis take the French kings part, I will fight with them both. And whether he were insatied with the fame of King Arbore Table, and the Knights aduenterous thereof, or for that he knew honourable Company and exercise in Armes, to be the naturall parents of excellent souldiers, it is agreed, that he erected a building at his Castle of Windsore, which should be called the Round Table, whose circumference was fixe hundred foot, where Knights and men of warre should haue their entertainment of diet, at his charge by one hundred pounds by the weeke, though afterward through occasion of his warres be abated that sum to twenty pounds weekly. In emulation whereof, Philip de Palays (knowing that all this tended but to preparations against him,) erected the like in his Court, to inuite the Knights and men at Armes of Almaine and of Italie from repairing to King Edward. One thing Philip did firewily and polinckly, in giuing lease to his subjects to fell downe his woods freely for building of ships, whereby his Naue was greatly augmented, and the rather wrought much mischiefe afterward. About this time one of the chiefe flares in the firmamente of the English Chivalry fell into the Graue, William Montacute King of Morace and marshall of England of * whose noble acts to write worthe were a commendable matter.

(77) But the French King, perceiving that a terrible tempest was likely to fall vpon him from forth of England, waxed cruel in his isle selfe, and * put sundry principall men of Normandy, Picardy, and Gascon to death, for no other crime, but that they were English in affection; among whom are reckoned Sir Oliver de Clisson, * Robert de Fosse, and Geoffrey of Malesherbe, Knights of the best note; Sir Geoffrey of Harcourt brother to the Earle of Hereford being also summoned to Paris, appeared in England, whither he fled, and became a speciall firebrand in the approaching combustion.

(78) It was not Pope *Clement*s mediation, or diligence in discussing the Titles and Pretences of these two puissant Monarques, which could prevent the fatal punishment of France, yet according to the Articles of the treatise at Melfres, either Prince sent his particular Orators, where the difficulties tole so thicke and intricate, as Clement * despairing to cleare them, put over their farther view till another time. But King Edward affirming the truce to be manifestly broken, * by the beheading & persecuting of his friends in Normandy & elsewhere, signified so much to the Pope, that Barre and not Patience should determine his right, and title. His provisions of men, of ships, of weapon, of victuals, of treasure, of all things, needfull to be braue and daring an enterprize, were worthy of the greatnesse, courage, strength, riches, and mainly of a King of England. Into Gascogne he sends that valiant great Lord Henry of Lan-caster, Earle of Derby, with a gallant company of leaders and troups of souldiers, where he achieved many great things, for the defence and enlargement of that Dutchie, taking Cities, Castles and Townes of which John the French Kings eldest sonne recouered diuers not long after; and discomfired the enemy in battell. The Scots attempting against the West Marches of England, by the vigilancy and pro-uisse of such as were in trust for those parts, as the Bishop of Carlisle, the Lords Perce, Warwicke, and Ladw, very valiant gentlemen, were forced to a retire into Scotland. It was the practise of either Prince to di-vert, and distract eithers puissance, w^{ch} Philip in Gascogne, and hee ours, by his perpetual, and constant confederates, the Scots. Our Edward notwithstanding could doe it the lesse, for that his constant friend Jacques van Artevelde (who was become as it were the popular Tribune of Flanders) was * slaine in a mutiny by such as were of the French faction.

The most noble

Garter instituted

fixed to life, gave life notwithstanding about this time to an institution, which as for the present it served (he having so great view thereof for his French enterprises) as a vehement incentive to martial valor, and a golden band of virtue, so the same is continued with likelihood of perpetuity, and multiplication of splendor in these our daies. It was the foundation of the English order, worthily called the most noble order of the Garter. The causes why our Edward erected it, are not evident, though there could none be greater or better, then those before recited; Honor expressed by external and illustrious ensignes, devided by a victorious Author, and appropriated to a fellow shipp of most exemplar and eminent persons, being in nature like a flame, so kindle in the apt and worthy all heroicke affections. The vulgar opinion is, that whatsoever the remoter causes were which moved to this foundation, the neerer cause, or the occasion was, a Garter of his owne Queene (ot as Flume say) of the Lady Joan, Countesse of Salisburie (wonder of that age for shape and beaurie) which slipping off in a dance, king Edward flooped and tooke vp. Such of the Nobles as were present, smiling, and playing in sport with the action of the Kings, as amorous, hee frostily said, it should not be long before there should Sovereigne honour be done to that fiken tie. Whereupon hee afterward added the French Motto, or Symbolicall word HONI SOIT QUI MAL Y PENSE, as well in complement of the whole invention, as in reproof or checke of his Courtiers sinister suspicion. Polydore Virgil troubleth himselfe to make an Apologie for the countenell of this Originall, if (without murie) an office of honorable looe is so renowned a Monarch, may vndergoe the uoce of countenell; but the same Polydore among his other defenses thereof truly saith, Nobilitas sub amari ciet.

There was not some who countenell that hee instituted it the Order of the Garter, for that in a bottell wherein he was victorious, hee had given the word Garter, for the word or signe. But if credite may be attributed to the originall¹ Booke of the Institution, the invention is deduced from times more ancient, and that when Richard the first King of England, set forward against the Turks and Sarazens to Cyprus and Acon, and wasd wearie of longer delay, while the siege of Acon was with wonderfull care prosecuted, courage at the length (by the coming of S. George among them as it was thought) quikning in him, it came into his mind to tie about the legs of certaine his choise Knights, a Garter or small thong of leather, the onely fluffe fute for such a purpose, which hee had then at hand, to the intent that they (as it were by joint content) being mindfull of future glory, if they were victorious, might bee stirred vp, to demean themselves nobly after the example of the Romans, with whom that varietie of Crownes or Garlands given for sundry causes as honorable Enignes to the Soldier was in vye to the intent, that by such increments, they might shake off sloath, and the spirit of courage might rife, and break forth the more frequently.

(80) And into this opinion of stirring vp vertue thereby, the² Author of the Britannia seemeth to passe, where hee saith, that King Edward the third founded this Order, to³ adorn Martiall vertue with honor, rewards and splendor.

(81) There was in the Castle of Windsor (the ordained seat of the Order now first to be consummated) before King Edward did accomplish his intention, in honour of God, our Lady, and S. George, a⁴ Chappell erected by King Henry the first, and other Progenitors of Edward, with an allowance for eight Canons, to whose Colledge this Prince added a Deane, fiftene Canons more, and twenty and foure poore impotent Knights, with other officers and seruants, as appeareth by his Charter. These were to pray for the good estate of the Sovereigne and Brethren of the most noble Order. The Sovereigne and Knights themselves had their particular lawes and constitutions, which they were by solemn oath bound to observe, of which one⁵ was, That they should defend and assist one the other: which afterward made Alphonse Duke of Calabria receive the habite of that Order with so exceeding reverence at Naples, as eromiously thinking himself secured thereby from the French, who claimed that Kingdom. But that custome of mutual assistance (saith Polydore) was then worn out of vfe, and discontinued euery where; for those Italian Patricians who (within the memory of Polydore) being driven forth of their Country, and imploring aid of those orders, whereof themselves were companions, found no supporture, either from the French or Burgundians, who had formerly elected them. Besides laws and Officers, King Edward also deuised particular Ceremonies & distinctive habites and enlighenments, whereof the principall was the azure Garter, wherein the French Motto of the Order was wrought in letters of gold, and the Garter it selfe fastned a little vnder the left knee with a buckle of gold, in⁶ token of Concord. There are speciall Manuscript Bookes of the Constitutions and other things peculiar to this Order, to which (this place being not aptly capable of their recapitulation) we must referre the curious. Saint George the esteemed patronne of Christian fortitude, is intituled to the Patronage of this Order, & the beaurous Chappell in Windsor Castle (where his⁷ day is yeerely celebrated) consecrated by King Edward to his memory. The fortune of this institution hath bene such, that the most mighty Princes of the Christian world haue thought themselves most highly honoured, in being chosen thereunto, so that there haue bene about two and twenty forraine Emperors and Kings (besides many others of most noble quality) since the first institution thereof, elected and admitted Companions of the Garter. The Kings of England are in their severall times Soueraignes of the Order, and the whole number of Knights is circumscribed in twenty and six, whereof the Soueraigne is one. The names of the first twenty and six (who are also byed Founders of the Order) you shall finde intabed in our Mappe of Burke.

(82) Our *Edward*⁸ having thus honored S. George memory, assigned to his Image mounted in Armour vpon Horsebacke a silver Shield with a cross Gules (⁹ the deare remembrance of his dying Lord) and¹⁰ appointed his Souldiers to wear white coats or lackets, with a red Crosse before and behind ouer their Armor, that it was not onely a comely, but a stately sight to behold the English battels, like the rising Sunne to glitter faire off in that pure beu; when the Souldies of other Nations in their bawle weedes could not bee discerned. The glory therefore of this Order seemed such to one, no¹¹ vnlearned Poet, that in an Apollrophe to Windsor, speaking of the Garter, hee breaks forth into these scarce Hyperbolicall verses.

Cappadocia quamquam sit clera Georgi

Far spread thy fame, wherewith S. Georges knights Hath made thee glorious; where rich-ruled Peeres, Whose many leg; the golden garter dignes,

Their Croffed weeds, Rhodes, Elbas, Alcals, hold As worthless; all march with thy George, are bafe.

(83) Let vs not dwell too long in the lesser things: It was the moneth of Julie, and King Edward was now vpon the Sea with about a thousand Saile,

He went not to war by rote, but by book; wisdom was Hirbenger and marshall of his valor; who shall say he knew not how to conquer? It was not long but he came to anchor in the Haven of Hey Saint Vast, in Constantine, a great cape of land or penile in Normandy. His land forces did muster twenty and five hundred horse; and thirty thousand foot, most of which were Archers. The lights, and glories of his Armie, were the Prince of Wales (then about sixteen years old, who was then by his father knighted) many brave Earles, Lords, Knights, and expert Cheifs; the English going cheerfullie, as having gotten such a King as answered their warlike dispositions. The Earle of Huntington had charge of his Navy: himselfe takes severe revenge for the blood of his friends vpon the Norman Townes and people, proceitling he sacrificed them * to Clifton, Bore, Perce, and therest. Their heads were set vpon the chiefe Gate of Carintine, for which cause hee flew all that could be found therein, and turning the whole town into Cinders gaue it to their funeral. He tooke the populous and rich City of Caen, & with his dreadfull hoit burning and spoiling round about, marched vp almost as farre as the very walles of Paris, brauing King Philip to neere.

(74) Who had not slept all this while, but was purcuied one of the fullest armies which ever were scene in France. King Edward people rich with spoile seemed not vnwilling to return. They were now in the enemies Countrey between the two good rivers of Seine and Sonne, for they had passed the Seine at Pessie, whose Bridge (as all other between Norm and Paris) had beene broken downe by the French, and now (notwithstanding any opposition) in a short space repaired. It was thought fit to seek a passage out of these straights, which could not be by Bridges, for they were broken by the French. This search for passage, was by the enemy interpreted a kind of flight, and Edward could not but be willing to nourish their temerity, to draw them on securely to destruction by such a seeming frace.

(81) The river of Sonne, betweene Abbeville and the Sea, at a low water hath a passable and granellie foord, knowne by the name of Blanch Taque; this was discovered to him by one Gabeau prisoner. But the French King (being acquainted in his owne Countrey to empench this passage, had before sent thither a Norman Baron of speciall note, one Gedmar du Fay, and a 1000. thousand horse with at least 6000. foot; but Edward, (whom as obstacles made impetuous, so nothing could dismay,) enters himselfe into the foord, * crying, He that loves me let him follow me, as one that resolved either to passe, or die. Who can tell the efficacy of such a Generals spirit, but they, who have had the happinesse to follow vnder the conduct? The passage was, and Du Fay declared in a manner, before he was almost fought with, (the incomparable courage of his enemies appalling him,) he brought to King Philip fewer by a pair of thousands, then he carried forth, besides terror, and an euill signe of that which followed. The English, who knew not what it meant to run away, but were before resolved to line & die with such a Sovereigne, had reason now much more to resolve the same.

(86) King Edward was nere to Crispe in the Countrey Panthies, lying between the rivers of Sonne and Authy (which unquestionably belonged vnto him in right of his mother,) there most vigilantly provides he for his defence. King Philip, set on fire with this disaster, precipitates to battell for accomplishment of Gods anger against France; being rather drawne, by the vnely vanity of his huge multitudes, (for by what other words doe * an hundred or six-score thousand men deserve to be called?) who neuer left ouer-taking one the other, till the view of the English banners and battels put them to stand. We protest that the nature of our vndertakings will not brooke descriptions at large; you shall haueit as we may, that is, as remembering, that innumerable great achievements left behind, somewhat impatiently attending their relation.

(87) Therefore, the holy name of God first ritely invocated, King Edward, without shewing the least signe of perturbation, but full of an Heroick affurednesse, had ordered his people to three battels, with their wings and succours. The Forward disposed into the forme of an Hearle, where the Archers stood in front, and the men of armes in the bottome, was vnder the young Lord of Wales, Prince Edward, and with him many of the prime and greatest Captaines: Beauchamp Earle of Warwick, Godfrey of Harcourt, The Lords, Stafford, Leuare, Bourchier, Clifford, Cobham, Holland, &c. In the second battell were, The Earles of Northampton, and Arundell; The Lords, Kellie, Willoughby, Bassett, Saint Albane, Manton, &c. The third and last battell was commanded in cheife by King Edward himselfe, with the residue of his Nobles and people. In euery one of these battels, beside the wings, were a vast proportion of men at armes and Archers, but nothing so thinn and few as some of our * writers alledge, who mention not above 9000. all together, who were at least thrice as many in their whole numbers, and not without need.

(88) King Edward closed his battels at their back, (as if he meant to barricado them from flying,) by selling and plashing of Trees, placing his carriages there and other impediments whatsoever, having commanded * all men to put from them their horses, which were left among the carriages. Thus all waies of safety by flight being prevented, the necessity did vndoubtedly double their courages. Thus placeto the best advantage, King Edward visiteth the ranches in person, riding vpon a pleasant * Hobby, (hauing onely a white rod in his hand, as if he would challenge fortune,) betweene the two marshalls of his field; whose very presence, with a few reasonable and vnforced words on behalfe of God and his right, in need of long Orations, did inspire the faintest hearts among them with fresh vigour and alacritie.

(89) Our writers describe not vnto vs the quality or face of the ground of Crispy where this battell was determined (though verie much doth depend vpon choise of place,) neither the exact figures, or severall numbers of euery severall battell, their distances, wings or other warlike formes, nor finally what Pallisade, trench, or other device was in this or that quarter vsed, to keepe-off and breake the furious charge of men of Armes, before they came at the Archers, principall workemen at this bloody iourney. But thus lamely are things commended to Posterity, where the Actors themselves take no care to see the particulars orderly and according to the truth delineated; but either are vnlearned, or give themselves to the bodily fruition of their passed trauels, rather then to exercise their minds in profiting themselves and others by such relations as are made with life and art. Thus we find, that the place of the Englishmens battels was the Towne of Crispe, and Forest, and therefore apt with small labour to be made inaccessible, or at least difficult for horse to enter vpon; that also the English battels were marshalled to the most advantage for giuing succour one vnto the other; and that there were * Shields or Pavises to shelter our Archers from the Genowais shot.

(90) By this time King Philip (whose countenance is * said to haue changed threat,) was in sight of the English. Hee had with him the two Kings of Boheme and Moravia, and almost innumerable other great Princes, Dukes, Earles, Barons and Gentlemen of inferior rank bearing armes; nor those onely of France, but very many of them Almaine and Dutch, lest you should suppose, he had drawne away Leopold the Emperor from the friendship of K. Edward, to little purpose. The night before the battell, there alighted in the French host, with intention to lop off one branch of Laurell from the tree of victorie (though it fell out to be Cyprus and Texu) Arrie Earle of Savoy, with a thousand men of Armes so that all things seemed to concur to no small fury for a lodaine raine. We need not describe the order of the French, where disorder was a principall Actor: The King of Bohem, and Charles Earle of Alencon, King Philip's brother German, had charge of the point or vanguard, King Philip himselfe was in the maine battell, and the Earle of Savoy had chiefe command in the Rere.

(92) That is almost ridiculous, which one writes of the etymologie of the Coules (as he calls it) advanced at this battell, as a signe of taking none to merce, no more (as he faith) then Oile doth vie to extinguish fire, when indeed it was a hallow'd Banner of red silke, whereof the French had a wonderfull high conceit, as of that which was sent from heauen, and called Oryflant or Auriflamme. King Edward on the contrary side, is reported for signe of like rigour, to have erected there his vnconquered Standard of the Dragon Gules. Lewis of Luxemburg, the most valiant old King of Bohemia, being either blind or verie badly sighted, hearing in that goodly order the English like Iobert Spanier soldiers jettred the charge, said plainlie (contrary to their over-weening iudgements who had giuen out of their flight,) Here will the English end their daies or conquer. And even as the first wounds were ready in a manner to bee giuen and taken, behold, God, to let them know he was awake, and that there was one aboue to whom so many thousands should within a few minutes appeare, to giue an account of their whole line till that present; hee caused the blacke cloudes to poure down vpon them store of flaming teares, enarching the ayre with a spacious * Raine-bow, and discharging sundry tire and peales of thunder: the Sunne also, at the same time drawing nere to set, would gladly haue hid his face, by shrouding it vnder a partill * Eclipsis: but God (who meant good to the English) would not suffer him to withdraw his more necessary office, so that freed from that temporary shadow, he shone directly into the Frenchmans eyes. At the same time also * sholes and cloudes of ballesall Rarens, and other birdes of prey and tawin, as fore-shewing the haruch of carcasses at hand, came flying over the French host.

(93) The signe of battell being giuen by King Philip, and entertained with shouts and clamors, all things shewing the horror of war, Drums & Trumpets sounding to a charge, Banners flying in the winds, and every where shining weapons, menacing braue extremities, reason herselfe acknowledged it only safe to leaue them to their brnte faculties, passion and furie, and the euentic selfe to God. The French calamities began at their Generayes, who vnder * Carolo Grimaldi, and Antonio Doria their Coronets, being all of them Crosse-bowmen, were to open a way for the French horse with their shot. This was the looser of their seruice: Their Crosse-bow strings wet with the late raine, their bodies wearie with a long march, their ranks (after the English had intercepted vpon * targets their first voloe) filled with innumerable gappes, or outshorne with home-drawne arrows, were lastly most outspaciously fencerred by Charles Earle of Armaun, at whose commandement (derived from K. * Philip himselfe) his horse gaue in among the, to drive them by plaine murder from the honour of gaining the point, vpon onely pretence that they hindered their race. This hate young Count (contrary to good discipline) had also otherwise vniuilly discontented and disgraced them, even when they were ready to iole in battell, whose bodies (being as most write about twelve thousand) by bearing the first brunt might haue been of great vie, if in nothing else, but in giuing as buttes and quivers, to take into them the chiefe first shornes of the English arrows. Whereas now they themselves were not onely thus most miserably troden vnder foot, and put to the sword, but many of the French Gallants by that occasion mingled among them, were overthrown by the English arrows, who equally pleased the destruction both of French and Genowayes, shooting thickest where the tumult and confusion were greatest. Some * ralsals also following the English Armes, as they saw opportunity, stept in among them, and helpe to cut throates, sparing neither Lord nor lordell.

(94) The French men of Armes halfe out of breath with headlong halts, and terribly disordered with the perpetuall shornes of flying arrows, were now at hand-brookes with the Princes battell; neither was it long, but that the shining Battell axes, (swords, lances, and other weapons of our nation had lost their splendor, being covered with humane gore, which hausting thirstily dranke out of enemies wounds, they fell in bloody teares. The fight was sharpe and fierce: but to what purpose serues writing, if the high resolution of the king of Bohemia should be vnremembered! he (as onely seeking an honourable grane for his old age) put himselfe into the first rank of his owne horiemen, and with full randome charging the English, was slaine with sword in hand, the troupe of his faithfull followers with their slaughterd bodies covering him euen in death. There lay this Trophoe of the English Cheualrie, by whose fall (rudely leene in the ruine of the Bohemian Standard,) his noble sonne, the Lord Charles of Bohemia (lately elected Emperor, whilst Lewis was as yet alive) was wisely warned to provide for himselfe, the matter appearing desperate. For now was Philip himselfe in perill, with the full power of his Armes, come to the rescue of his brother and friends, who were hard at worke (while they had breath) about their dreamed victorie, but finding the mettill infinitely more tough which they had to deale vpon, then they could possibly haue supposed, were beaten to the earth in great numbers. The young Prince neuertheless was not without danger, though now the second battell of the English, for perseruacion of their Prince, dashing in among the enemies, fought most courageously.

(95) Therefore King Edward himselfe was sent vnto, whose battell honored like a tempest in a cloud, over which, vpon the hillocke of a Windmill, with his helmet on, (which neuer came off till all was done) he iudiciously watcht, beholding the whole field, and ready to enter into the conflict when ills necessity should inuite. You that heare a most noble answer: The messenger dispatched from the Earle of Northampton and others, vpon a tender respect to their young Princes safety, hauing declared to the King, that the Lords required his presence, for that his sonne was in danger, he bad him return and say: Let them find no more to mee for any adventure that may befall, while my sonne is alive; but let him either vanquish or die, because the honour of this house shal bee his, if God suffer him to survive.

(96) The Messenger returned, and though hee brought not men to their succours, hee brought such accession of courage and spirit, as hee that should say that King Edward failed them at their need, should neither vnderstand what belongs to magnanimity, nor the effect of such a checke from so excellent a General: who neuertheless, was maturely watchfull ower the good of his childe and people: on the other side King Philip (whose quartell it was) did not forsake the duty of a noble chiefe; but so long contended in his owne person, till his horse was slaine vnder him with arrows, himselfe twice dismounted, and wounded both in the necke and thigh: but then the Lord John of Hendlis, Earle of Beaumont, (who had long since quit King Edwards service) lets him againe on horsebacke; and the French (out of a loyall desire to his preservation) cried to retire him out of the fight, who rather seemed willing to end his dayes in so noble companie: which voice was as it were the vp-shot and last Gaspe of that most cruell conflict, where none as yet were taken to mercy vpon any termes.

After their king had preferred himself, the whole power of the Fremel-gate away, and sought to rise itself by flight, whom the Egypt, wares fighting upon the defender, and loath to hazard such a victory, by breaking their ranks to pursue the enemy too far in the night time, (which now was come upon them), suffered them to be holden in chase by their own wilt fear, contented to make good their ground, by landing still upon their guard according to true discipline. For they lay not as yet the bottom of their danger, and knew that there were so many escaped, as might well serve to overcome their Army with their multitudes.

197) King Edward seeing the coast for the present cleare of all his enemies, aduanceth with his vicoucher barrell towards his victorious sonne, & most affectionately embracing and kissing him, Said Faire Sonne, God send you good performance to y^e professed braguardes; you haue nobly acquit your selfe, and are well worthy to haue the Governance of a Kingdome entrusted vnto you for your valour. To which the most chearfull of young Princes replied in silence, most humbly filling on his knees, before his triumphant father.

(58) Here there may be some controversy, whether the exemplary manhood of the English, or their singular piety, were more to be commended: but who will not infinitely prefer the latter, chiefly in Souldiers, among whom it is usually most wanting? Great was the victory, great was their prowess, & great the glory; but like true Christian knights and Souldiers, forbore all boast, referring the whole thanks and honour of their preferation to God the true Author thereof. The night was so very dark, as if it had mourned for the day times blood-shed, therefore they made 4 fires of fens, lighted torches, and candles, carefully tending their wounded companions, and modestly rejoicing in their own safe deliverance.

(99) But the next morning presented new work, for in a half hour began to spread the earth, that they could scarce be hard at hand, yet were new swarms of French abroad, who came from sundry Castles and good towns, as Ram, Beaumont, &c. to have loyned with King Philip in the deluged spoils of the English; these being mettre with by King Edward's people, were in sundry places overthrowne and slain, and multitudes of such as had lost their way in the last flight, were kenerly put to the sword, as the English chanced upon them, * where they lay lurking in hedges, bushes, and by-ways: The Earle of Northampton, * suifelle and Norfolke, had the execution of the French which fled from this last overthrow, for the space of about nine miles English from the ground where they encountered.

(100) There was leasure now to take an account of the flames, which vpon the enemies side amounted, not only in the number to very many, but in their quality to very great. For search hereof, King Edward caused certain principall commanders, and three Heraldes, (who by the Coat-Armours might iudge of the persons, it being then a thing perpetuall and solemne not to fight without those signes of Noblesse,) to take an exact view of the field, who about supper time returning, made report to the King, that they found the dead bodies of eleven great Princes, and of Barons, Knights, and men of Armes, above one thousand, and five hundred. Among the owners of liue bodies as were beate on the Earth vpon the first day, they are worthily reckoned chiefe: The King of Bohemia, the King of Maires, * Charles Earle of Alençon, brother-German to King Philip, the Duke of Lorraine, * the Duke of Barben, the * Earle of Flanders, the * Earle of Sauoy (both great Princes), * the Duchess of Flemm, Jonne to Himbert, the Earle of Sancerre, and Marceant (whose brother Gadfrey in pety of his house, his two Nephewes bring slaine with their father, forsooke the King of England after his battell, and returned into Nearce with the French), the * Earles of Amuel, Nearce, &c. like Earles of Almaine; beside othem of great account of all fortis. Upon the second day, the Grand Prince of France, who with his Archbithoppe of Roon, had on the behelfe of their Prince and Country put on Armes. Of the Commons Ju. v. both of these blacke dayes, there fell about thirty thousand, and some say, four times more in this last, then in the other.

(101) We finde not one man of honour, or note flaine vpon the English side, fo that this vitorie may safely be accounted among the wonderfull.
 The spoiles of the Enemies bodies and carriages, King Edward gave wholly to his well deservling soldiers. The rule of their fifty (they being in a smolt populus a enemy Countrey) would not permit them to vñ much carrie to others, at that which might have proued cruelty to themselves, but vpon the second day they tooke many prisoners, though none of great name, for they were spent in the day before. It pleased the conquerour to proclaim a truce now for three dayes in the Countrey about that the people might come in to burie their dead but the bodies of the most noble, hee himselfe car-ri'd to be conuied to Montreal, and there (in his March towards Calais) entered.

(102) Thus by Gods fauour, and the vnriftable force of the English Archers, (who in a manner did e- only fight) was King Edward put into a full and peaceable poffeffion of a perfect victory, which after hee had one night only enjoyed in the Forrell of Crefie, hee diflodged with his conquering hoaft, & marched ftraight toward Calais, which hee presently inached, hauing decreed neuer to fift hee had Arriue from before it, till without affault hee had carried the fame. For which caufe hee entrencht & fortified his Camp on all fides, built vp .v. Sheds couered with Reed and broome, and other places and officers to dwell in, and ftopping all relief by Sea, (wherefoe hee was Mafter) with his Naue, There commanded in Calais for the French, Sir Iohn de Pienne, v. Marfhal of France, and the Lord Dandeghes, with a very strong Garrifon, who concluded like good men of war, to trie all extremities, rather then to furrender the Piece, which was fo strong, that to affaile the fame, otherwife then with famine had bene fruitfull. Thefe great Captaines feeing King Edwards refolution, thruft forth of the Towne (for fparing of food) their poorer people, aboue fifteene handreth; whom hee, like a true Chriftian Prince, turned not backe vpon the Towne, but releafed for Gods caufe with freft victuals, and two pence fterling each; permitting them freely and fecurely to paffe through his Camp, to his great glory, and (vndoubtedly) profit ablo, hauing their hearty prayers for his happy fucceffe, and God for pay-maister, and rewarder of fuch his Beneficence.

(to 1.) Many wayes were thought vpon by king Philip to raise this obdurate people: two principall; an Army of French to fight with king Edward; and a diuersion by inuasion, wherein the Swiss (their perperuall allies) were forward. Both in their fennall times, were put into execution: That of the Swiss inuasion was first, but with such success, as well declared it was Gods will (all people heauing their encralings, zeniths, and declinacions) that the English name should now be brought to the vernall point thereof, without any thing being able to resist it.

the his most deare beind the French, coming with a very great armie of three score and two thousand into England, as farre as Durham, supposing none but Priests and Shepherds were left at home, considering what great numbers were abroad upon Lettice, in Picardie, Britaine, and Gascogne, was (upon * Saint Lukes Eve) vnderaken and fought withall, his whole armie by faire force vanquished, and himselfe taken prisoner at a place by Durham called Neville Cross. Chiefties among the English at this triumphant journey were * The Archbishop of York, Gilbert Paufraue Earle of Angus, William Lord Leuch, with eight other Lords, Prey, Meurway, Neville, Deincourt, Manley, Leysburne, Serpent, and Mufgrave. Sir Robert de Barmen Sheriffe of Northumberland, and other noble Barons. To this battell also were * many Priests and Clergy men of England, to whom necessity for defence of their Country, made the bloody vie of Iron and Steele warrentable: not could the Scots be aequaled to have lost any thing for want of manhood, specially the king himselfe, who had two speares hanging in his body, his leg almost incurably wounded with an arrow, his sword and weapons beaten out of his hands; who disdaining captivety, incited the English by opprobrious words to kill him, and when John Copland (an Esquire of the North-country, * Captaine of the Castle of Bamborough in Scotland), aduised him to yield, he stroke him on the face with his Gantlet so hercefully, as that two of his great teeth were mislaid out there with: but seeing he could not force a death but must be Prisoner, John Copland conueighed him away with eight of his owne seruants out of this field. There lay dead vpon the ground the * Earles of Murray and Strathern, the Constable, Marshall, Chamberlaine, and Chancellour of Scotland, with many other Nobles. There were taken Prisoners (beside the king) the Earles of Dorset, Wilt, Southerland, Winton, and Mentich. Thus the fortune of King Edward, by the vertue of his valiant subiects, prevailed in euery place.

(105) It could not be excused, if we forgot the Offices of Queene Philip in her Husbands abience; who * being then in England, and great with Child of a daughter (afterward called Margaret) rode in Person about the battels of the English, encouraging them with soft, princely and gracious words, as did not a little sharpen and allure their otherwife feruent courages: which done, shee retired her selfe to Newcastle vpon Tyne, there to attend the successe which God would send. After the battell, vnderstanding that King David was taken, free by letters willed the Esquire to tender vp his roiall Prisoner; which he refusing, shee (impatient) sends ouer a complaint to King Edward. At * whole commandement, repairing to the Campe before Calais, he so discreetly answered, that he was sent backe into England with the reward of * 500. pounds lind by the yeere, to lie * where Copland himselfe should chuse, neere to his owne dwelling, and warrant to deliuer vp his Prisoner to the Queene, which he accordingly did at the City of York, with to sober and honest an Apology, as both there, and the Lords of Council were satisfied. This Copland (who had linds of King *Edward*es gift at * Vincelston in Worcestershire) was also aduanced, for this most valiant achievement, to the dignity of a Knight Banier, which writers corruptly call a Barnet, honor hauing at that time no such kind of creature. King David was lodged vnder fure guard in the Tower of London.

(106) Wonder it is to consider, with what golden links one good hap was annexed to another, in this full moon of it was wert of King *Edward*es reigne. For within a small compasse of time, all these great achievements fell. Sir Thomas Dagworth like another * Macabbee (saith an Author) with 8. hundred men of Armes, and one hundred Archers, in Britaine ouerthrew the Lord Charles of Blois, who hauing twice in one date with incredible od in the numbers, (as of about thirty for one,) assailed that brace Knight, was beaten out of the field with marvellous losse of Nobles and others slaine or taken. Not long after that the same Sir Thomas also hauing only three hundred men of Armes, and foure hundred Archers in his company, assailed the same Lord Charles, lying at siege of Ber-Durham with twelve hundred Knights and Esquires, five hundred other armed men, two thousand Steel-bow-men & of other Infantry great store; and tooke Prisoner the said Lord Charles of Blois (who as you have heard elated the Dutchy of Britaine against Manfred) drawing his whole forces with admirable manhood and great destruction out of the field. This in Britaine.

(107) In Gascogne the magnificent and noble Henry Earle of Derby, and now (by his fathers late death) Earle of Langcaster also, pursuing his hie fortunes in Aquitaine, & Gascony. One, drew John Duke of Normandy, eldest sonne of King Philip, vniought with, from the siege of Aquilon; though it is faide, he left it, as * commanded to repaire to his father for the reliefe of Calis; he also tooke sundry places of speciall importance, some by render, some by assault, many profitable prisoners, and rich spoiles, and with triumph returned safe to Euclidean. Not long before this, at the taking of the good Towne of Brigerac by assault, he had permitted eary souldier to lesse any house, and conuent all therein to his proper benefit. Hereupon it hapned, that a certaine knight of Souldier called * Arth, had broken into a Fortement, where the monies had for safety flowed the moire of that Country in great long ficks, who (thinking it was not the Generalls intention that such a treasure should come to a priuate Share) acquainted the Lord Henry therewith: what was his answer? he with a kingly magnificence told him * That the House, and all therein were his, according as he had at first proclaimed, let them be with (saith he) what they would. The petty retumes and while he is bulie in counting his new riches, behold, he finds so much more pure liuer in Coine, that hee could not but once againe acquaint his Generall therewith. What can be added to the honour of the answer which to this effect he now the second time made? Why tel left thou me of the greatest of the treasure? go, take it and enioy it: For it is gine, and then to take it backe againe, is childes play: I haue once said it, and my word is passed, may not with my honour be reuokt, were it were so much.

(108) John Duke of Normandy, coming into Picardy, had two repulses and foiles, being driven from the Towne of * Cassis, and Lille, so that King *Edward*es fortune was available, aswell to his Confederates as to his owne People: and now, to confumate his glory, the whole power of France, led forth by King Philip to preferre that tie of his Empire, Calais, returned without doing any thing. For when mediators could effect nothing, and Philip would not set vp his trust vpon battell, lest while he sought to save a Towne, hee should lesse a kingdom, hee mournfully retired himselfe with lossefull halt into the bolome of France, leaving his desperate Captaine and people in Calais to the Conquerors mercy. So Edward had the Towne deliuered into him, when he had almost shidden in leaguer before it one whole yeere. The piety of Queene Philip toward the prisoners selected to die, and the worthy deuotement of some Calistion Townsmen, to that certaine perill, for satisfaction of King *Edward*es incensed minde, declaring themselves thereby to be good, true and loyall French-men, are by all Authors celebrated, finding both pity and honour for euer. King Edward hauing as wisely taken order for safekeeping of this precious price, as he had costlily endured to carry it, drawing oer a substantiall Colony of Englishmen into it, let saile at last for England, whether with much trouble at Sea (tempesta suddenly rising) he at last arrived safe: It is obserued, that hee had alwaies faire weather at his passage into France, Grace, and foals upon his return.

(109) Neuer was the English Name to great, and glorious in his time, nor did England herself in any foregoing age enjoy a King more renowned for wisdom, chivalrie, and felicity in actions; the iust brightnesse of his irradiate vertues, not only adorning lix with Garlands, conquered Spoiles, and Trophies, but ferming aloft (such was the abundance of all things) to infuse fertility into the earth it selfe, like some * new shining fume. Meane while, faire France (whose world turne it was) late mournfull lix weeping, and with great anxietie of mind pouldred the bell lix could against such a deluge of calamities. Neither yet was King Edwards glorie at the height, for God was inclin'd to make him yet more bounden and beholden. Howbeit as it is a mighty worke to ascend to such an eminence of renown, yet when the mozt of man is knowne and done, let us use therefore loue themselves, or admire others, for neither hath this world any thing permanent to trull vpon, and to God alone belongs the honour. This was trauell and felt when the celestiall musicke fild the abuse of good gifts. It rained from Muldoon till Christmas, and so terrible a plague rained through the world, that the earth was filled with grapes, and the air with cries: which was seconded with murreto of Cattle, and dearth of all things. The plague began among the Turkes, and pierced by degrees into France, where it mowed downe many thousands. In London it had so quick and sharpe an edge, that in one yeres space, there were buried 14* one Church-yard (commonly called the Clitition, or Charter-houſe) above fifty thousand. The French notwithstanding praife to reconſider Calix by bribery, but treaſon being not true to it ſelfe, King Edward came ſuddenly in-perſon, and preferred the inſolent lawleſly by police, and princely manhood, killing many of them who came upon that blind adventure.

(110) This invincible King (one great Art over-taking another) hearing that certaine Spaniards men of warre, who had in the yeere before cruelly & faine furdrie Engliſhmen, and taken away their Wives and other warres, were come into his Sea hee like a Martiall Nepheue encountered them not far from Wincheſter in perſonne, with ſuch ſhips as could then bee had; and after a moſt bloody fight, (for there was few or none elapſed vnmakt) tooke tweney and fixe of their principall veſſels, ſunke others, and drew the reſt away. The gallant & ſpirit of the Spaniards was ſuch, that dreading to outlive the diſgrace of having preferred their lives by yielding, they & all of them to a man either died vpon the Engliſh weapons, or were drowned in the waves. This was King Edward dignified with another Naual Crowne. In this & yeare Philip de Valois having raiſed about three & twenty yeeres, died. And the yeere enſuing, King Edward, ſo formerly hee had changed the ſtampe of his Seale, ſo changed the ſtampe of his Coines, coining (by aduife of William de Eſtingdon, Biſhoppe of Wincheſter, and High Treaſurer of England) the groat, and halfe groat, whereas before there was & no ſilver coine, but the ſteelins onely.

(111) Let us draw King Edward's manifold actions closer together: vnder his fortune and auspice, Sir Walter de Boleyn had in little Brittain, where he was (as Warden) a faire day of the Marshall of France, putting his poissiance to flight with much slaughter. Thirtene Lords, one hundred and forty Knights, one hundred Elquiers, and thre common Soldiours were killed: nine Lords, and one hundred, and forty Knights and Elquiers taken prisoners; which bred great almightine among all King Edward's enemies. Neither had the French in other places better fortune, insaue that somewhat before Sir Roland de Calver flew in a skirmish the thrice valiant Sir Thomas Dagworth, and about one hundred men of Armes with him. Henry Earle of Lancelotti was Derby, in honour of his princely blood, and reward of service, was created Duke of Lancaster: the new Dukes first practicable employment, was his journey together with Richard Earle of Arundel, the Bishops of London and Norwich, & Guy de Brian to the Rome Court, there to be that Instrument of a final peace, which had been drawn and sworn into between the two Kings, confirmed (as it was agreed) before the Pope; but by the Counsel of the French (as our Writers impute) and the Popes Connivance, who favoured the keeping of France entire, all proved but vapour, and the voyage fruitless. King Edward greatly kindled hereat, determined to take deeper revenge, and (as Ascham and others write) entered then secretly with an Army and wasted Fryne.

(112) The Staple of Wools which had been in Flanders, King Edward about this time ransomed, establishing the same in Wolmouthe, Canterbury, Chichester, Bristol, Lincoln, and Hail. Hee did not thus, (as is probable) without some spleene, awfull for the death of his deare friend Jaques Armentil, as for that the young Earle of Flanders had dishonoured him, by a flying into France out of Genay; when he should have married his daughter.

(113) It id moreover bene signified to King Edward, that John the new King of France (his Father being dead) had giuen to Charles the Dolphin the Dutchie of Aquitaine: whereupon being exceedingly incensed, he bestowed the time vpon his owne loue, the Prince of Wales, commanding him to defend that right with his [sword against] his adversaries. All things being ready for his voyage, and hauing the Earles of Warwicke, Suffolke, Salisburie, and Oxford; the Lords * *Chandier, Audley, * Batolf, Lich, &c.* a thousand men of Armes, as many Archers with others, he set saile towards Aquitaine, where hee betooke himselfe to do things worthie of his Name and courage.

(113) On the other side King Edward, stirred with a false Alarm, croit over the Seas, in hope to find his enemy King John at Saint Omers; but failing thereof, he burnt up to Hefline, and came back into England to recover Berwick, which the Scots had gotten with' mutual slaughter by surprise. He called a Parliament at Westminster, where toward the furniture of his hostile designs, hee had extraordinary Subsidie granted unto him for six years next to come. But Berwick before King Edward could prevent himselfe before it with his mighty hoail, was a borne and difmantled, and then by the Scots abandoned. The French had lent into Scotland fortie thousand Crowes of the Sonne, and some men of Armes to maintain them in emity against the English, while as yet their King Dauid the second was prisoner; but King Edward, not contented to have regained his owne, vniuers he made his aduersaries smart for their provocations, proceeded in hostile manner against the Scots both by land and sea. At Roxburgh the Rebel a surrendered to King Edward all the right and title which hee had to the Crowne of Scotland, or any the appurtenances, referring only to himselfe a yeerely penion of a two thousand and fifty pounds.

(114) The Prince of Wales as it were in emulation of his Fathers glorie, doth wonders in France, for with his victorious Armie, he recovered multitudes of Townes and Prisoners (while the Emile of Glesier with the English on behalfe of Charles king of Navarre, presiailes greedily in Normandy, piercing like a thunderbolt through Languedoc, till he came to the City of Narbon, in fight of the Mid-land sea, which City (being little life then Londin) he tooke by force, as (beside many others) he had done Carcass, which for bignesse, strength and beautie, excelled (saith our Author) Torin in England. The damage done to the French King in this voyage was exceeding great, for out of these Countries he drew a yeerely revenue of about foure hundred thousand land old Crowne. The Pope sending a Messenger from Avignon, with an auenture to intercede for a peace, had answer, that the message must bee sent to the King his father, for he could not meddle without commandement from him. Mean while hee disposed of things without impeachment, and returned laden with honor and spoiles to Bordeaux, where the winter being spent, he set forth to new adventures. Hee had in his Armie about eight thousand brave, expert, and well disciplined Soldiers, and with them advanceth through Perigord, & Lemoine into the bosome of France, v^p to the vertie paces of Burgessle in Berie; the terror of his name flying before to his great advantage. Thus satisfied for the present, hee wheeles about with purpose to returne by Remountaine in Blasie (which hee tooke) and so through the Country of Turain, Peillon, and Sainten to his chiefe City Bordeaux. But John King of France (halting to goe beyond his father in misfortune) having assembled a compleat host, followed, & about the City of Paichiers overtook the inuincible Prince.

(115) When the Armies (with the ods of six to one against the English) were embattell'd, two Cardinals sent from Pope Clement, laboured (as they had done before) to take vp the quarrell without stroke, whereunto the Prince was with reason yielding enough, but King John fatally presuming on his aduantage, propounded such conditions, as if in a manner the Prince of Wales had already bene at his commands; which with iust indignation were reiect'd. It came thereupon to a most bloody trial, where (if euer) the Prince and English gaue full experiment of their valour; for after long conflict and absolute discomfite of al the 3. French banners, (the least of which exceeded al the Princes ūbers) the King himselfe valiantly fighting, and Philip his yongest sonne (who with such boldnesse and zeale defended his distressed father, as if purchased vnto him the Honourable surname of Hardie) were taken prisoners.

(116) The English whose valiancy was most conspicuous, were the Earles of Warwicke, Suffolke, Salisbury, Oxford, and Stafford, the Lords Cobham, Spencer, Andley, Berkley, Basset, &c. of Gasconne, subjects to the Crowne of England, the Captaine de Beuf, the Lord Pamier, Chamout, with others of lower title, but not of vncquall valour. James Lord Andley wanne immortall renowne at this bloody battell, where hee received many wounds, and shared the Princes gift of 500. Markes land in Fee simple, to his loue Esquiers, who had continued with him in all the brunt and fury of danger. It is the misfortune or glory of the French Nobles, that in all great battells the losse falls heauily vpon them. In this most disastrous overthrow, there fell 500. and two Lords, & about seuentene hundred Knights, Esquiers, and Gentlemen bearing coats of Armes. The chiefe Lords were Peter of Bombou Duke of Athen high Constable of France, John Clermont Marshall, George of Charny Lord great Chamberlain, &c. and as many others made vp the former account. Sir Reynold Camion, who that day bare the Oriflamb, was likewise slaine: of the common Soldiers there died about six thousand: Great God of victories, how abundantly diddest thou in these dayes bleste thine English? The list of Prisoners comprehended these great names, John King of France, Philip his sonne, afterward Duke of Burgoin, The Archbishop of Sens, James of Burbon Earle of Pantbein, John of Artois Earle of En, Charles his brother Earle of Langouille, Charles Earle of Verdunnes, The Earles of Tankerville, Salbrunck, Nassau, Dampmartine, La Roch, and many other great Lords, and about two thousand Knights, Esquiers, and Gentlemen bearing Armories. The English at this iourney tooke an hundredth Enligens.

(117) Now albeit nothing wanted to the title of a perfect victory, yet in two points the incomparable Prince out-went that fame and merite; for hauing vanquished the person of the French Monarch by force of battell, hee much more overcame his heart with true and princely cunctise, deliuering his mind in a stile and kind of eloquence so ponderous, proper, graue, and natural, and with that stately humility, as onely the best soule with the best breeding could be capable of; and yet^{} hee spake not more officiously then he performed really. More then all this. The next day causing his Chaplains and the other Priests of the Armie, to celebrate diuine seruice, hee put off from himselfe the whole glory, and gaue it most devoutly to^{} God; which being first done, he, in the sight and hearing of the Prisoners, highly commends, and most heartily thanks his Souldiers, with speeches full of sincerity and life, sealing his words to euerie one, as his present meanes would permit, with liberal deeds & largesse.

(118) Then hauing settled all other things, hee marcheth with ioy and iust triumpb to^{*} Bordeaux, the Archbishoppall See, and chiefe Citie of his dominions in France. How the newes were entertained in all places of the English Empire, is not hard to coniecture, but specially by King Edward, who tooke speedy order by Simon Archbishoppe of Canterburie, that eight dayes together should be^{*} spent in giuing God the thanks and glory. But the Prince hauing sufficiently refreshed, and rested his people, set saile for England with his Prisoners, where hee happily arrived in^{*} Wimbourne, and was most ioyfully welcome euerie where. At his comming to London (where at that time a magnificent Citizen, Henry Picard, hee who afterward at one time so noble feasted the 4. Kings of England, France, Scotland and Cyprus, was Lord Maior, which received him with exquisite honour: the multitudes of people comming to see the victorious Prince, the French King, and his sonne the Lord Philip, and the rest, were such, that they could hardly get to Wymminster, betwene three of the clock in the morning and noon: but who will thinke the humour of the gazing vulgar worth the noeing?

(119) Great Edward, fauing that hee forgot not the Maiesty of a Conquerour, and of a King of England, omitted no kind of noble cunctise towards the Prisoners. King John and his sonne were lodged vnder a sure guard at the Henry, being then a goodly Pallace belonging to Henry Duke of Lancaster; the rest in other places: David King of Scot was at this time straitly kept at the Castle of^{*} Osborn, but not long after, when hee had endured about eleven yeeres imprisonment, at the incessant suit of Queen Iean his wife (sister to King Edward), was deliuered: his^{*} ranfome was one hundred thousand Markes strueling, and a condition to rale certaine Castles.

(120) About this time Isabel Queene Dowager of England, and mother of King Edward, (hauing first seene her sonne the most respected King of all Christendome,) deceased, and was interred at London, in the Church of the Friers-Minors there. To her birth France was tenderly beholding, as being about this time in most wofull and broken state, through occasson of that title which the English challenged by her, it suffering more by farre vnder their puissance, then^{*} euer it did since the times of the Romans. Charles the Dolphin, Duke of Normandie, who had escaped from the battell of Paniers, gouerned during his fathers imprisonment; but by the dangerous practises of Charles King of Nauarre, and bad disposition of the Parisians, toward the deliuey of their Soueraigne, hee was lamentably encumbered, and beset with mischiefes, not being able to worke as yet his fathers liberty. Moreover, the English vnder Sir Robert Knoules, Sir James Pye, and Thomas Faulx, and others, did commit great wailes, and heaped huge wealth by incontinous ranfomes, and other warlike licence, in Britaine, and Normandy.

The Prince doth things more commendable then his victory.

dy, vnder the title of serving the Narrower. To bee briefe all France swarmed with dissolute soldiers of sundry Nations, which hauing no Generall, made haucke at their pleasure. They were called people without an head, and by inuincible insolencies made the wretchedesse of Anarchy apparent. In England also swarmed another sort, no lesse burthenous to the commonwealth and Church, which were the four orders of Franciscan Friars, whom the

* English Clergy found to be so pernicious to the regiment of the Church, that they selected that renowned Clerk, Richard Fitz-Ralph (who was Chancellor of the Vniuersity of Oxford, Archbishop of Armagh, and Primate of Ireland) to appeare in person before the Pope, and there allege the * intolerable harmes by them accruing to the Laity, the Clergy, and the Universities, together with their disobedience to Gods word, their auidice, and pride. All which that noble Prelate learnedly performed, as appeareth by the handling of his 9. propositions against them, which are extant. In his second proposition, he sheweth, how ordinary a matter it was with them, to allure youth, without consent of their parents, to enter their Orders; which made men withdraw their sonnes from the Vniuersities, least the Fryars should so leale them away; whereby (saith he) it came to passe, that * whereas in his owne time there were thirty thousand Students in Oxford, some after there were left but five thousand. But how infinitely these Friarlike swarmes encreased in all lands, may appeare by that

* strange offer made by the General of this one Order, to Pope Paul, who promised to bring him (being then about a Turkish Expedition) thirty thousand cunning warriors, out of the number of Saint Francis Fryars, and yet enough should remaine at home to performe the deuotions. But the Pope had such use of those Fryars, that Armathanus prevailed not in the matter, * though he pressed the cause stoutly and manfully against them, because (as far pray, saith our Author,) the Clergy shoulde not cleaue as they promised, and the Fryars had great store of money to procure favour in the Court of Rome. But here in the English Court, two Cardinals, (one of them, hee of Perregysse, who had so diligently travelled for a conclusion at the battell of Poitiers) could not with two yeeres labour, draw any thing to such an head, as the French would, for their Kings deliuerance, performe; which put King Edward into a new resolution against France.

(121) King Edward (boulding himselfe deluded by the French) with a flectre of eleven hundred Saile passeth ouer from Sandwich to a new mouion. Hee arrived at Calais, from whence he set forward in three great battels, whereof the first, being least, was vnder Henry Duke of Lancaster, the second being greater, vnder the braue Prince of Wales, and the last which was greatest, was led by King Edward himselfe. They marched through * Artois to the Citie of Rheims in Champaign, where the Kings of France were to be crowned and anointed. The City of * Sens (an Archbishop See) and Nemours doe yeeld without resistance. The * Duke of Burgundy, for two * hundred thousand Florens of gold, obtained that all Burgundy was spared from sackage or spoile. It was told the King, that the Normans had landed at Wickesfe in the time of diuine seruice, and among other their most impious outrages, a like execrable villanie, as that which Gilemeith, (tounes of Belial) are recorded to haue committed vpon the * Leuites wife, was more wickedly perpetrated by them in the Church it selfe, where the woman, being of singular beautie, was by their insatiable violations murdered; and they got backe to their Ships before the Countrey could rise vpon them to take due vengeance. Hereupon * King Edward presently raised his Standard, and set forth out of Champaign, (where not farre from the City of Rheims hee had * kept his Christmas) toward Paris.

(122) He came before it with his armed diuised into * nine Battalions, where hee honoured foure hundred Eiqueres and Gentlemen with the Order of Knighthood. Charles the Dolphin, Regent of France, was within Paris with a great force, but could not by any means bee drawne to hazard battell. There were ample conditions in humble manner tendered to Edward, but he was as yet inflexible and drafe against any other, then such as him selfe (like a Conquerour) propounded. Paris (vp to whose * very walls King Edward came) not being feisible; he * retires into Britaine to refresh his Army, but vpon his returne finding it stronger then before, he resumes his wrath into the very bowels of France, exorcising hostile Actions vpon as farre as * Chartres, and * Orleans, and as yet continued inexorable. God was displeased therat, and to let Edward know so much, he caused the Minister of his wrath, a terrible tempest, to assault his Host, and * to kill therein many both men and horses. King Edward * said, vpon this occasion, to be so wounded with remoric, that repairing to our Lady-Church of Chartres, he prostrated himself to God, and forrowing for the bloodshed and wast-full burning which hee had made, vowed to giue quiet to the Christian world vpon equal conditions. Thus, and the Duke of Lancaster perswasions, softened him so that finally (by mediation of the Pope * Legat at Simon de Langres) a peace was concluded at Bretagne neere to Chartres vpon the * eight of May; and in Nouember following K. John himselfe was transported to Calais, and there by King Edward (according to the Capitulations of the Treacie) set at liberty, after hee had bene a prisoner about foure yeeres.

(123) Articles of this accord, so necessarie for the distressed Estate of France were these. 1. That to the intent these conditions, which the French confederated wate should be more forceable, and not seeme to be extorted by aduantage, out, or iniquity of the times) the two Edward, Father and Sonne, should for ouer release to K. John and to his heires, all the right and claime which they had to the Crown of France, to the Duchies and Eldates of Normandy, Amion, Torain, and Meun, as also to the homages of Britain, Armerick, and the Euendome of Flanders. 2. That King John and his issue, for them and their heires, should by a day certain restore, and release to King Edward and his heires, &c. the whole Countrey of Aquitain, enlarged with the bordering and flouant Countreys of Sainton, Poitou, Pierrefort, Limouin, Quercie, Angoulem, Rouergne, &c. with all the Cities, Castles, and appurtenances, to be holden free, without any dependence but of God. 3. That the * Countrey of Poitou (the proper inheritance of Isabel late Queene Drugges of England mother of King Edward) the Tower, Countries, and Lordships of Calais, Gisors, Montmirail, Hain, Wale, Oye, Merech, S. Valery, &c. and all the Islands which either the English then held, or which lay before any of the Premises, with only certain limitations concerning priuate mine interest, should remaine in like freedom as the rest of the premises to the Crown of England. 4. That King John should pay for his ransom (part thereof to be in hand, and part vpon daies) the summe of * thirty hundred thousand lites of Gold, euery two of which should be * five shillings and eight pence sterling. And that for assurance there should be assigned certaine number of lites (by King Edward named) to remaine in England. 5. That the French should not aid, nor assist the Scots against the English, nor they the French against the English. 6. That it should be lawful for either King Edward standing to aide the Titlers for the Duchie of Britaine to their pleasures. There were sundry other Articles, as also cases of so transcendent qualitie must needs happen, but, as these were principally, so the most of them might haue bene well left out here, vvasleife they had more exactly bene observed by the French. Yet were they ratified with hands, seales, and Outcries at Calais, where the two Kings, in stead of kissing the Pax at masse (either hauing for honors sake refused to take it first) * flured each the other with a most brotherlie embracement and louing kisse.

Queene with that which her selfe acted, by means of a lew to enchanted a rich Girdle of King Peter, which Queene Blanch had given him, that the next time hee ware it, the same * appeared to himselfe and the beholders like a snake. This cursed discipline of * Lance and Lance, hated the verruous Queene, for that shee had so prevailed with Don Pedro her husband, that so lew was suffered to beare office, or enoy any favour in Court, neither wanted she much of expelling them wholly out of Spaine. But by this practise Maria de Padilla (who * some erroneously say was a lew) got at the king to her self, and so perikuted the innocent Queene, that it was not long before shee died, the Pope intercellous failing to effect any good with the Tyrant. The Nobles of Spaine who laboured to haue brought her againe into deserved grace, are by him persued as fauours of her supposed witchcrafts. Other things also whered him to fuaage, and Turkish Butcherias, as thirst of Gold, and somewhat which had by dissemblers beene fore-told him concerning his end. His brothers, kinfolke, Nobles, and others, hee causelessly murthered or forsoth to seek the safeguard by sight, among which the Lord Henry, his foresaid ballard brother was one. Peter notwithstanding was in the truth and right of blood King of Spaine, but his faide brother (a Gentleman in whom nothing was to be taxed, but that which he was not to be blamed for, his birth) being worthily popular and potent, had now obtained both the Title of King and possession of the Crowne.

(132) Peter, before this hapned, so soon as his wife Queene Blanch was dead childlesse, married his late Concubine Maria de Padilla a woman of a noble house, though not so rarely honest, as to refuse the vniuersall of a King: who hauing issue by her Alfonso a sonne (who dyed young) and three daughters * Complance, Beatrice, and Isabel, made to her and them the best amends he could for what was passed. It is the fitter this truth should appeare, for that within a few yeeres after John Duke of Lancaster, one of the sonnes of England, married Complance the eldest sister, claiming the Crowne of Castile in her right, as * the Earle of Cambridge had another, and for that * some (either through hatred of a wicked Tyrant, or through haile or misinformation) haue in many places foullie erred, and in particular, vniuallie leauing vpon the Lady the Title of a Strumpet, who was hounded by lawfull matrimonie. Diuers notwithstanding of * the Spanish Lords, like good subiects acknowledged their duty to Peter (though a most violent Prince) nor could the vniuersal Henric, but by deeply impairing the reuenues of the Crowne of Spaine with immoderate gifts, winne amie of them. Peter thus driven from his kingdom, with his wife, children, and (if * some say true) but one seruant, repaires to the Prince of Wales (at * Bayne) char it, to hon our and humanity it selfe: who seeing it a dangerous president against all lawfull Kings, that any one should bee dethroned, and not looking into his vices but his right; signified the same to his father, who enioines him to aid Don Pedro, so that now the Prince, (burning with desire of renowne) (vpon trust of pay for his Arme and of other commodities by King Peter, when hee should be reestablished in his throne) is ready to passe into Spaine.

(133) Hee makes his way through the famous straites of Remoucaux in Nauarre by permission of the King thereof, who * yet suffered himselfe (as most men write) to be taken prisoner by the French, and carried into Castile, that he might not in person seeme to crosse the French Kings desires on the behalfe of the vniuersal Henry. The Prince of Wales had with him an armie of about thirtie thousand men, and in his company besides most of all the prime Captaines of the English, there were in person two Kings, Peter of Castile, whose the quarrell was, and the King of Mourea and John Duke of Lancaster who some while after Don Pedro his death writ himselfe King of Castile and Leon. On the other side K. Henry, for defence of his new Diadem, had assembled a very great number aswell of French (vnder Gleagius their famous Captaine) as of Castilians and other both Christians and Saracens, not fewer then fourescore, or an hundred thousand. Vpon the Borders of Castile it came to a battell: where the Prince of Wales obtained a verie great victorie, killing many thousands of his enemies. Henric himselfe * was wounded in the groine but escaped. There were taken the Earle of Deux, a Baron of Gleagius himselfe (who shortly after by paying a great ransom had liberty) the Marshall Dandreden and manie others. Neither was it lesse worth to King Peter then a kingdom: for the most noble Edward left him not, al be had set him in Burgun vpon his throne againe.

(134) But his falshood and ingratitude were monstrous: For the Prince notwithstanding his so great goodnes extended towards him, was enforced to returne to Burdun without mony wherewith to pay his arnie, which was the cause of exceeding great mischief: to himselfe, and to the English dominions beyond the Seas; as if God had bene displeased for succouring such a Tyrant. The Prince to pay his souldiers (who were not able to tarry King Peters leasure) coined euen his place, and when all would not serue, sought to lay vpon his Subiects in Castaigne and therabout, a new taxation, which beed a most dangerous reuolt. God notwithstanding found out Peter, for it was not long but his ballard brother Henry returned with new forces, and by the aid of Gleagius and the French, hee both thrust him againe from the Throne, and * murthered him also with his owne hand. The Prince of Wales himselfe was in this iorney so poisoned (as * was thought) he neuer after had his health. Dake John his brother is not freed from the suspicion of hauing hastened the Princes end, but whether it is meant of anie practise at this time or no, appeares not. Now notwithstanding he is safe as yet within Burdun.

(135) Now beganne the peace between England and France to vniuersitie and vniuersitie. For while King Edward reioyced in the excellent vertues and actions of his sonnes and people; Charles the fifth, King of France, warned by so manifold calamities, as his Dominions had sustained by the English in faire warre, & yet most earnestly coecting to recouer the honor of his Nation, betakes himselfe wholly to other arts and traines; neuer aduenturing his owne person, but executing all his desires by Deputie, wether in the seruice of Bertram de Gleagius Constable of France stood him most in need: neither neglected hee before hand to lay vp colours wherewith to over-paint his * collations and desires forasing his honour; inso much that when it came to scanning, the losse was clearly vpon King Edwards side, and the cause of the breach made at leastwise doubtfull. His practises notwithstanding were palpable, and it must bee confessed that our truly noble King (without suspition of craft) repoling himselfe vpon the rules of * magnanimitie, did not reape the stable effects of so great and important victories; nor of a peace so ceremoniously made, that (in the worlds opinion) it might neuer bee infringed without the manifest breach vpon one side of all bonds both diuine and humane. The Prince of Wales by letters aduised his father not to trust to any faire words, or courtures of farther amity made by the French, because hee said they entertained practises vnderhand, in euery place against him. But the Prince was * iudged to speake out of a restless humour delighting in warre, and therefore prevailed not. The effects disclosed that his words were true.

(136) For now King Charles furnished the wife, haing by quick paymes, and by one meane or other gotte hom al the hostages which had bin cempelged for performance of the Articles of peace before mentioned, set all his wits on worke to abuse bulie the King of England credulitie, till hee had gotten before hand as farre as diffinitions could advance: hee Courts the good old Prince with loving letters and presents, while in the mean time his plots ripen abroad, and the Countie of Flemish (the King of England undeniable inheritance) was felt surprised before King Edward heard thereof. And whereas the Prince of Wales had as a Parliament in Gyfeigne propounded a demand for forage, or of money to be leuied by the chimney, the Earles of Armoignac and Comingers, and other Lords the Princes subjects, bearing no sound affections toward the English Empire (the lesse for that by the policy of Guinea, and the Chancellor of France Dourmann, all or most of the Countiees and Townes (which by vertue of the peace made at Brerigan) were annexed thereunto, were cunningly wrought to return to their old Lords) repaire to the French Court at Paris, there to pursue an appeal for redresse of this oppression against the Prince (who was not so happy as to follow the counsell of Sir Robert Knols and other wisest Capraines who dissuaded this impoliticke, pretending that hee was to answer before King Charles as before his superiour Lord, of whom (they said) hee held by homage and fealtie. This practise of the disloyall Lords (for what could they bee elsit seeing King Edward and his heires were absolutely freed (by vertue of the said Treatie) from all manner of feirace for any of their Dominions in France) King Charles did openly at last enerteigne, and (vpon hope to recover by surprise, and plot, what the English had won by dint of sword and perfect manhood) proceeded to lummon the Prince of Wales to Paris, there to answer such accusations as his subjects made against him.

(137) To encrease the indignitie of these deuises, you should heere the French kings Orators before the Pope and Emperour, to whom King Edward had severally sent Ambassadors, full of complaints against King Charles, laying wholie vpon the French, the blame of the new warre, as vpon open breachers of faith, and violators of the league, most confidently on the contrary part charge the English.

"We had suffered the French hostilities to visit their friends at home vpon the French Kinges word, that they should come backe by a day, contrary to which word, they, not any of them, either were or are returned. That not so much as the Law of Nations was kept with vs, which ties Princes to demand restitution by their Officers of Armes, or vpon deuiell to defende them, but where (say we) are the Heralds which King Charles did send! We say, that without notice hee (surprised by stealth) the Earldome of Ponthieu, King Edward vsque- sionable right, and hath diffided vs in Aquitaine, which doth no lesse belong vnto vs then Ponthieu. That Margaret the Inheritance of Flanders, which had beene promised to the Lord Edmund, one of our Kinges sonnes, was by their inuoluntarie practise wonne away, and belloved in marriage vpon Philip Duke of Burgundie. Finally, we say, that Lewys Duke of Anou, one of the pledges, making an escape by that, contrary to honour, and the league, was by them recieued, and not returned, which points beinge all of transcendent qualitie, are (say we) directly contrarie to the Treatie and s^uior agreement at Brerigan.

The French hereunto answere, and charge vpon vs, to shew the fault of first breach, not theirs, but ours.

"That we by vertue of the said Treatie were bound immediately to withdraw our Armie out of France, which yet (they say) we did not during all the reign of Isabell their King.

"That the peace was made thereby more noyous, and hurtfull then the warre, and that they were faine to purchase the departare of our Souldiers with a greater charge then would haue maintained a very gallant Armie: That this breach was ours,

"because the Souldiers were ours. That King Edward was bound in an open assembly of the States of both Realmes, to renounce his right in the Crowne of France: when (say they) was this done?

Thus they, and Serres ads that the Estates of those Countiees which had beene assigned by the Treatie to the English asserted, that it was against the fundamentall laws of France to alien anie part, & that they neither could, nor would cease to be members of that Crowne.

(138) So ye behold that the fortune of the great is neuer so wantting to speake for them, nor occasions to slip out or in, whensoever profit and advantage doe inuaine. Memorable (if true) is that part of the Frenchmens defense, in that polite and learned Italian, P. Amylus, where it being objected with what honour and clemencie King Iohn was vsed by vs, they breake out and asseme, that wee (being their Beneficiaries or Free-holders for such Countiees as wee held in France) tooke more gold for the onely ranfome of King Iohn, then they paid to redeme J. Lewis their king, & his brother, the Peeres, and whole French Army captinated in the Christi- an warres by the barbarous Soldan. But (good Amylus) say that were so, yet cannot you say that the summe wee tooke was worth the least Countie in France, and when all France was ours, was it not great bowtie to take so small a pittance? If you reple that we had many Countiees besides, wee reioice and truly say, that wee quit more then we acquired. But let vs proceed: for now all claimes & quarrels were as open, as if no obstacle had euer beene interposed: the inuoluntarie of their late terrible foies wounded all true French hearts, and they desire (king Edward grow neagred) not to seeme by sitting still vpon so many thornes of disgrace, and losse, to haue beene our warred, though ouer-warred, and though in two or three battels inferior, yet not to haue beene cleerely debellated.

(139) What doth our King Edward now? Hee calls a Parliament, declares the breach, praises ad, obaines it, and claimes the crowne of France afresh. Iohn Duke of Lancaster and Humphrey de Bohan Earle of Hersford are sent ouer to Calais with a great force to inuade France. No great matter as then ensued.

"Thomas Beuchamp Earle of Warwick coming ouer in hope to haue worke for his Curellax, for the French affronted our armie vnder the conduct of Duke Philip le Hardy (though at this time scarce shewing himselfe worthy that surname) but rose vpon the Earles arrival, and retired, accused the Lords for sloth, and sware hee would abroad among them to find fighting, while English bread was as yet vndigested in his souldiers stomacks. Somewhat he did, but death by a pestilentiall dart prevented the rest. This Earle had with him a learned man (as Scipio had Polixenus) to register the acts which hee saw done: A worthie example all followed by posterity. The Duke of Lancaster peiced vp with his armie so farre as Ras. Thelame Polixenus wondering why they of Ponthieu haue for an hundred and twelue yeeres (that is, euer since King Edward the first had it given to him with his wife) been ours, should reuolt, only daring the greatnesse of the English, can find no other reason for their doings but this pleasant one, that as dispersed cattell gather to their owne heard, so Frenchmen flocke to the French, and English follow English.

(140) Stirring Princes cannot containe themselves within their owne quietly possessed rights: Otherwise, who sees not how much better it is for the people, that their Princes should manage well that which they haue, rather then graipe at more? For King Edward (notwithstanding his continuall manifold victories) comes back to the Subiect (who yet had gained hugely by the warres, and therefore might the better doe it) for suppuration: and they yeeld it, but his age was abridg'd, for the money was not expended as the pretences were made. tunes were served with publicke losses. Neuertheless, * after Midwinter day, that renowned Captaine Sir Robert Knols, whom martiall vertue had raised from the lowest rancke to the highest reputation (though some also affirme him a borne noble) was sent by King Edward into France with an Armie, where (while obedience lasted to his direction) all things prospered. But by the instigation of one Sir John Adamsworth the young Lords Grandisonne, Fitzwalter, and other vainele scotting to be vin-der Knols, for that they held themselves his betters, and thereupon dividing themselves after they had downeundry exploits, marching vpon euen to Paris, were beaten and foild by the French vnder Gliguys conduct, but Knols wintered safe in Britaine. Meyslerworth comes into England, and knowing accusers have the vantage, complains to King Edward of Knols: but not altogether beleueed: he ads treason to vnt ruth, and turning French becomes a wicked enemy to his King and Countrey, * promising the French to procure the Catholike Naue to invade England, for which being in the last yeere of King Edwards reigne taken, hee by due course was condemned and cut in pieces, dying the death he had deserved. He was laid hoild vpon in the City of Pamplene in Nauarre, and from thence conueighed to London, vpon whole bridge his wicked head stood sentinell.

(141) * Pope Urban the fifth, coming from Rome to Auinion with purpose to visite their two mighty Kings, their wils, and mightes against the common enemy of Christendome, put off morality at Marpsi, and so that holy intencion ceased for the present: but the same being * continued by his next successor Gregory 11. yet took no effect, no more then that which the Emperour to like cause would haue vndergone: which the French impute to King Edward, who confident by reason of his former achievements, would trie it out by the sword. Wherein he seemed to forget the mutable condition of warre, the feebleness of his bodie, and the greenesse of his Grand-Child young Richard, who was to succede, if the Prince of Wales died, as shortly after he did. Neither did God seeme to approve his opinion herein, for that crosses came fast vpon him, both at home and abroad. There is no greater wil dome nor happinesse then to know when we are well, and then to preferre without hazard or empairement, that honour wealth or quiet which we already haue.

(142) Among the States and Townes (assigned to the English by vertue of the treatie at Bretigny) which had reuolted to the French, was the Citie of Limoges in Limousin, whither the Prince marcheth, & sits down with his armie before it. Thither * came vnto him out of England his brethren the Dof La-ceister & the Earle of Cambridge, with a fresh supplie of valiant Chiefs and Souldiers. The City stood it out to the vntermitt, and was forcibly entered, where mercy had nothing to saue nor spare, the sword and fire for terror to other killing and desol-ating in a manner all. Hee * who writes that the Prince flew vpon neere to Paris and scuriously, by reason of Gliguys valour, got backe to Bordeaux, seemes to haue mistaken therein as in many other things concerning vs of great importance. After this service, the Prince, (health failing him more & more) leaues his Brethren in Aquitaine, and suiles into England.

(143) The French in the meane time wonne towne and places in Aquitaine, gathering new hopes after so long and perpetuall inselicities. The losse of that expert Captaine Sir John Chanduys (vntofortunately slain) was a great aduantage to their desires, whose whole care for warre rested vpon Gliguys (not long before aduanced for his military ver-tue from low estate to so great eminence, as to bee Constable of France, the chieff officer for warre which that Kingdome hath) and be a man of much proofe, in good and euill fortune, to tempered his courage with discretion, that hee only first had his Countrey rise againe, and endeuour in despite of euill fortune to rehaure.

(144) The Prince of Wales (wanting health) vpon coming to his fathers sight, rendered vpon the Dutchie of Aquitaine, to be disposed of, as to his roall pleasure seemed good. While King Edward was at Clarendon, there repaired to him the factious king of Nauarre, whole errand was to make an outcurre of association against the French, but as his offers were acceptable, so his cautions not seeming sufficient, hee returned (after great entertainment) without concluding.

(145) John Duke of Lancaster, and his brother the Earle of Cambridge, doe now returne out of Aquitaine, with the Ladies Constance and Isabel daughters of Don Pedro late King of Spain, whom they married: The Duke thereupon insliling himself King, and his wife Queene of Castile and Leon. Nor was the English name only encreased in stature honours: for about this time, the Flower (who had prouoked vs) were vanquish by the * Earle of Hereford at frau a shuip fight, about twentie and fise of their shippes being taken, and all the men slain.
 The sweete of this victory was sowed not long after with a grieuous losse: for the French hauing be-lieged the strong Citie of Rochelle in Sainton, with the aide by sea of Henry King of Castile: to relieve the English, John Earle of Arundell was sent with a about thirty shippes, men, victuals, munition, and money to the value of twenty thousand marks, for the vics of the warre: but being suddenly assailed with the Spanish Armade, which consisted of many great shippes, vnder the command of Ambrose Burganda and others, the English after a long and cruell conflict were utterly distressed, the Earle taken prisoner, and almost all the rest either taken, or put to the sword. * Rochelle held out notwithstanding, to whose reliefe while King Edward himselfe in person, with an extraordinary force set saile, the wind (alwayes till that time fauourable to his vnayes for France) came Easterly, and draue him backe into England with great griefe, and the waile (they write) of a nine hundred thousand pounds sterling. Neither did hee so gine out the care of that strong Pecee, which the English most manfully made good against the enemy.

(146) * Rochelle thus persluing in loyall resolution, John Duke of Britaine (who had married the Lady Marie daughter of King Edward) a Gentleman of much gratitude toward the English, the authors of his fortunes, resolves to adueneure his state in their quarrell: ships away for England: hath aide ministred vnto him: hee returns, and warres with various euent. But John Duke of Lancaster with a very great Armie comes to Calis, and from thence marcheth vpon the whole face of France, and (though with losse of many thousand) horie in the desert countreies of Auergne through famine) came safe, but with an almost-hunger-starued Army to Bordeaux. Not long after hee drew into the field, and a day was appointed betwene him and the Duke of Amou the French Kings brother, to haue tried the quarrell of their Nations by fist battell, before the City of Tolouse in Languedoc, but by an vnimely & pernicious storme true (to which K. Edward yeelded because his son the Prince lay dangerously sick) the hoped victory not onlie slipped out of the English mens hands, but almost all aduantage also of doing any thing else seasonably. The French boasted themselves as of a Conquest, who notwithstanding did helpe out their valiancy with policie. Gliguys makes his vie of all occasions, and workes much harme to the English party in Gaiuin and Britaine: But in Britaine Sir Robert Knols did so nobly requit himselfe on the behalle of his Soueraignes sonne in law the Duke, that hee only seemed a fit parallel to Gliguys, like as bee shopt the current of his fortune.

Neuertheless the doings of Glequin are so extolled by the French, that Tillou enters them into his Chronology with their words, Victoria, &c. the victories, fortunes and triumphs of Bertrand Glequin in Aquitaine and Britaine, though their owne lies make no mention of any debate of the English, which afforded them matter for the shadow of such gloriations.

(147) The next yeere the Duke of Lancaster returned into England, after whose departure all Aquitaine almost revolted, and fell to the French, who by the advantage of King Edward age, the Princes pining maladic (which some say was not poison but a drop sicke) and the successe of their practises more then of their valour, were growne haue againe: A treatie of peace was holden at Bruges, all was bot painted: for even then the French most of all prepared vnderhand for new attempts. Chief commissioners for the English at that conference was John Duke of Lancaster and for the French the Duke of Arion. The effects hashed nothing but a short truce for our euils to breed in.

(148) Among the parties which were preiudiced by this haunfull truce, the Duke of Britaine was chiefe. He had obtained great assistance from King Edward, and was now with the Earles of Cambridge, March, Warwick, and Stafford, with many other noble gentlemen and souldiers returned into Britaine, making to themselves a faire way for their maine enterprise, which was to sietle the Duke, and by the commodity of his Duchies situation to annoy the common enemy, and the better to recouer the English dominions in Aquitaine: But this treatie did that which Glequin, their indeed haue General, had not as yet in any fort effected: for the Duke of Britaine had driven the French Kings army out of his territories. But who wonders at this truce? The Prince of Wales was likely to die: plots one foot at home; the Duke of Lancaster had an eye to the Succession; things grew troubled: the Kings age was abated by dame Alien Peris (a most busie Court-lie) who (after Queene Philipp death) kept the old man warme, and the French saw all these matters and slept uice.

(149) King Edward calling a Parliament, vnfolding his estate, and wants, with demand of supplies, the bodie of the assembly in stead of contributions exhibits complaints, directly chargeth the Kings Officers with fraud, and humbly praereth that John Duke of Lancaster, the Lord Laurel, then Lord Chamberlaine, Dame Alien Peris (whose) behaviours they painted forth as most intolkeable, for that shee, respectlesse of her Sexs frailty, would in person, said they, come into all Courts of Iustice, and sometime sitting by the Judges or Doctors, would also after a most insolent manner periwade or disswade for her most aduantage; and with these one Sir Richard Starry might be removed from the person of the King. Neuertheless the Parliament made offer, that if she King were indeed out of money, they would liberally aduance toward his vice. The Prince of Wales favoured their free dealing, and all the said persons were removed, others more acceptable (such as the Prince and Petres thought fitter) being sarrogated in their places.

(150) While this Parliament (called the Good) lasted at Westminster, the noble soule of Edward Prince of Wales vpon Trinity Sunday (which euery yeere he vied to celebrate with the greatest honour that might be indue veneration of io diuine mystery) was preferred to the holy and blessed Trinity, after he had liued therein about 46. yeeres. In stead of Epitaph or mention of obsequies, the words of Walsingham shall serue vs for the present, of whose death he writes thus. Quo ebore, &c. With whom dying, died all the hope of Englishmen, during whose life, the English feared no invasion of the enemy, nor any encounter in Battell: For he assisted no Nation which he sawe come not, he befegged no City which he took not. And when this lampe was put out, the effect of this Par-lament was extinguished. His mortall parts were interred at Canterbury, where his monument standeth, but the renowne of his inimitable vertues haue as large an extent, and space to moue in, as the wide world. The King of France most reuerently celebrated his Exequies within the Chappell of his Palace at Paris. But in England there was a general sorrow, as for one whose worth had begotten a iust hope that hee would out-goe his Ancestors in glorie. Death preuenting that experiment of him, he is notwithstanding in full possession of loue and praise among all men for that which was passed. The cause of this domestick mourning encreased with the effects of his losse, which forthwith discoloured themselves. The King reals such persons as the petition of the Lords and Commons had bene removed, and Peter de la Mare speaker of the last Parliament, who had eloquently exprest the minde of the house in the forsward reformation, was, at the suite of the said bolde Dame Alien Peris, condemned by the King to perpetual imprisonment at Nottingham, though within two yeeres after by the importune suite of friends hee regained libertie. Meane-while John Duke of Lancaster gets the governance of the kingdom to be intrusted to him by his father.

(151) Richard the eldest sonne of the late most noble Prince of Wales, for prentation of all debates about the right of discession to the Crowne of England, was by his Grand-father first made Earle of Chesler, and not long after Prince of Wales: but for more assurance (lest the sounes decaye before the fathers should preiudice the Grand-Child) King Edward caused all the nobles of the Realme to take an Oath to accept and defend Prince Richard, an lawfull heire and King of England, after himselfe was dead: Neither did his vncles though famous Captains, repugne. Finally, the good old King, to comfort himselfe in honouring the liuing image of his noblest Child, the late Prince Edward, and to giue the mende of his Grand-Childs feeling of spleur, that by the sodeine intolence of the splendor, it might not afterward too much abuse his tender iudgement, and to make his vncles acquainted with respect of his person, he caused him to sit openly at his Table about all his owne Children in Christmas.

(152) About this time the famous Doctor John Waleis a man of sharpe wit, profound learning, and great iudgement, did in the Vniuersitie of Oxford publicly maintaine sundry propositions and dogmatical points against the Church of Rome, of which the Pope (forcing the hazard hanging over his triple Crowne) condemned a three and twenty as hereticall; whereupon the Archbishop of Canterbury and Bishop of London having attached the body of the said Waleis, did in the presence of the Duke of Lancaster and the Lord Henry Perie (his great fauourers), declare the iudgement of the Pope concerning Waleis doctrine, which had then taken deeper roote both in the vniuersitie, Court, and Countrey. So for a while all was quiet. But (vpon some secret encouragements) he held out peace long. His followers were, in the phrase of those darke daies, called Lollards, wherein, in truth, they endeouored to extirpate all pernicious weeds, which through time, sloth, and fraude, had crept into the field of Gods Church. The Duke of Lancaster (the rather, some thinke, vpon priuate emulation against Cussey Bishop of London) was engaged to faine in his protection, that he and the Lord Perry hardly escaped the fury of the Londoners, who would without question haue hewed them in pieces in reuenge of some disgracefull speech vttered by him against their Bishop. He notwithstanding disswaded all violence, and kept them from firing his palace of the Sauoy, but they neuertheless did in most despitefull manner reuerse his Armories in the open Market: A dishonour not to be borne, as that in which the dignity of his toyal blood was empyred. By this outrage the people (a most dangerous and heady water when once it is out) made known, what he, and the Lord Procure were to have hoped, if they could have found them, before they had gotten to Kennington to Prince Richard, who there remained with his mother: The Duke for this bare the Londons much evil will, neither rested till for a commencement of revenge) hee had procured the Maior and Aldermen to be thrust from their places, and substituted others in their stead.

(153) France in the meane time erected with new hopes, breathes nothing but warre. Prouisions in that respect were not neglected here. One of the last publique acts of the old kings life, was the triumphall celebration of Saint Georges feast at Wind-sor, where himselfe had founded the order of the Garter; and at this solemnitie hee bestowed vpon his dearest Grandchild Prince Richard the dignitie of Knighthood, which onely thing in all the patrimonie of honour could not succeed vnto him.

(154) Not long after ensued the sentence of disfigure which God pronounced betwene the foole and body of this mighty and martiall king, who left the world in the month of Iune at his Manour of Silene in Surrey: his Acts may giue you a perfect Character of his mind: few Princes that had to great and heroicke vertues, had fewer vices: therefore it was a fault of those times, which abounding in learned men, (and among them Geoffrey Chaucer Prince of Poets) afforded no better an Epitaph then that which we asmeine with pity to reade vpon his Monument at Westminster: the stiffe nevertheless is worthe, though the forme bee rude,

*Hic decuit Anglorum, flor regum prateritarum,

*Here Englands grace the flower of Princes past,

No man of his time could by better experience teach, what a vaine thing worldly glory (to the height whereof hee had aspired) ought to seeme. His mind (by sundry great checkes of Gods providence) recalled to consider of the foure last things, Death, Iudgement, Heaven and Hell, made him betake himselfe to Acts of benignity and deuotion. The Chappell at the end of the Abbey-Church at Westminster (since most magnificently enlarged by King Henry the seventh) was of his building. The holy quire of studies, and aduancement of good Arts, hee to prosperously flourished, that besides other great priuiledges granted to the Vniuersity of Oxford, (where himselfe had in his youth bene trained vp vnder the learned Walter Buryl) he conferred the chiefe rule of that whole City vpon the Chancellor of the Vniuersity, subordinating the Maior and Citizens to his gouernment, in regard of their iniuries offered to the Students. This most mighty Monarch that euer wore the Crowne of England, in many other felicities excelled his Ancestors, as in the victorious valour of his Childre, their obedience to him, and loue among themselves. A Lady to his wife (the mother) of such excellent vertue and government, as that the King Edwards fortunes seemed to sink into Eclipsse when there was hidden in her Sepulchre. Such and greater was this Edward, whose name among the flourishing spendors of his actions, is iustly transmitted with honour to all posterity. Hee reigned almost one and fifty yeeres, and* liued about threescore and sixe.

(155) Philip, wife of King Edward, was daughter of William Earle of Henault and Holland, sister of Earle William the last of that house, and of Margaret (the Emperesse that succeeded him; her mother was a Countess sister of Philip of Valois king of France, daughter of Charles Earle of Valois, who was sonne to King Philip the Hardy. Shee was married vnto him at Torke, Iamuary 24. crowned at Westminster the xiiiij Sunday of Lent following, 1327. Shee was a Lady of great vertue, and a constant true hearted louer of our Nation, was his wife two and forty yeeres, died August 15. Anno 1369 of her husbands reigne, 43. and was buried at Westminster, where shee hath a faire Tombe, at the foote of her husband, of blacke Toockstone with the garrailing about it, and the portraiture ouer it of Aialla: but shee built to her selfe a Monument of more glory and durability, by founding, and richly endowing the Colledge, called of her the Regener in Oxford, which, if it had bene finished according to the proiect, had bene a foundation of marvellous state and magnificence.

Hic Iussu.

(156) Edward, their eldest sonne and first child, borne at Windsor, Ioly 15. in the third yeere of his Fathers reigne, Anno 1329. was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Aquitaine and Guernsey, and Earle of Cheshire, hee was also Earle of Kent in right of his wife Iane (the most admired Ladie of that age) daughter of Edmond Earle of Kent, brother, by the fathers side, to King Edward the second. Shee had bene twice married before, first to the valiant Earle of Salisbury, from whom shee was divorced, next to the Lord Thomas Holland, after whose decease, this Prince passionately louing her, did marry her: by her hee had issue two sonnes, Edward the eldest, borne at Anglesea, who died at seven yeeres of age, and Richard borne at Bordeaux, who, after his father was Prince of Wales, and after his Grandfather King of England. This Prince had also naturall issue, Sir Iohn Scander, and Sir Roger Claremont Knights: the latter being attainted in the reigne of Henry 4. is thought to haue bene ancestor to the house of Smyther in Staffe. Hee died at Canterbury on Trinity Sunday, Iune 8. Anno. 46. of his fathers reigne 49. and was buried at Christ-church there, 1376.

(158) Edward, their third sonne and fift child, was borne at the City of Antwerpe, 29. Novemb. 12. of his fathers reigne, Anno 1388. hee married first Elizabeth the daughter & heire of William Burgh Earle of Wylsh in Ireland, in whose right hee was first created Earle of Wylsh, and becaue hee had with her the honour of Clare in the Countie of Tennand, as parcel of the inheritance of her Grand-mother Elizabeth, (the sister and coheire of the last Earle Gilbert Clare, hee was in a Parliament, Anno 1362. created Duke of Clarence, as it were of the Countie about the Towne Caste and honour of Clare: from which Dutchie the name of Clarence (being the Title of the King of France for the South parts of England) is deriued. This Duke had issue by her one onely daughter named Philip, afterward wife of Edmond Mortimer Earle of March, mother of Earle Roger, Father of Anne Countesse of Cambridge, and shee was the mother of Richard Duke of Yorke, Father of King Edward the 4. the second marriage of this Duke was in Lombardie at Milleyne, with the Lady * Yolanda daughter of Galeas the second Duke thereof; but through intemperance, he liued not long after.

was borne at Gains the chief Towne of Flanders, Anno 1340. and 14. of his fathers reigne. In his Childhood he was created Earle of Richmond, which title was afterward recalled in, and bestowed upon John Duke of Brittain, who married his sister, to whose Dutchy it had formerly belonged. Hee had three wives; the first, Blanch, daughter and Coheire, and in the end the sole heire, of Henry Duke of Lancaster (sonne of Edmund surnamed Crouch-back) in whose right he was at the first Earle, and after Duke of the same, and with that Dutchy also Earle of Leicester, Derby, and Lincoln, and high Steward of England. He had issue by her, Henry of Bolingbroke Earle of Derby, after Duke of Hereford, and lastly King of England, named Henry the fourth, who first placed the Crowne in the house of Lancaster; Philip, wife of John the first, King of Portugall and Elizabeth, married first to John Holland Earle of Huntingdon, (brother of Thomas Duke of Surrey) and after him, to Sir John Cornwall Baron of Fischep. His second wife was Constance, the eldest daughter of Peter King of Castile and Leon, in whose right for the time he entailed himself King of both these realmes; by her he had issue one onely daughter, named Katherine, married to Henry the third, sonne of King John, in possession before, and in her right, after, King of both the said realmes. His third wife was Katherine the widow of Sir Hugh Swinford, a Knight of Langshere, eldest daughter and Coheire of Pagan Ract's Galesine called Galen King of Armes, for that Country. * his younger daughter being married to Sir Geoffrey Chaucer, our Laureat Poet. By her hee had issue (borne before matrimony, and made legitimate afterward by Parliament holden in the twentieth yeere of King Richard the second, John Earle of Sommerfet, Thomas Duke of Excester, Henry Bishop of Winchester and Cardinal and Isaac, who was first married to Robert Ferrer (Baron of Wenmore and Ouseley, in the Counties of Salop and Warwick) and secondly to Ralph Nevill the first, Earle of Westmerland. Shee and all her beethren were named Beaufort, of a Castle which the Duke had in France * where they were borne,) in regard thereof bearing the Parcelles of a Castle for the cognizance of their family. This Duke in the thirteenth yeere of his Nephew King Richard, at a parliament holden at London, was created Duke of Aquitaine, but in the first yeere after, hee was called home and this Title recalled in, and in the third yeere after, the sixteenth of his age, Anno 1399. he dyed at Ely house in Walborne, and lyeth honourably entombed in the Quire of Saint Paul.

Edmund, their sonne, surnamed Langley, was created Earle of Cambridge Anno 1362. in the same Parliament, wherein Lionel was created Duke of Clarence. The Earldoms also of Essex and Morikampton, and the Constablershippe of England, fell to him by right of his wife Eleanor, the only daughter and heire of Humfrey de Bohun Earle of Hereford and Essex. Hee was a man of valour, wildome, and vigiliancy for the behoofe of the King his Nephew and the State, but those noble vertues (dilempered with too much willfulness & forward obduracy) bred him, first Envy, and after ruine. For the King surmising him to be a too secret observer of his doings, consulted with Thomas Mortimer Duke of Norfolk how to make him away, whom Mortimer vnswayes surprizing, couened secretly to Calis where he was strangled 1397. 10. of his Nephewes reigne. Himselfe in his life had provided a goodlie tombe at Playste in Essex (his owne Towne, and * the vsuall seat of the great Constables of England) * where hee founded a Colledge, whither his body was brought, and laid with all funeral pompe, but afterward it was translated to Westminster, where also lyeth Eleanor his wife, who dyed 1399. Their issue was Humfrey Earle of Buckingham, * who dyed at Chester of the pestilence Anno 1400. CHAPTER XIII.

A.D. 1378.

The Coronation of the King.

Richard of Burdeaux, sonne to that Great Star of English Cheualrie, Edward, by-named the Blacke Prince, and grand-child to the most renowned Edward the third (both of them lately deceased) was crowned in the eleventh year of his age, and vp-on the sixteenth day of Iuly. Seldome hath been seen so magnificent a Coronation, as that of this young King, but the thing which gave a better lustre of hope at his beginning; then the shine and maiesty of that publick Act, was the wise course which in this his childhood was taken; to wit, the reconciliation of the Lord John Duke of Lancaster, and the Citizens of London, with the restitution of Sir Peter de la Mare Knight, Speaker in the late Parliament, (whom King Edward had committed to prison, at the infliction of Dame Alice Peres now banished, and confiscated) not onely to former liberty, but likewise to fauour and honor extraordinary.

(2) At this Coronation (which, as matters not vnworthie to bee kept alive, wee following the im-methodicall order of the Record, haue here for perpetuall memory thought good to abridge out of aotherlike Monumentis) John the Kings eldest vale, under the stile of John King of Castile and Leon, and Duke of Lancaster, by humble petition to the King, claimed to bee now Steward of England, in right of his Earldome of Leicester; and as he was Duke of Lancaster, to beare the Kings chiefe sword called Curtana; and as Earle of Lincoln, to cutte and carve at the royall Table before the King. His petitions being found iust, were confirmed to him, and to his Assignes, the two Earles of Derby and Stafford, the first to beare the sword, while the Duke should be busied about other offices as Steward, and the other to cut and carve. The Duke then in great estate, held this the Kings high Court of Starre Ship neer to the Chappell of the said Palace, vpon the Thursday, before the Coronation, which was also vpon a Thursday. There Thomas of Woodstocke the Kings yuele, was admitted to exercise the office of Counsellor of England, in right of his wife, one of the daughters and heires of Henry of Bohun, late Earle of Hereford, and Counsellor of England, Henric de Perre (word Perre) was by the Kings consent and writ authorisid to exercise the place of Marshall of England for that time, faining to carrie one their right, for that by reason of the times shortnesse, the claime, which Margaret daughter & heire to Thomas of Northampton, late Earle of Northfolk, and Marshall of England, laid thereunto, could not bee discussed. Robert de Vaux Earle of Oxford, though then in minority, being notwithstanding found to haue right in Fee, was by the Kings speciall consent allowed to haue, and vñ the office of Chamberlain. Hee was also admitted to his right of powring out water for the King to wash with, when hee went to mette, at the Coronation. John Wilsford Citizen of London, by reason of certayne tenements (heretofore the possession of John Pincot) being a Mokie of the Mannour of Hydon and holden in Seruicant, had his right, to haue a Towell for the King to wipe with, when hee went to mette, found and allowed, and Edmund Earle of Kent appointed to serue as his Deputie. Thomas Beauchampe Earle of Warwick was found to haue right, and admitted thereupon to beare the third sword of estate before the King at the Coronation, as also to exercise the office of Postler, and to enioy all such fees as to the same appertained. Sir John de Arundell knight, by reason of the tenure of his Mannour of Wimundley in the County of Hereford, was admitted to serue the King at his Cuppe, vpon the day of the Coronation, and for his Fee to haue that * Cuppe of silver wherewith hee then serued the King in his royaltie. William Lord Perreus for his Mannour of Farham and Mander of Cere, was promied to haue right to support the Kings right arme, when he held the Scepter royall therat the day of Coronation; which fruce being list * honorably knighted by the King at Kenington, hee was admitted accordingly to performe. Anne late wife of John de Hastings Earle of Pembroke for her Mannour of Alfeien in Northfolk, was admitted by her Deputie Sir Thomas Blunt Knight, to vñ the office of Napper, and to enioy the fees thereof. Edmund, Earle of March, wñ assigned to carry the Kings great gilt Spear, facing to every one their right; for John the sonne of John de Hastings late Earle of Pembroke, claimed that office to bee his, as William the Marshall his Ancestor held the same at the Coronation of King Edward the second; but by reason hee was vnder age, and in Wardshippe, the King for that time disposed it to the Earle of March. Who also, with the aide Spoones was assigned to beare the second sword before the King; for which, the said young Earle of Pembroke, and the Earle of Arundell (in the right of his Ancestor the Earle of Surrey) contending, it was adiudged to Pembroke, for his Calles and Townes of Pembroke and Tenby, &c. but the execution of that honorable place was assigned by the Kings before. Richard Earle of Arundell, for the Mannour of B. in Kent, was admitted to bee chiefe Butler at the Coronation, for that (after the sale thereof) the Earles Ancestors had exercised that office at Coronations, and the claime of Edmund Stapletoke, who then had that mannour as sonne and heire of Edmund Stapletoke (ward to Jeffrey Chaucer, who had freed him for one hundred and foure pounds) for that time put off his right to him in the meane time faued notwithstanding. The Lord Mayor and Citizens of London (such as were chosen for that high day service among themselves) were found by good Record to haue their feuerall rights. The Mayor to attend in his owne person as chiefe Cuppe-waiter, (charged with the Cnpboord-royall) aswell in the hall at dinner, to serue the king in a cuppe of gold with spices, and for his Fees to haue the said Cuppe, and a Water-spout-potte of gold therunto belonging, when herooke his leane at night. The Citizens, to helpeth the Lord Mayor in his office of chiefe Pincier or Cnp-waiter, and to minister or serue the Lords aswell at Dinner in the Hall, as in the Chamber after dinner. Whereupon the King (saith the Record) perpetuam gratitudinem magnam & sublimitatem & pregratiam in ore, weighing with himselfe the great gratitude and aide, which her Pregratiam had heretofore abundantly found in the Citizens afore said, and hoping himselfe to finde in them the like gratitude and aide heretofore, and to the intent that they might with the more ioyfull hearts performe layall obedience to the King, and more earnestly helpe him in his occasions, he being hearily desirous to content them, did well and erudant that the said Citizens should exercise their said attendance. Sir John Dynmoke Knight, in the right of Margaret his wife, for the Mannour of Sermsely, and Sir Baldwine de Braule Knight, as cofen and next heire to Philip Marmion, by Isabelle daughter of the said Philip, for the Caffe of Tauworth in the Connie of Warwick, contended each of them to haue the office, & fees belonging to the Kings Champion vpon that rooll day; but because the said John shewed better Records then Baldwine, and for that King Edward and the late Prince of Wales, were often heard to say that John ought to doe that seruice for the said mannour of Sermsely, hee was admitted for that time, and day was giuen to Baldwine to shew further cause of his claime within three weekes after the feast of S. Hilare next, or else for euer to bee verie excluded.

This Champion is to haue for accomplishment of that seruice (and the fame also for his fees) one of the best horses of warre and caparions, which the king hath, one saddle plated with Iron, and one complete armour with the whole farniture, in such sort as the King himselfe willeth, when hee is to goe into a mortall battell (Said also, saith the Record, in our battelle mortelle) in which sort being trowered, he is to ride before the King in procession to his Coronation, and to crie thrice to the people before all the world. That there is no man of high or low estate, who willeth, that our large Lord Richard, Cousen and heire of Edward, late King of England, might not be crowned King of England, against whom beate the Champion is not ready with his body to maintaine, and well maintaineth that hee doth faithfully as a Traitor. William de Latimer, and John the sonne and heire of John Mortimer of Achelton, the Kings Ward, iointlie petitioned at the same Court, to bee admiured in the right of William Beauchampe of Bedford (whole lands the king held in right of the said Wardshippe, and William de Latimer in his owne right,) to haue the office of Almoner at the Coronation and to enioy the Fees thereof. And because in the redde Booke of the Exchequer it appeared, that the said William Beauchampe (late deceased) vñed the said office; William de Latimer was there admitted aswell for himselfe, as for the said heire to exercise the fame, and for his Fee to haue the silver plater of Almes which stood before the King as hee sat at the Table vpon that day and if afterward it should reasonably appeare, that they likewise ought to haue an * Hoghead of wine, they should haue it.

William Burdolf shewed by petition (as all the rest did) to the right noble, and right redoubted Lord, the King of Castile and Leon, Duke of Lancaster and Steward of England, that certayne of the said William his Fee-simple lands in his towne of A. were holden of the King in chiefe by Seruicant. appele Mulpygnyen la Cuisse de Roy. And accordingly the said William was admitted to that service by his Deputy. Richard Lyons, as Tenant of the Manour of L. which John de Lyfen and his ancestors held by the service of making wafers for the King at the day of Coronation, was accordingly thereunto admitted. The Barons of the Cinqve Parts, upon their petition and claime, the matter being evident, were admitted to beare (and to haue for their Fees) the Kings Canapie of cloth of Gold (or of what other stuffe elle is pleased the King) upon foure staves of silver over the kings head upon the day of Coronation, and also to sit at meat in the hall at the highest Table on the kings right hand. John Fitz-John, in right of his wife, shewed, that the Manour of S. in Norfolke was holden of the King by the service of Chiefe Lardner at his Coronation, and that Geffrey Bardelay did execute the same at the Coronation of King Edward the third, whereupon John Fitz-John was admitted to execute that office by himselfe and his Deputies. Richard Hering for the Manour of C. in the County of Surrey, in the right of Agnes his wife, claimed to be Viber of the Kings Chamber, but because that claime did no way concerne the Coronation of the King, hee was left otherwise to pursue his interest if he so thought good. These are the services which were then claimed before the D. of Lancaster, Steward of England, which he with his owne hands deliuered into the Kings Chancery there to be enrolled. At the same Coronation also Thomas of Stafford the youngest sonne of the late king was created Earle of Buckingham, Thomas Mortimer Earle of Nottingham, Guy Earle of Arundell, Henry Percy Earle of Norham, &c. Thus the bounty of the young Monarch imparted large rayes of his imperiall Splendor to these eminent persons of his Kingdome. Howsoever, these and the like honours haue not in our Common-wealth either always become fortunate to the Receiuers, or without repenatence to the Donors.

(3) But the generall State of the kingdome being implicated, before the late king Edward the decalle, by reason of that opportunity and advantage to their designs, which the neighbour enemies of the Crowne of England found in the old age of that victorious Monarch, was now no less entangled through the contempt of King Richards youth. For before his Coronation, the French with fifty ships (as Walffingham calls them) thrust into the Haven of Rie, the towne whereof they rifled, and consumed with fire. The Crowne of England was scanted on his head, when the Scots at the other end of England set fire vpon the Town of Rochester: but the French (encouraged by their late exploit at Rie) arrived in their Gallies, and tooke the whole Ile of Wight, the Castle (which Sir Hugh Tyrell manfully defended,) only excepted, leauing vpon the inhabitants one thousand Marks in lieu of sparing their houses from the rage of warre, and flame. Neither was it long before they landed at Winchester, though being from thence repulld, they burnt the Towne of Hastings at that present.

(4) These petty breaches thus giuen to the king, were farther fortunated with a little victory. For they, emboldened with such successes (dishonourable and dangerous to King Richard, who seemed to haue lost the sovereignty of the English Ocean, where Pyrrres durst so reuell, and also to haue had as little counsell, courage or forces left about him vpon the land) come on Shore at Rotterdam in August. The Prior of Lewis with some slight tumultuatie Forces, rashly aduentures himselfe against them, where he with two knights, & some few others were taken prisoner, and about 100. English slaine, but of the French many more, who returned with their Prisoners to their Naue.

(5) The chiefe charge of affaires lay vpon the Duke of Lancaster, the Kings vncle, or vpon some such as he did put about him, through whose want of care, things declining to a shamefull change, and the glorious achievements of the two late Edwards falling vnder Eclips, there was onlie found one private Citizen of London, that (without regard to the enuie of the slothfull Lords, or his owne hazards, or of any thing else, so much as the good of his neglected Country) put his whole strengths to support the same. This was the worthy John Philpot, who at his owne charges mans out a Fleet to the Sea, raignes by them therein, and guardes both water and land from their intolerable violences. Nor did his so great piete faile of happy euent, for God (who fauours all vertuous actions) had put into his hands within a short space 15. Spanish Ships fraught with rich merchandise, which the right of warre made his, whereby his great charges were abundantly repayed. Let vs see his Statue erected now at last, with the Statues of Walworth, and other honourable Citizens in London.

(6) What therefore the loue of their Prince and Country could not larre vp in the Lords, that very shame and indignation doe. There is consolation had, and the King of Nauarre (an vniuersall subiect of the Crowne of France) morageth the Haven Towne of Cherburgh in Normandy to King Richard. The occasion was the rather not omitted, for that, by thrusting into it a good Garrison (which was forthwith done, and first Sir Robert Ew, then Sir John of Harleston, both worthy Knights, made Captaines there) the same would at all times serue to giue quiet entrance to an Inuasion of France which now was meditated.

(7) How loosely, the meane while, the affaires of the State and Iustice were managed, by reason of the vniuersal yeeres of the King, may appeare by a bloody outrage then perpetrated and vnreroged. The occasion this. In the warres of Spain, (which Edward the late Prince of Wales made for restoring Peter to the Crowne,) the Earle of Deuon was taken and adidged Prisoner (from all others claiming that honour) to two valiant Esquires Robert Hamle and John Chakel, who both of them belonged to that martiall Knight Sir John Chandler. They free the Earle, taking his forme and heire for assurance of performances. This young Gentleman (vicerly neglected hitherto by his dishonourable Father,) was now demanded of them in the Kings name, by the Duke of Lancaster, with a purpose (as was thought) the rather either to aduance thereby his (the said Dukes) title to the Crowne of Spain, or to makea peace there, with the better conditions. The Esquires resist, and shift their Hostage out of the way, & are thrust therefore into the Tower of London; but escaping from thence, take Sanctuary in Westminster. Thither with fifty armed men doth Sir Alan de Brocel secretly repair, draws Shakel by a wile out of the priuiledge of the Church, and exposituates the matter with Hamle in the Kings name; vpon whom (proceeding against the abuse offered to that Maieitie in his tender yeeres, and freely taxing his Counsellours with iniustice, auarice, and euill aduice,) while they sought to lay hands, he with his short sword valiantly made them all flee off, but in the end they most wickedly murdered him in the Chancel commending himselfe, in his last words, to God reuenger of such iniuries, and to the liberty of our holy mother the Church. With him was murdered a seruant of his thrust in with a Laurel at the backe. This is that Hamle whose body lies buried vnder a brasse-plated stone in the Abbey Church at Westminster, whose blood (by the violence of the said Duke) found not that fulnesse of legal vengeance, which so haious an homicide required.

(8) The North parts of England were about this time greuously visited with the stroke of pestilence, and their lamentable affliction encreased by the inroads and outrages of the Scots, who had now surprized Berwick killing Sir Robert Reynston Knight

(9) Neither was the spirit of the English (after it began to requicken) idle elsewhere; for as Sir Robert Knap had diuers wayes vexed the French, and taken Oliver (the brother of that renowned Bertrand de Guesclin) prisoner, so Sir John de Harleston, Captaine of Chertsey after him, slew and took diuers French in a skirmish. Thise few foregoing drops of greater approaching showers. For Sir Hugh Calverley and Sir Thomas Percy, made admirals of the narrow Seas, took many rich prizes, and exploited sundry other things very praiseworthy, bringing home the acceptable news of the dislike which the Britons had conceived against the French Kings Government; for he commanded them to render up to him all their strengths, Castles, and walled Townes, and many of them, who refused to obey, hee put to death.

(10) These employments, and fresh designs for other like, found need of pecuniary supplies, whereupon, in a Parliament holden at London, it was agreed, that for supply of the Kings wants, the Commons should be taxed, and the burthen be wholely undergone by the able. The rates then of that tax were these, Dukes, Archbishops, Earles and Bishops at ten marks each, mitted Abbots at six much, besides fortie pence for every Monke under their subjection. Briefly (saith Thomas Walsingham) there was no religious person, man or woman, Justice, Sheriffe, Knight, Esquire, Parson, Vicar, or Chauntry Priest free from this tax rated according to the value of their yerely receipts.

(11) We formerly mentioned, how John Shirell (the other companion of Robert Haulton) so execrable murdered in Gods house) was taken. He now upon condition that the King (besides 500 marks in money) should give him lands to the yerely value of one hundred marks, and should also found and sufficiently endow, at the Kings costs, a Chantry with five Priests for their souls, whom the kings Officers had wickedly murdered, he rendered up his Hostage, the eldest (but naturally) sonne of the said Earle of Dean. At the discovery and bringing forth of whom, all men were stricken with wonderfull love and admiration: for the yong Gentleman having giuen his faith not to disclose himselfe, appeared in the shape of a bairdgrome, in which (unknowne to all the world but his Master) hee had of his owne sword lurked. An example of such a point of perfect honesty as cannot be forgotten without iniurie.

(12) The same yere, the Lord John Mannersford, whom the French had driven out, being invited home by his Barons, returned into his Duchy of Britaine, accompanied with the valiant Knights Calverley and Percy aforesaid, where he, his friends, and followers were received with singular honor. Soone after Sir John de Arundell, brother to the Earle of Arundell, being sent into Britaine to aid the Duke, was with many other valiant Knights and Esquires drowned. It is imputed by our Author to a iust effect of Gods anger against the said Sir John, and his household, for their manifold vices and outrages, practised by him and them, before they set out from England; for which they had the bitter curses of the people; and the Angell of destruction to execute those imprecations vpon the delinquents.

(13) But the action of aiding did more deeply import, then that it should be abandoned for the losse of that unfortunate fellowship, and the exceeding riches which were with them: therefore the Lord Thomas of Woodstock Earle of Buckingham, with Calverley, Percy, Knap, Walsingham (or Walsley) verie valiant knights & other competent forces, was sent to assist the Duke of Britaine. But because the French Gallies hovered vpon the narrow Seas, they landed at Calis, and from thence march through France, spoiling Countreies, burning townes, the French not daring to emperch them, and killing people, till they and their whole equipage came late into Britaine.

(14) There were about these times cinill dissensions in France, for the Duke of Burgundie, younger brother of King Charles (lately dead) being made Guardian of the person and dominions of his Nephew Charles then in minority, had the Duke of Anjou (being an elder brother to the Duke of Burgundie) a mortall enemy. Their bloody quarrels fell out luckily for the English aides in the Duchie of Britaine, out of which as Duke John had bene driven for adhering to his father in law the late King Edward, so the English did their best to uphold him in it, as there was cause.

(15) The French in these extremes are released by their ancient disunion: for the Scots ensuing about that time with fire and sword into Cambridgeshire and Westmerland, and the forest of Inglenode, drove away much Cattle, slew the Inhabitants, rised the booths and houses of Perish in the Faire time, killing and taking many, and driving away the rest. The Earle of Northumberland preparing a bloody revenge, was (not without wonder) prohibited so to doe by letters from the King, that is, from such as were about the King.

(16) But how coldly foreer the publike affaires were followed, the want of money for supplies was still pretended. And therefore in a Parliament holden at Northampton, was granted to the King a general supply of money; the pretended occasion of monstrous mischief which followed, by reason of a clause in that grant of Subsidies, that every one of each sex, being above a certain age, should pay by the head, or per Poll as they call it, twelue pence.

(17) The English Chensury began now againe to display it selfe bare off, to gratifie the private ends of John Duke of Lancaster, who claimed the Crown of Castile and Leon, in right of Constance his wife: For John King of Portugal had a defunctive warre against John then King of Castile, who challenged the Crowne of Portugal in right of Beatrice his wife, (by whom hee had no issue) the onely daughter of Ferdinand King of Portugal, which this other John (a baird sonne of Ferdinands) had by faction usurped. There were sent to his aide the Lord Edmund de Langley Earle of Cambridge the Kings vnckle, and sundry Knights and others of good experience with an Armie. These arriving in Portugal valiantly defended the same for about two yeres, and were the chief cause of giving the Spaniards an overthrow in battell, where they lost 40 thousand men. At last the two Kings agreeing together bare the charges of counselling home the English in common, that their Countreies might be freed from them, being both alike zealous of their piissance. In this time Edward sonne to the Earle of Cambridge vnckle to Richard King of England, married the daughter of the king of Portugal, but afterward neither would the Earle leave his sonne behind, as suspecting the Portugales faith, nor the other entrust his daughter to the Earle, so as they remained disunited in body, howsoever visited by Ceremonie.

(18) Not long after the time of that Earles employment into Spaine, there fell out accidents which doe plainly convince their error to bee great, who thinke that any madnesse is like that of an armed & vngoverned multitude, whereof these times (by a kind of Fate proper to children raigning) gave a most dangerous document. The extreme hatred borne by the people to John Duke of Lancaster, calling himselfe King of Castile and Leon, and the discontentment taken at an extraordinary tax, levied per Poll, vpon all sorts of people, who were above sixteen yeres of age, which (as all other the evils of the time) they imputed to the Duke (the manner being so close to them the authors of evils, who are supposed to have the greatest power of doing them) moved the enrag-

(27) It was not long, but that the King (surprised before with that popular inundation) had sure notice that the daemlich rebels were in all other places disipated, but neither till themselves had done much mischief, and suffered little punishment. Memorable was the service of Henry le Spencer the stout Bishop of Norwich against the Bondmen and Peasants of Norfolk, whome he drave out of their Trenches, slew daunters, and cauled their murther King John Linteflar to be hanged, drawne and headed. But that which vniuersallie most of all pleased to the reduction of these audacious wretches to due obedience, was the death of Wat Tyler, and the certaine news of their disipation, who were assembled about London, where for a few daies they had most barbarously tyrannized. In Hertfordshire at Saint Albans, Barnet, &c. in Stafford, Cambridge, and the Ile of Elye the popular outrages were now in a manner appeased. Yet wonderfull is it, that all these execrable furies, being in so many severall places, with so great forces in each, (for at Bury, where John Wesh for some kinged it, they are reported to haue bene about fifty thousand, making it their iangelsport, cause the heads of great persons, which they had cut off and fixed on Poles to kisse and whisper as it were one in the others eare) lasted not in the high speed and full rage thereof the space of eight daies, (being not long before Midsummer, as if it had been a fyderall infection or general Lunacy) and the whole time thereof from the beginning to the end, is accounted, by Act of Parliament, but from the first of May till Midsummer the Feast of Saint John Baptist.

(28) The royall power which had thus bene soude, and trodden underfoote, could no longer brooke so intollerable debailement, but to repaire and establish it selfe, there was proclamation made, that all men who had horie and armour, and loved the King, should forth with come to London in their best manner. There were neuer scene together so great a multitude of horsemen in England. The multitudes were taken upon Black-heath, where the king himselfe, being mounted on a goodly coarser among the armed men, and having his Standard royall advanced before him, daily rode forth to view his people, reioicing to see scene among them, and acknowledged their Lord. It is said, that within three daies space there appeared upon that heath for the Kings service, not fewer then forty thousand horsemen most bravely appointed.

(29) This force had bene employed against the Kentish-men, even to the vicer rooting out of all the guilty, who againe beganne to stirre, but that the King was perfwaded by the Nobility and Gentlemen of that Countie, to proceed by ordinarie iustice; which was done. The Kings peace was also proclaimed in euerie place according to his letters dated at London 17. Iune in the fourth yeere of his reigne, to the great encouragement of good subjects, and confusion of the wicked. There were executed about one* thousand and five hundred in all places, besides five of a new forlorne Company, which having desperatly dared to gather head againe in Essex about Billyricol, had tendered to the King certaine insolent demands, which were iustlie reiected, and they flaine. The Lord Thomas of Woodstock Earle of Buckingham the Kings vicie, with Sir Thomas Percy brother to the Count Northumberland, were sent with force against them. The Rebels being manie in number, were notwithstanding broken at the verie first with a Charge made vpon them by a ranc in front of ten men of Armes or Lances. There were taken eight hundred hors belonging to the Rebels. Sir Robert Trissil was principall Actor in the matters of iustice, which hee rightly and fruely administered. The King himselfe had so great a force of horsemen with him, that (as Sir Walter de Lee knight said in his speech to Saint Albans-men) there was neither graille nor blade of Corne old or new left within five miles compasse of the kings person.

(30) And least the mischievous multitude should to the kings dishonour and common hurt of the Church and kingdom, enioy any the least benefit by their late vnspokeable villanies; the king, by aduise of his Councell, first letters reuocatorie into the Shires about, by which he commands, that no man shall enioy any freedome or profit by vertue of any extorted grante, during the time of the Infortifications: but yet that his maiesties purpose was by the aduise of his Councell to grant to his subjects (notwithstanding their so heinous treasons) such mercie, as should bee pleasing to God, and profitable to him, and to the kingdom. After which sundrie executions were done at Saint Albans, and elsewhere. But* our Author indgeth, that the full heape of those causes of Gods vengeance, was made up by the beggng Fryars, who (with he) to purchase wealth contrary to their owne Oathes, did teach the great men in their vices, and mortified the vulgar in their errors, feeding on the sinnes of both: calling good evil, and euill good, seducing Princes by flatteries, and the common sort with lies, carrying both heading with themselves away. For their outward profession of truth they haue so defiled with their wicked life, as that it is now in euery mans mouth a good Argument holding in matter and forme: This is a Fryar, Ergo a lyar, as true as to say: This is white, Ergo it is colore.

(33) After Christmas King Richard took to wife the Lady Anne daughter to the Emperor Charles the fourth, and sister to Wenceslaus king of Bohemia, and called Empress, which Lady by the Duke of Taffall, was in the name of her said Father, formerly promised and assured unto him, as one whom the King did specially affect, though the daughter of Barnabas Duke of Arles was also offered with a farre greater summe of gold. Shee was with great pompe and glory at the same time crowned Queen, by the hand of William Courtney (a younger sonne of the Earle of Devonshire) Bishoppe of London, lately promoted from London to the See of Canterbury. The Nuptials and Coronation of the beauteous Queene being, the Parliament (which by this great Ladies arrival was interrupted & prorogued) began againe. Where many things concerning the excelle of apparrell, transmutation of Coine, &c. were whollye enacted. Sed quid inquit Statuta Parli. commoverit. R. v. to what purpose (saith Wallingham) are Acts of Parliament, when after they are once past, they take no manner of effect? For the king with his private Council, was wont (saith hee) to change, or abolish all things, which by the whole Commons and Nobility of the Kingdome had in former Parliaments beene agreeed vpon.

(34) Nevertheless, it was then provided, that such as had done any thing in their owne defence against the Rebels, or to their suppression, without the ordinarie formes of processe in law, should sustaine no damage thereby, but for ever bee as cleare as if they theretofore had enjoyed their particular pardons; and that all releases, froffisions, and other acts done in the late rebellions, (during the long times, for so they were called) by way of constraint or daunt, should be utterly void.

(35) With the good liking of this Parliament, Sir Richard Scrope Knight, was made Chancellor of the Realme, and Sir Hugh Segraue Treasurer; but it was not long before the Chancellor denying to passe such large gifts vnder the Great Seale, as the king in his youthfull humor had imprudently granted, therewith to gratifie his full craving Courtiers, fell into the kings undesired displeasure. For albeit he alledged important causes of such his deniall, (as, that the King was greatly in debt) and therefore such largesses were fitter to bee employed in discharging some of his Creditors, that knowing how the King was intangled with Creditors, such cravers were not truely well affected to him, as regarding their own private avarice more then the kings profite, or the publike waies; that those selfe same cravers, had formerly received such gifts of his Majesty, as were (at least) answerable to their deservings; and that himselfe he should feele those grants (made in the Kings childhood) was like to haue small thanks of him, when he should come to ripe iudgement; yet thereupon hee was twice or thrice willed to send the Seale to the King, who comming in person "furrendered the same, with such like words, That hee would alwayes be loyal and true to his Maiestie, but never leaue any office vnder him againe. Not long after which furrender, Robert Braybrooke Bishoppe of London was made Chancellor in his place. This act of the Kings was displeasing to the whole Realme, and one of the first things by which hee fell into dislike, it being among the infelicities of King Richard, that those times were too full of froward and impatient censures, for a Prince of so calme a temper, and as yet valencious yeeres.

(36) Henricke Spenser the warlike Bishop of Norwich, being drawne on by Pope Urban to preach the Crusades, and to be General against Clement (whom sundry Cardinals and great Prelates had also elected Pope) hauing a Fifteenth granted to him for that purpose by Parliament, after strong opposition of almost all the Nobles who resisted this bulles of the Pope, went with Forces into Flanders to support the cause of Urban against the Antipope, from whence after hee had performed sundry things very happily, taken Graveling, Euborough, Dunkirk by assault, and beene victor in a fier battell against thirty thousand abettors of Clements claime, hee was enforced to returne, as destitute of those farther succours which were expected out of England. But the king vpon pretence that hee had not obeyed his royall mandate, by which hee required him, (before hee transported) to returne, for a while selfe vpon all his temporalities.

(37) But K. Richard hauing before given the realm discontentment, by removing Scrope from the Chancellorship, encreased the time by some manifest signes of lenity and prodigality toward Strangers, then which nothing makes a Prince lesse pleasing to the English: for, in the progresse which with his beloved Queene hee made to Bury, Thetford, Norwich, and other places, gifts were taken on all hands by the King, and they againe through the Queene were powred forth to enrich her Bohemians.

(38) John Duke of Lancaster embarkt himselfe for France, where hee concluded a truce to endure betweene the two Nations English and French, from the present Christmas till Midsummer. At his returne, he and his brother Thomas of Woodstock Earle of Buckingham, went with an Armie into Scotland, to reuenge the breach of truce: but as it seems by some, the Duke had rather an hoast of men, then an hostile mind; for hee so ordered the matter (as not forgetfull perhaps of currellies shewed to him in his late dangers, when the Commons were out in Armes,) that the Scots hauing had time enough to withdraw both their goods and persons, and his army suffering farre more losse by penurie and cold, then it could inflict vpon the enemy, returned "fruitles and inglorious.

(39) Not long after his returne, hee was encountered with a more capitall and dangerous enemy, then those in Armes: for a certaine Carmelite Fryer, by birth an Irishman, deuoured to the King (in the time of Parliament at Salisbury) a writing which contained therein a heinous accusation of the Duke of Lancaster, that he had conspired to murder the King, and to crowne himselfe. The accuser discovered, the day, place, and other circumstances, to induce a beliefe of the pretended intention, and tooke his oath vpon the Sacrament, which that day hee had receiued, that no one word in that scroll was untrue. The Dukes Apologie and fauour with the King, preuailed about the accusers confidence; whereupon the Fryer is committed, at the Dukes request, to the John Holland (the Kings halfe brother by his mothers) and a day appointed, wherein the accuser was to shew a cause of his crimination.

(40) But in the night which next forewent the designed day, the said Lord John Holland (if a man may beleue, that a thing so villanous could be done by men of honour) and one Sir Henry Green knight, are reported to haue trussed vp the Fryer in a cord by the necke, and parts of generation, laying vpon his breast a stone of great weight to breake the chaine of his backe; and that they also seerch the soles of his feet. By which miserable and quadruple manner of death, without triall or conviction, (as also without "restitution of any thing which hee had vttered against the Duke) he is said to haue breathed his last. Neither was his death smothered, for the next day they cauled his strangled carcase to bee dragged through the City, that it might not bee thought hee had perished vnusually. But the Lord Thomas of Woodstock (the same who was afterward Duke of Gloucester) went farther, for hee rutheth into the Chamber where the King was, and bound his "words with a terrible oath, That hee would kill any one liuing who durst lay treason to his brothers charge: neither did hee except the king himselfe. In which speeches, as piety and zeale for his brothers honor and safety were not wanting, so certainly duty to his Prince was exceedingly forgotten. (41) That

(41) That which followed, may give vs iust cause to suspect the truth of that Fryers accusation: for the Lord William la Zouch was also by the Fryer accused, of having bene the Inuenter, broacher, and prouoker of him, to set downe all that which was comprehended in the accusation; who therupon sent for Salisburi (though then very sicke of the gout) repaired thither in a horse-litter, where hee was compelled to answer toall such points as were objected, like a fclow, or a traytor standing bare-headed: but the praice, or least thought of any such matter as the Fryer affirmed against the Duke, hee confidently forswore, and was therupon acquitted and dismissed. Howbeit (saith Walsingham) La Zouch was from that time forward a professed enemy, not onely of Carmelites, but of all other orders of Fryers whatsoever. But these disgraces came vnseasonably vpon the Duke, whose head was vnseasonably full of desires, and of cares, how to atchieue to himselfe the crowne of Spain.

(42) There were then sundry incursions made by the English and Scots, each into the others country, the Earle of Northumberland being leader to the English, with little aduantage to either. But to take away the very cause of this continual had neighbourhood, or to lessen it by an established peace with France, the Duke of Lancaster layd to Callis, about the beginning of August, there to treat with the Duke of Berry, on behalfe of the young French King Charles 6. but after he had in that voyage expended (as was said) fifty thousand Marks, he brought into England nothing backe, excepte onely a truce, to continue till the first day of May next. His desire to have procured a surer peace both with the French and Scots, seemes to haue bene great, that so hee might the more freely pursue the conquest of Spain which he intended.

(43) While hee was absent in this Ambassage, there ensued the arraignment of a great favourite of the Dukes, John Northampton, alias Camber-torne, whom his aduerities by-name Camber-torne. This man is by them reported to haue exceedingly troubled the City of London, during his late Maorality there, nor lesse afterwards, for that being followed with many abusers, hee publicly disturbed Sir Nicholas Bramble his successor, (but a* bloudy minded man by report,) and wrought other miseries, till Sir Robert Knollys caused one of the busiest companions to bee drawne out of his house, and (as some say) shortned by the head. This Camber-torne was by his bouthold Clerke accused, as priuie to some praides, in prauidice as well of the King, as the City, and when sentence was to be pronounced in the Kings presence (being then with great store of his Nobles at Reading), hee durst (as is said) affirme, That such iudgement ought not to proceede against him in the absence of his Lord the Duke. This againe vnraked the burning coales of enuie, and suspicion against the said Lord Duke; and perhaps malice to the Duke procured this hatred against his favourite. Whereupon hee was confined to the Castle of Tynagel in Cornwall, and all his goods seized vpon by the Kings Seruants, whom Walsingham expresseth, by calling them after the name of those Poeticall rauenous Birds, Harpies.

(44) That here which Polydore Vergil (assigning causes to actions, not alwayes such as are, but such as seemed to him most probable, not seldom confounding and changing persons, times, names, and things) telles vs concerning a combat within lists, betwene Sir John Austrey Knight, and one Carlus hath little ground, (so farre as wee can find) in billoirie. He saith they were terribilia capita, both very wicked men, & that there was a real plot to murder the king. We can neither find the crime nor the men: there had bene a solempne combat long before betwene such a knight and one * Katrington an Esquire, in which the knight was Challenger and victor, but the crime was not treason against the kings person, nor for any thing done in his time, but in his noble Grandfathers. Neither was Austrey, interremus caput, but a valiant and loyal man of Armes. The crime which he objected to that Esquire (his kinsman) was, that for money he had traiterously given over the Castle of Saint Saviour in the Land of Conflance in Normandie, whom he had swore of vntaill and mortuall. The Esquire was vanquished in faire fight and died franck the next day. Polydore erreth therefore is ioynd with manifest wroong to the knights name, wherby wee ought to be very circumspect, for that, honour is ineluctable and defendeth to posterity. There was indeed, at the time he speaks of, another combat, fought also within lists before the king, (for Duels then were performed, not on priuate choice or quarrell, but on publicke appointment) betwene one John Welsh an Esquire of England, and one * Martileta Gentleman Nauarrie, who in reuenge against Welsh, for hauing at Cheriborough (where the said Esquire was vnder-captaine) committed (as Martileta said) adultery with his wife, accused him of high treason against the King and Reaime. But Welsh prevailed; and the Nauarrie, at his execution (for hee was drawne and hanged after hee had bene sold in battell), confessed the cause of his enill will, and the inuency of Welsh in the matter of treason.

(45) The Scots had this while by practise and money gotten the Castle of Barrack, wherof the Chifdohy belonged to the Lord Henry Percy Earle of Northumberland. The Duke of Lancaster was not asid at this, but so pursued the matter, that the Earle (as if by his negligence and prinkie the same royall Castle had bene lost) was condemned in Parliament. But the king relensed him with extension of fauour. This was a great cause of confirming the rancour already kindled in the hearts of these two principall Peeres. But the Earle to wipe away all blemishes of disgrace, encloseth the Castle with a siege both of forces and large proffers, so that after some time spent therein, he had it redelivered vpon payment of two thousand marks.

(46) The Flemings had heretofore in the fifth yere of this King, sent Ambassadors at the time of Parliament, to submit themselves and their Country to his dominion, renouncing allegiance to their naturall Lord the Earle, whom they had by force of Armes expelled, vpon pretence of oppression vsed by him, and for other causes; but because they feared not either persons sufficient, or sufficiently instructed with authority, to transact with the King in a matter of so high nature, they were commanded to returne, and fetch more ample power, and to bring certaine men of every good Towne in Flanders. Now againe, the Citizens of Ghent, though they had in battell against the French King, (who was there in person on behalfe of the Earle,) * lost twenty thousand men not long before, desired of K. Richard, that they might haue an English General to command in their warres; to whom was sent a wile and valiant Gentleman, the Lord Edward de Beaufort, who demeaned himselfe in that charge with much commendation. And when afterwards he went more abundantly and strongly to haue supported them, they suddenly turned French, shewing se newface (saith * Walsingham) vari amice, vel dominum silem deservare.

(47) The Duke of Lancaster (whole, or the like greatness may perhaps seeme more, then can stand with the narrow limits of England, which, without danger to the common wealth, can hardly afford such a proportion of estate to any Subject) was about this time informed, that the King had a purpose to arrest his person, and to trim him vpon capitall points before Sir Robert Trissil, his Chiefe Iustitiar, a man ready, (vnder the Kings protection) to deliuer in judgement without respect to Titles. The King was nourished in this deliberation by yong men, who combined against the Dukes life. This being discouraged, the Duke (a potent Prince) withdrew vpon his guard to his Castle of Pemfret in the brake and smoke divers, so that this Bravado was not only costly to the French, by reason of the charges, but hurtful in the loss of time, men, ships, and hoped glory. Such are the events of humane enterprises, where God is not pleased to give success. (15) The multitude of memorable things which present themselves in the lines of our English Monarch, is such, that if we did not vie choice, and in their relation brevity, we should not relieve our Readers of that solicitation, with which the vast volumes of former labours do oppress the memory. The Laitie, at the Parliament now holden at London, had yielded to aide the King with a Fiftieth upon condition, that the Clergie should succour him with a Tenth and an half against which usual proportion, William de Courcy Archbishop of Canterbury must first oppose; alleging that the Church ought to be free, nor in any wise to be taxed by the Laitie, and that himself would rather die then endure that the Church of England, (the liberties whereof had by so many free Parliaments on all times, and not only in the reign of the King been confirmed, should be made a bond-slave. This answer so offended the Commons, that the Knights of the Shires, and some Peers of the land, with extreme fury be-ought, that T temporalities might be taken away from Ecclesiastical persons, saying, that it was an Unchristian and an Act of Chastity so to do, thereby to humble them. Neither did they doubt, but that their petition which they had exhibited to the King would take effect. Hereupon they deligned among themselves, out of which Abbey, which should receive such a certain summe, and out of which, another, I myself (saith a Monke of Saine Albans) heard one of those Knights confidently swear, that hee would have a yearly pension of a thousand Marks out of the Temporalities belonging to that Abbey. But the King having heard both parts, commanded the Petitioners to silence, and the Pension to be razed out, saying, He would maintain the English Church in the quality of the same state or better, in which himselfe had knowne it to be when he came to the Crowne.

The Pope's

King Richard the Clergie should.

The Archbishop hereupon having consulted with the Clergie, came to the King, and declared, that hee and the Clergie had with one consent, willingly provided to supplie his Majesties occasions with a Tenth. This grant the King took so contentedly, as he openly affirmed, hee was better pleased with this free contribution of one Tenth for the present, then if hee had gotten four by compulsion.

quis made this land.

(16) Robert de Vere Earle of Oxford (a young Gentleman in speciall grace with the King) was at this Parliament created Marquis of Dublin in Ireland, which moved great despite against him, those rough times being impotent to beare the unequal advancement of favourites. Nevertheless, though the gentle King was thought herein to please his owne lustie, rather then to reward merit, yet did he so sweetly temper it, as there was no lustie, nor reason to envie to him that so place which hee took in his friends increased honour; for at the same time hee advanced two of his vnder, Thomas de Woodstocke, Earle of Buckingham to the title of Duke of Gloucester and Edmund of Langley Earle of Cambridge, hee created Duke of York, allotting severall proportions of pension to be paid out of his Exchequer. To Perce there was ancient Nobilitie to iustifie his new degree the better, but in making the Lord Chancellor Michael de la Pole Earle of Suffolk, with the yearly pension of 1000 Markes, was matter of more enuy because he was not descended of such honourable Parents: a defect (if it be a defect) which none more willingly vpbraid to men of worth, then who themselves are not alwayes the most worthy. The first raiser of this familie of De la Pole was Edward the third, who made William de la Pole, of a braue Merchant, a Knight Banneret, and gave him great possessions, in requitall of an extraordinary and voluntary loan of treasure, advanced by him to supply the King in a time of speciall necessity, when money could stand him in more need then a thousand men of Armes: no little merite in a subject, nor a slender reward of a most munificent Prince.

(17) Henry Spenser the martiall Bishop of Norwich found grace with the King at this Parliament, to bee restored to his temporalities, at the speciall suite of Thomas Arundell Bishoppe of Ely: whilst the Bishoppe of Ely thus becometh his Majesty of Grace, the said Michael de la Pole (Lord Chancellor and Earle of Suffolk) stood by, and brake out with much offence into these words, What is that my Lord which you aske of the King? Seemes it to you a small matter for him to part with that Bishoppe temporalities, when they yield to his Officers above one thousand pounds by yeere? Little neede hath the King of such Counsellors, or of such friends, as advise him to aske so greatly to his disadvantage. Whereunto the Bishop of Ely not lesse truly, then freely replied, What saith your Lordship my Lord Michael? Know that I require not of the King that which is his, but that which hee (dareing thereunto either by you, or by the Council of such as you are) withholdeth from other men, upon none of the mightiest titles, and which (as I thinke) will never doe him any good: as for you, who did you so graciously accept of a thousand markes by yeere, at such time as hee created you Earle of Suffolk? The Chancellor was he so home with this round retort, that hee neuer offered any further to crosse the restoration of the Bishops temporalities.

(18) After this the King being with his Queen at their manour of Eltham in Kent, there came thither Lez King of Armes, a Christian Prince, whom the Tartars had expelled out of his Kingdom. The presence of his negotiation was to accord the realms of England and France; that the Princes thereof might with joint forces remove the common enemy from Christendome. Therein hee could effect nothing, but his journey was not otherwise vnfraughtful to himselfe, for King Richard (a Prince to speake truly, full of honour and bounty) gave him besides a thousand pounds, in a ship of gold letters Patents also for a thousand pounds yearly pension during life.

(19) The time now was come, wherein K. Richard should see himselfe delivred of all that fear and ialousie, which the greatness of his vnde the Duke of Lancaster stirred in him. His Forces were now ready, and his Naue (increased with seven Gallies, and eighteen shippes sent out of Portugall) attended at Brissell, to transport him toward Spain, (for Castile is high Spain) the crowne whereof hee claimed in right of Constance his second wife, daughter of Dona Peter the cruel. Before hee set forth, the newes came that such English as were already in Portugall with their friends had overthrowne the Spaniards, French, and Britons, at a battell in Spain. This was spurre to quicken the Dukes enterprise, which Pope Petrus the sixth (by granting plenary remission of sinnes to all such as gave the Duke aid) did specially fauour, as against them who did partake with his enemy the Antipape; but the frequent grant of such pardon and remission, was now growne so vile and contemptible among the people, that few were found open handed to aid this Crowne. Admirall of this Fleet was Sir Thomas Percy, Sir John Holland (who had married one of the Dukes daughters afterward created Earle of Huntington) was Constable of the host, and Sir John Manners (who had to wife one of the Dukes illegitimate children) was one of his Marshalls. There were in this noble and excellently well appointed Army, the Lords Talbot, Bassett, Willoughby, Fitz-walter, Pembroke, Bradsham, Fitz-warren, warren, Beaumont, Beauchampe, the Lord Pemiers a Galsun, &c. with very many worthy knights & valiant Esquiers, and a choise number of men of Armes, Archers and other Souldiers, to the number of twenty thousand. The Duke tooke also with him his wife, the Lady Camellane, and two daughters, which hee had by her, as we relateth.

(60) It was now the month of May, when the great Duke of Lancaster coming to take leave, had of the king's gift a Diademe of gold, and his Dutcheffe of the Queene another: he also commanded the English to call, and hold his vnde for a King, and to doe him anwerable honour. But after all this, hee lay for a while so long, till his whole provisions were almost spent; at length yet, hee set forward. The first land they touched was neere to Breff in Britaine, where Sir John Rech the Gouernour against the French, complained of two Forts built about him to empach his quiet egress; whereupon the Duke of Lancaster caused them to be assaulted; so both of them being taken by surrender, were razed to the ground, though some English first lost their liues, among which, was Sir Robert Swinerton, a valiant Knight of Stafforshyre, and John de Balton a courageous Esquier of Yorkshyre, whom the sodaine ruine of a Tower (ouerturned by mining) whelmed and flew outright. Sharpened with the successe of this victorie, they commit themselves to God, and the Sea, and prosperously arrive with the whole Fleet in the Port of Calis, the Greyne, in August.

(61) The French (belike) thought England could not furnish another Army for France, as she had for Spain: whereupon there was now no false nor vain rumour spread again, that the French would besiege Calis. The King to secure that precious transmarine part of his Dominions, sent thither store of men and of all provisions. The most eminent person was Henry Lord Percy, sonne to Henry Earle of Northumberland. This was hee whom the Scots by-name Hastur, a young Gentleman, in whom (saith Walsingham) the pattern of all vertue and martiall prowesse shined: and indeed his nature did answere his by-name; for hee made such ridings into the quarters about Calis, that they could neuer with a worse neighbour. After which, when the fame went that the French king would not delay, or (as they call it) beleaguer Calis, but rather invade England, hee returned to be present where the greatest danger was expected. At this time, the English Seamen of warre, brought two French prizes to Sandwich, in which was taken a part of an huge strong Timber-wall, which the French king, preparing now for England's invasion, had caused to bee built in length three miles in height twenty foot, which had at euery twelue paces a Tower (ten foot higher) and each capable of ten men, the whole to be a defence for the French encampments against our shot, and a shelter for theirs, there was also in the same Ships the Engineer and master workman, who was an Englishman, and great quantities of powder, and store of Ordinance, together with the French Kings Master Gunner.

(62) There was in this time a great resemblance betwene England and France in the chiefe points of State. As England had Richard, so had France her Charles, both young Kings. Charles with an huge armie had prepared to invade England, but did nothing: Richard with no lesse forces entered Scotland, and did no great thing. Richard had vnckes which bore great sway in the Realme; so had Charles. Richard had his vnckle John more potent then the rest, Charles had his vnckle Lewis. John vpon his vnckles title claimeth the kingdomes of Castile and Leon, Lewis by the gift of the Queene, claimeth the Kingdomes of Naples and Sicily. Lewis went with an Army of thirty thousand horse into Italie to achieve his claime; with what force John set forth you haue heard. But Lewis died without obey-saunce, John persuaded so farre as to leaue his child by marriage. The King and great Lords of France were glad (with any charge) to enioy the absence of Lewis, and Richard and his fauourites were not sad, that the Realme was for the present rid of him.

(63) The forces of the French provided for this invasion of England, were reported in open Parliament (which the King held about Michaelmas in London) to consist of 15 Dukes, 26 Earles, two hundred Lords, and an hundred thousand souldiers, and a thousand Ships, assembled about Sluys, with full purpose to take rvenge of all the euils which the English nation had formerly wrought in France, and to destroy the English kingdome. But though these reports were not faired, (for the French attended nothing in a manner but a faire gale of winde to bring them,) yet could not the King, without Capitulations made by the Duke of Glouster, obtaine any aides of money; so that, whereas it seemed to the King, that by the Duke of Lancaster's departure, he was become more free, yet had he left behind spirits much more fierce and intractable. O deare Countrey, hadst thou not then bene apparantlie in Gods protection, (for the French hauing layd for a while till Hallowtide, and then haining it halfe-way, were beaten backe, and the voyage made vterly voyd) certainly thy ruine had then bene certaine. What shall wee thinke or say of those popular Lords, by this gentle King named (to his own shame) with power and greatness, who vnder the specious pretence of reforming abuses, did falsifie their enuie and inbred infelicy?

(64) The King tells them, that England is, as they saw, in manifest danger, and prays their succour in money: what is the answer? That the Duke of Ireland (for now the Marquesse of Dublin was made a Duke,) and Michael de la Pole (so they formerly called the Earle of Suffolk) and other must be removed. Things are badly carried at home, say they; (and they perhaps said truly,) shud where was now the care of our Countrey? God indeed turned from vs the mercilesse point of the French sword: but here began the seeds of innumerable wofull miseries, neuer to be remembered without sighes and teares.

(65) The seedes (we say) of those fearefull calamities were then first here sowne, whose sum a flourishing Winter in our age (winding neerly to haue imitated Lucan, as hee is well called our Lucan) doth not vnfortunately expresse, though hee might rather haue said he wept them, then sung them; but so to sing them, is to weep them.

*I sing the ciuill warres, tumultuous broiles, And bloody factions of a mighty Land;
Whose people hungry, proud with some spoile, Vpon themselves turne backe their conquering hand; Whole kinne their kinne, brother the brother's foile, Like Enguerran, all against like Enguerran's hand; Breues against breues, a Crowne against a Crowne, While all pretending right, all right the wrong demone.*

But Robert de Vere, saith Thomas Duke of Glouster and his party, was vnworthily created Duke of Ireland, and De la Pole the Lord Chancellor seemed to the onely great Lords (for so they would seeme) to be li the Kings debt. Strange colours for Subjects to capitulate with their King vpon giuing their ioynt aides against the common enemy, now ready with one destruction to ouerwhelme them all. The time they tooke to worke this pretended amendment in state, was not well fitted. It shewoured somewhat else besides the loue of common-weale. Priuate ambitions and passions could not bee waiting in such oppositions. This is some mens judgement, let the sequels shew how ill.

(66) There were called vp at this Parliament for defence of the Realme innumerable people out of all Shires, which forces lay about London within twenty tie miles round, and had no pay but lived vpon spoile. These at last were licensed to depart to be ready at warning. There was also the Lord Chancellor accused, of (we wot not what) petty crimes (for the shuffles of following ages haue made them seeme so,) as for paying to the Kings Coffers but *twentie markes yearly, for a fee-farme, whereof himselfe received threethree and ten, and some such other. To pacifie these great Lords, the Lord Chancellor is disgraced, and the Earle taken from him, against the Kings will, and giuen to Thomas Arundell Bishop of Ely, and then the houses of Parliament yielded to giue halfe a Tenth, and halfe a Fifteenth, but vpon condition that it should be disposed of, as the Lords thought fit, for defence of the Realme. The money was thereupon deliuered to the Earle of Arundell to furnish himselfe for that purpose to the Sea. But to rid the Duke of Ireland out of the realme, the Lords were willing he should haue those thirte thousand markes, for which the heires of Charles de Blois, (who heretofore challenged Arlaine) were transfixed to the French, vpon condition that the said Duke should passe into Ireland before the next Easter.

(67) The Parliament was no sooner dissolved, but the King recalls the Earle of Stafford to the Court, keeps both him, the Duke of Ireland and Alexander Nevile Archbishop of York about his person, in greater fauour then before. Insomuch that at Christmas he made De-la-Pole to sit at his owne Table not in the usual garment of a Peer, but Princely robed. Surely therein not well, for some of those great Lords, (though not by so sweet meanes as were fit) did desire to waken him out of Courtly drowsinesse, and (as men that knew not what peace meant) to put him into actions worthy of his name and greatness. These other persons were not so friended, or qualified, that they could support a King against an vniuersal mislike. But the King vpon a stomacke doth it, so that (saith Walsingham) there first grew the Kings hatred against the Peeres, that from thence forth he neuer, as it is said, regarded them but fauorably. So much more dangerous sometimes is the remedy then a very greenish maladie.

(68) King Richard (whose age and place stood in need of wiser instructions) oot thus contented to haue whetted the displeasures of the greater Peeres, as if he had said to himselfe, Rumpator quiguis rumpator insidias: in further drame, as was laid, to plot the death of his vnkle, Thomas of Woodstocke Duke of Gloster, and other enemies of De-la-pole, who together being inuited to a feast (by the bloody deuill of Sir Nicholas Bramble late Lord Maior of London) should together haue perished. But the present Lord Maior Nicholas Exton (whom the conspirators would haue had their Partaker, if it may be believed) honestly refused to assent. The Lords hereupon hazing admonition, refrained to come.

(69) The persons which were in the publike enuie for their once-swaying grace with the King, were (as you haue heard) Robert de Vere Duke of Ireland, Michael de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, the said Archbishop, Sir Simon Burley Knight, and Sir Richard Storey: These men bearing that Richard Earle of Arundell and Thomas Earle of Nottingham, Marshall of England, * had encountered with a great Fleet of Frenchmen, Flemings, Normans, and Spaniards, and taken aboue one hundredth saile of ships, and in them nineteene thousand tunnes of wine, depaured the victorie, saying, that the vanquished were but Merchants, whose lones had bene more profitable to our Countrey, then so to flure them to inexorable hatred. But these (saith *one) who thus iudged, were either the Knights of Venus then Bellona, sister for a Cannep then a Cannep, for language then a lance, as they who were awake to discourse of martiall affairs, but drowsie when they should come to doe them. Such therefore conversing with the King (not * without suspicion of frowle familiaritie) neuer took care to put into his mind any matter which becomed so potent a Prince, wee say not (quoth our Author) for concerning the use of Armes, but not even concerning those very recreations, which must of all become great faults, as hunting, bowling, and the like. But the Earles did more then meddle with Merchants (who yet were able to make dangerous resistances) for they landed at Breisl in Britaine, and with great difficulty deliuered it againe from so bad neighbours as the two wooden Forts neerly build, where the other had stood, one of which they fired, and the other they mansd with the English Garrison of Breisl. Then stuffing it with all sorts of provisions for a yeere, and furnishing the wants of the Souldiers with all necessaries, they returned, hauing worthily wonne the love and praises of the people. Which, as they were also due to them from the king, yet comming to his prefe nce, they (by their men of ill offices) had so cold entertainment, as they effluently withdrew themselves from Court to liue quietly vpon their owne at home. After them the brave young Henry Hotspur, Lord Percy was sent (all provided) to the Sea; neerethelfe he venerated, and returned (when his commission was expired) with honour.

(70) One thing done by the Duke of Ireland was iudicial fall of wickednesse and indignitie. For he hauing to wife, a young, faire, and ooble Ladie, and the Kings neere kinswoman, (for shee was Grandchild to king Edward by his daughter Isabel.) did put her away and took one of Queene Annes women, a Bohemian * of base birth, called in her mother tongue Lanercane. This intolerable villanie offered to the blood royall, King Richard did not encounter; neither had the power, sometimes, who deemed that by witchcrafts and forceries (practised vpon him by one of the Dukes followers) his iudgement was so seduced and captiuated, that he could not see what was honest or fit to doe. But where Primers are willfull or foolish, and their fauourites flatterers or time-servers, there needs no other enchantments to infatuate, yea and ruine the greatest Monarch.

(71) The Duke of Gloster took the matter more to heart, resolving to be reuenged for the infamy and confusion, which was brought thereby vpon his noble kinswoman. Meane while the king, as if he meant to conduct his deare friend, the Duke toward Ireland, went with him into Wales. There the King depuitch with him, the Earle of Suffolke, Sir Robert Tresilian and others, (who were equally affrayd of the Lords) how to destroy the Duke of Gloster, the Earles of Arundell, Warwicke, Dorset, Nottingham, and such others, as from whom they thought fite to be cleare. Much time being trifled thus away in Wales, they come together (as if the Dukes appointed voyage, or rather banishment into Ireland, were quite forgotten) to the Castle of Nottingham, there more freely to deliberate. A fearful estate of a Monarchie. Here among a few, generally ill beloued, and ill aduised, and ill provided; for their while strength was the king, and these consultations made that force feeble both to him and them: the Lords, potent, martiall, rich, and popular, heat Nottingham, they not neere him: but a broad farre-off, the Duke of Lancaster with the flower of the English forces, and mighty neighbours watching for the ruine of all. The countie agreed vpon by the King and that ill-chosen Senate, was first to haue the opinion of all the Chief Lawyers concerning certain Articles of Treason, within whose nets and spridges they presumed the reforming Lords were; and if the Lawyers (who seldom faile Princes in such turnes,) did conclude, that those Articles contained treasonable matter, then vnder a shew of iustice they should be proceeded against accordingly. Their Lawyers (who were the very men, which in the last iudicious Parliament, gave aduise to the Lords to doe as they did) now meeting, were demanded, whether by the law less of the land, the King might not dissolve the Decrees of the last Parliament: they jointly answered; he might, because he was above the law: confessing that themselves had in that Parliament decreed many things, and given their judgement, that all was according to law, which now they acknowledged to be altogether unlawful. The King then enforced, appointeth a great Council to be holden at Nottingham, and sent for certain Londoners, some of whom (such as were beholding to the King for mercenial causes of attendance, to be there empelled for Quests of Inquire. The Sheriffs of Shires (being questioned) denied, that they could raise any competent forces against the Lords, their whole Country was to be added in their favour: & being farther willed to suffer no Knights to be chosen for the Shires, but such as the King & his Council should name, they answered, that the election belonged to the Commons who favoured the Lords in all.

(72) Upon the 25. of August there met before the King at Nottingham these Lawyers, Robert Trilham his chief Advocate, Robert Belknap chief Justiciar of the common Pleas, John Holt, Roger Stilethorpe, & William Turpin Justiciars in the same Court, and John Lokton the Kings Serjeant at Law: all which being upon their allegiance charged to deliver their opinions, whether such Articles as were there in the Kings behalf propounded (which Articles comprehended all the points of advantage taken against the proceedings of the last Parliament, and the displacing of the Lord Chancellor, Michael de Pale) contained matter of treason, they all of them answered affirmatively and subscribed, which afterward cost them dear. Judge Belknap foresaw the danger, and therefore was very unwilling to put his seal to the answers; saying; there wanted but a hurdle, a horse, and a halter, to carry him where he might suffer the death he deserved; for if I had not done this (quoth he) I should have died for it, and because I thus do it, I deserve death for betraying the Lords. The King in the mean space privates himself of people to fight, if need required.

(73) The Duke of Gloucester (faded with these news, sent the Bishoppe of London to bring his purgation upon oath to the King, who inclining to credit the same, was in an evil howe diverted by De la Pale. The Duke makes his and their common danger known to the Earles of Arundel, Warwick, & Derby, eldest sonne to the Duke of Lancaster. They secretly gather forces, that waited they might present their griefes to the King, who to keep them from joining, sends the Earle of Northumberland to arrest the Earle of Arundel at Reigate in Surrey, where hee abode. But by reason of Arundels power, it was too dangerous a worke. Northumberland returns, and Arundel (admonished by the Duke of Gloucester of his farther perill) escapeth in post to Haringey, where the Duke and Earle of Warwick had store of people.

(74) As yet no blood was drawne. Peaceable men procured that the Lords should repaire safe to Westminster, and there be heard. Thither approaching they are advertised by the Bishop of Ebor and others (who had sworn on the Kings behalf for good dealing to be used during the Interim) that, as the Menes by Charing Crosse, a thousand armed men (which without the Kings priuety Sir Thomas Trivet and Sir Nicholas Bromfild Knights were reported to haue laid for their destruction) attended in ambush. The King swears his innocency, but the Lords come strong and trust no longer. The King royally adorned keeps state in Westminster Hall with manie his Prelates and Peeres about him; the Lords present themselves upon their knees and being required by the Bishop of Ebor the Lord Chancellor (for the Lord De la Pale was dead that place againe) why they were in warlike manner assembled at Haringey Park, contrary to the lawes, their joint answer was, That they were assembled for the good of the King and kingdome, and to weed from about him such Traitors as hee continually held with him. The traitors they named to bee, Robert de Vere, Duke of Ireland, Alexander Nevile Archbishoppe of Yorke, Michael de la Pole Earle of Suffolk, Sir Robert Trilham that false Justiciar (quoth they) and Sir Nicholas Bromfild that false Knight of London. To prove them such, they threw downe their gloves, as gages of challenge for a triall to bee had by the sword. The King hereunto replied, as knowing that they were all hidden out of the way: This shall not bee done, sa, but at the next Parliament (which shall be the morrow after Candlemas) all parties shall receive according as they deserve. And now (saith hee) to you my Lords; how or by what authority durst you presume to take force against mee in this land? did you thinke to have terrified mee by such your presumption? have not I men of Armes, what if it pleased me) could smother and kill you like Canke? Certainly in this respect I esteeme of you all no more then as of the basest scallions in my Kitchens. Having said these, and many the like high words, heeooke vp his vncle the Duke from the ground, where all this while hee knelt, and bad all the other rise. The rest of the conference was calme, and the whole deferred till the next Parliament, then shoud to be holden at Westminster. In the mean time (that the world might see how little able the King was to equall his words with deedes) a Proclamation is forth, in which the King cleareth the Lords (before any trial) of treason objected, and names those persons for whom accusers, whom the Lords had before named.

(75) The factious Lords nevertheless thought not good to sever themselves, but to keepe together for feare of the world, which fell out to their advantage for the Duke of Ireland (with the Kings priuety) had gathered a power in Wales and Cheshire, which they intercepting nere to Burford and Shobles, slew Sir William Malmeze leader of the Cheshire men, and some others, and made the Duke to flee in great feare. Among the spoiles of the Dukes carriages there were found (as the Duell would haue it) certaine letters of the King to the said Duke of Ireland, by which their counsels were plainly discovered. The Lords hereupon march with speede vp to London, having an Armie of about forty thousand men. The King flirts himselfe vp in the Tower, but is glad before long to admit them to his presence. There they (unreuerently enough) objected mutability to him and his vnderhand workings; they objected also, that hee had secretly practised to flee with the Duke of Ireland into France, and to deliver vp to the French Kings possession Calis, & such pieces as the Crowne of England held in those partes prone which dishonourable as, they (as some write) produced the French packers intercepted. This wrung teares (perhaps of dissimulation) from the King, and hee yielded to come to Westminster upon the next day, there to heare and determine further. The King in signe of amitie layed his Cosen the Earle of Derby (the same who afterward dechored him) to supper. O where was the courage of a King! The Lords in their owne quarrell could draw vp fottie thousand men; but in the generall danger of the Realme, when the Commons were vp, and the French hanging over their heads, with no lesse hatred then preparations, no such numbers appeared. Was it for their honour or praise, that their most rightfull King should by their violence be driven to confit upon flight out of his proper Kingdome? The Crie of London was alioin no little perill at this present by their seccesse, which drawne by inst feare was contented to open the gates and harbour the Lords and their partakers. These Lords, who so often are called here the Lords, are named in our Statute bookes to be but these five; The Duke of Gloucester, the Earles of Derby, Arundel, Warwick, and Marshal.

repair to Westminster. This being signified to the Kings Lords (for so they might be called, as being more Masters then the King) they labour not, by humble words, and dutious requests to persuade the use or necessity of his presence at that place, but contrarie to their allegiance, and all good order send him word, That if he came not quickly according to appointment, they would choose them another King, who both would and should obey the counsell of the Peeres. They had him indeed amongst them, whom (belike) they even then meant to have surrogated, that is to say, the before said Earle of Derby, heire to the D. of Lancaster. The Lords certainly had so behaved themselves towards the King, that they well saw they must be masters of his person and power, or themselves in the end perill.

Persons remembered from about the King.

(77) The King (after a preposterous and inverted manner) attending his Subjects pleasures at Westminster, heavily and unwillingly is drawn to disclaime Alexander Becon Archbishoppe of Yorke, the Bishops of Durham and Gloucester, the Lords Souch and Beaumont with sundry others. Neither was the Male-ice onely suspected to these curious pruners, the Lady Pembris, and other Ladies were also removed, and put under baile to answer such things as should be objected. Sir Simon Burley, Sir William Manners, Sir John Beauchamp of Holt, Sir John Salisbury, Sir Thomas Trivet, Sir James Berney, Sir Nicholas Dagworth and Sir Nicholas Bramore knights with certayne Clerks were apprehended, and kept in strait prison, to answer such accusations (what if mere calumniation?) as in the next Parliament at Westminster should be objected.

Isidore Langston.

(78) The Parliament began at Candlemas, where the King was willingly present: The first day of the Session, all the Judges Justices, Barons, Care, Holt, Burgh, and Lection were seated as they sit in Judgement on the Bench, and most of them sent to the Tower. The cause alleged was, that having first overruled them with their counsels and directions, which they assured them to be according to law, they afterward at Nottingham gave contrary judgement to that which themselves had fore-declared. Trysion the chief Iustice prevented them by flight, but being apprehended, and brought to the Parliament in the forenoone, had sentence to be drawne to Tyburn in the afternoone, and there to have his throat cut which was done accordingly.

The Duke of new Troy at London.

Sir Nicholas Bramore turne was next. This Bramore (with Walsingham) was said to have imagined to be made Duke of new Troy (the old supposed name of London) by murdering thousands of such Citizens, (whose names hee had listed for that purpose) as were suspected of love to the King. Then Sir John Salisbury, and Sir James Berney two young Knights, Sir John Beauchamp of Holt, Steward of the Household to the King, and John Blake Elquier, were likewise sacrificed to revenge. Sir Simon Burley onely had the worshipping to have but his head stricken off. Loe the noble respect which the gentle Lords had to justice and amendment. This was no age (wee see) for a weak or slothfull Prince to sit in quiet; for now the people, and then the Peeres, foule and trample the regal authority under foote: the Duke of Ireland, the Archbishoppe of Yorke, the Earle of Suffolke and others, had their charters confiscated to the Kings use by Act of Parliament, as in the booke of Statutes may be seene, together with a great part of the whole proceedings.

* At the age of 16

(79) These troubles boiling and burning within, in the Bowels of the State, the Scots abroad had opportunity to invade the North of England, under the conduct of Sir William Douglas, a noble young knight, a parallel and rival in the honour of Armes to Henry Hotspur, Lord Percy, whom Hotspur fighting hand to hand slew in battell: but the Earle of Dunbar coming with an exchequer number of Scots, tooke Hotspur and his brother prisoners, killing many English, not without such losse to themselves, that they forthwith returned.

(80) But these ynnighbourly hostilities soone after found some force, there being a meeting at Calis betweene the English and French, about establishing a peace: and albeit, because the French would have the Scot and Spaniard included therein, the conclusion was deferred, yet shortly a fier it was resolved upon for three yeeres, the Scots being comprehended therein.

(81) King Richard (being now of age) declares himselfe free to governe of himselfe, without either coilement, or help of any other, then such as hee selected to that place, and in token that he was at liberty, he takes the Great Seale of England from Thomas Arundel Archbishop of Yorke, (Alexander Nevill being attained and fled) and departs out of the Councell Chamber. After a while hee returns, and gives it backe to William Wickham (the renowned Bishoppe of Winchester) who was unwilling to have accepted the same. Hee also puts out sundrie Officers, labouring such others as best liked him. From the Councell Table hee removed his vnde Thomas of Woodstock Duke of Gloucester, the Earle of Warwick, and others; which (as it might) encouraged the Dukes enemies about the King, to doe null offices betweene them. Yet the king did not presently credit what was whispered into his eare, concerning a purpose suggested to be in the Duke, to raise forces againe; but acquainting him withall, was satisfied. Nevertheless, he would not suffer the Duke to pursue an orderly or any revenge upon the Authors, whom indeed it had beene welcome to have punished in an exemplary manner.

(82) Michael de la Pole late Earle of Suffolke (whom the popular Lord had made most odious to the English) died at Paris in exile, bequeathing such goods as hee had there to Robert Duke of Ireland, who also breathed out his griefs in banishment, and died at last in Strait.

(83) The Duke of Lancaster the meane while, returns into Gasconne out of Spain, and not long after into England. The successe of that voyage (being made to claime the Crowne of Castile and León) was briefly this. John King of Castile alleged that Constance the Dukes wife was not right here, but he. For, albeit the Lady Constance was eldest daughter and heire to Peter sonne of Affonso, whose father Fernand the fourth was sonne of Sanches the fourth, and he sonne of Affonso the tenth, all Kings of Spain successively yet, that neither Constance, Peter, Affonso, Fernand, nor Sanches had the right. His reason was; for that Affonso the tenth, (choseu Emperour of Almaine) bad, before he begot the said Sanches, an elder sonne called Ferdinand de la Cerda, who married Blanch the daughter of Saint Lewis King of France, from whom descended Affonso de la Cerda (who entailed himselfe King, but died without issue) and Fernand, who had a daughter married to John, sonne of the Infiant of Portugall, Ennaud, mother to the Lady Isabe, wife of King Henry the second, father of John King of Castile descendant.

(84) This Apologie made by the Castilian, would not serve; for kingdomes are not vied to be pleaded for by Blood and Ancestors: The English and Portugall joine their forces. To the Duke (by reason of his wises preference,) made did voluntarily submit themselves; all did not, for Dan * Alvarez de Peres on the behalfe of his Lord, the King of Spain, offered to stoppe the Duke in his march to Burgos, and was overthrowne. Other adventures that were afforded, but sicknesse hapning in the English Armie, consumed many of the principall, and among them the Lord Fitzwater, with other Lords, Knights, Esquires, and men of armes, almost three hundred. Moreover the penurie was such, that sundrie rooted to the enemy to get reliefe, which being a feene of the King of Portugall, he told the Duke he would set upon them as Enemies, but hee did no, for that hee knew they did it onely for lacke of food. Thus having said, he held downe his head as he late on horsebacke, and wept most bitterly, secretly pouring forth his prayers to almighty God, and most humbly beseeching mercy. From which time forward his affairs in Spain succeeded happily.

(85) The warres had bene * sharpe and tedious, but the end acceptable. For Don Juan king of Castile, a Prince of no evil conscience, seeing the right which the Duke of Lancaster vrged, and foreseeing what calamities might happen hereafter, if (as was feared the French should match with him, fought and obtained a firme peace. The Principall conditions were: That the Lord Henry, his sonne and heire, should marry the Lady Katherine, daughter and heire to the Duke and Countesse his wife; That the Lord Henry (during his fathers life) should be called Prince of Asturias, and Katherine his wife Princessse; That * for default of issue betwene the young Princely couple, the Crowne should come to the Lord Edward Duke of York, who had married the other daughter of King Peter. That the king of Spain should lade * eight Cares with wedges of gold for the Duke, or (as some write) pay two hundred thousand nobles, toward the defrayment of the Dukes boage charges; That finallye he should give sufficient Caution for an Annuitie of ten thousand pounds, during the lives of the said Duke and Dutchesse, to be duly paid to their wives at the City of Bayon in Gasconie.

(86) The King, at such time as the Duke of Lancaster returned, was at Reading, whither he had commanded the Peeres to repaire. To that meeting the Duke makes hast, aswell to present his dutie to his Sovereign, as to be an anchor of love and peace betwene the king and Lords, against some of whom the King was not thought to be verie favourably disposed. Which he graciously effected, as seeming to addit his mind to offices of piety and publike benefite. Certainly the wisdom and moderation of the Duke of York his brother, were such, in all the late, and other tumults, that he is not so much as once named among the factions; which Christian spirit if it had reigned in all therest, England had never bene polluted with such inhumane bloodshed of her noblest Children; neither had the goodlie fabricke of state, laden with innumerable trophies,aine vnder that most hideous Chaos, which succeeding ages law and lighted for.

(87) The King vpon the Duke of Lancasters returne, whether he felt the keeping of Aquitaine an unprofitable burthen, or the absence of his vncke the Duke, a thing worthe to be purchased at any rate, certaine it is, that in a Parliament held at London, he vested in him that famous Duchy, by deliuering the Cap of State, and Ducal Rod; whether hee shortly went to take possession. His Counte, Henrie of Balliolbrake Earle of Derby, loath to spend his houres in sloth, but desirous to pursue renouwe by martiall Acts in forreine parts, failed ower to the warres in Prussia, where in sundry enterprizes against the Lithuanians, he was greathonor, which, by comparison of King Richards Calmes, prepared a way for him in the Englishes affections, to points more eminent.

(88) The Pope now vnderstood, that the English State began againe to be sensible of Romish encroachments, and as in a * former Parliament they had enacted against all Collations of Bishoppicks and dignities by the Pope, with banishment to all which did accept such Collations, and death to all that brought in any excommunications from the Pope, to hinder the execution of that Act; so in this last Parliament, * another severe Act was made, against such as went to the Pope to procure any such provisions. A Proclamation also was made at London, * that all beneficed men then being in the Court of Rome, should retorne by a day prefixed, or lose all their livinges. The Pope himselfe (Guth walsingham) troubled with * so great a thunder.

clap, sent with all speed into England, to perwade the King, that such Statutes as had bene thus made in their preiudice, who followed the Court of Rome, and such other clausies as tended to the damage of that See, should be made void; whereto the Kings answer was, that the Pope Nuncio must expect till the next Parliament. At which Parliament the King, as also the Duke of Lancaster, seemed to haue some respect to the Pope, (whose messenger were their Presence) but the * Knights of the house would not in any wise giue their consents, that such Rome-gadders should without due punishment pursue their wanted course, longer then till the next Parliament. To furnish the Duke of Lancaster into France, for treatie of a peace, and vpon condition that the King should that yere invade Scotland, large contributions were there made, both by Clergy and Laity. Hereupon the Lord * Henry Percy, Hotspur (who had redeemed himself) was called from his charge at Calis, and made Warden of the Marches against Scotland; Thomas Mowbray Earle of Nottingham succeeding in the Captaineip of Calis. The Dukes chargefull employment in France bare no other flower, then a yeres short truce.

(89) The Kings wants still encreasing with his implemments, the Londoners (carried away with euill counsell) did a thing most vnworthy of their Citie and themselves, and it might to them haue proved as hurtfull, as it was vnworthy, as such time as the King * desired thelone but of one thousand pounds: which was not onely charitably denied, but a certaine Lombard, honestly offering to lend the same, was badly vied, beaten, and almost slain. Their liberties for that and other disorders are seized and their proper Magistracy dissolved, (Guardians being giuen them, first Sir Edward Dallingway, then Sir Baldwin Radingway) and their Maior, and some chiefe Citizens layed in prisons farre off from London. The punishment brought the fowlenesse of their errors to their sight, but by the Duke of * Gloesters intercessions (who did not vnwillingly lay hold vpon such occasions of popularity) the king and Queene are wonne to enter the City, which gaue them triumphall entertainment. The sea is not sodainly calmed after a tempest, neither a Princes anger. By degrees yet, and not without deare repentance, they were at last restored to their former condition in all points.

(90) The king declaring his purpose to crosse into Ireland, had an aide of money conditionally granted: foure yeres truce by the trauaile of the two Dukes of Lancaster and Gloester being concluded in France. This yere was farther notable for many great Funerals. Countesse Dutchesse of Aquitaine and Lancaster, a Lady of great Innocency and deuotion: the Countesse of Derby her daughter in law, Isobel the Dutchesse of Turke, and a Lady noted for too great a finenesse and delicacy, yet at her death shewing much repentance and sorrow for her loue to those peisilient vanities, left this present life. But all the griefe for their deaths did in no sort equal that of the kings, for the losse of his owne Queene Anne, which about the same time hapned at Sherburne in Surrey, whom he loued euen to a kind of madness: but Ladies onely died not; for Sir John Hawkwood, whose cheualrie had made him renowned ouer the Christian world, did in this yere depart an aged man out of this world in Florence, where his ashes remaine honoured at this present with a stately Tombe, and the statue of a Man at Armes, erected by the grauitude of that State and City, which chiefly by his conduct, courage and valour (to this day admired amongst them) was preferred. But the Duke of Lancaster having all things ready, sets sail to Burdeaux, there, with the consent of the State to take possession of his lately granted Duchie.

(91) The King doth the like for Ireland; where that sort of the Irish which are called the wild, had greatly infected the English Pale, and other good Subjects there, to the great damage of the Crown of England. In the times of Edward the third, Ireland yielded to the Kings coffers thirty thousand pounds yearly, but now things were so grown out of order, that it cost the King thirty thousand Marks by yeere. To reduce the rebellious, his life conducts thither an Armie, attended upon by the Duke of Gloucester, the Earles of March, Nottingham and Rutland, all the Irish being commanded to aid out of England. The terror of the preparation, & shining presence of a King (which above all worldly things is pleasant to the Irish) had such effects that sundry great men were compelled to submit themselves. To supply the Kings wants, grown in the Irish expedition, Edward D. of York, the Kings vncle, and Cuyler or Warden of England, called a Parliament at London (whither the Duke of Gloucester repaired to declare the Kings wants) and hath contributions granted. Nevertheless, so strong a party against the Clergy, & Fryars abuses of those times discovered it self therein, that the Archbishop of York, the Bishop of London, and others, preit over Sea to the King at Dublin, beseeching him to returne, the sooner to repress the Lollards (so called they the embracers of Wickliffes doctrine) and their fauourers, who sought not onely (as they vntuly pretended) to wring away all the possessions of the Church, but that which was worse, to abrogate and destroy all ecclesiasticall constitutions, whereas they aimed onely at the redresse of exorbitancy in the Papal Clergy. The King hereupon returnes: by whole arrival and authority, those consultations of the Laity were laid downe. Sir Richard Storie a servant of his had been forward against the Prelates: of him therefore hee takes an oath upon the holy Gospell, that he should not hold such opinions any longer. The Knight takes that oath, and we (saith the King) doe sweare, that if thou dost break it, thou shalt die a most shamefull death. The rest hearing the Lion roare so terribly, drew in their horses, and would be seen no more.

(92) The King caused the body of the late Duke of Ireland to bee brought into England. His exceeding loue to him was such, that he commanded the Cyprusse chest wherein his body lay embalmed, to be opened, that hee might see, view, handle, and openly expresse his affection. The dead remains of that noble young Gentleman, (by his birthright Earle of Oxford, and by race a Vere) were buried at the Priore of Cole in Essex, there being present the King himselfe, the Countesse Dowager of Oxford, the Dukes mother, the Archbishops of Cantuarbie with many Bishops, Abbots, and religious persons, but few of the Lords, for they had not as yet digested the hate they bare him.

(93) The Duke of Lancaster was this while in Aquitaine, where he had sought to winne the people with incredible largesse, to accept of his Sovereignty, according to the tenor of King Richards grant. Little did he then thinke, that within lesse then sixe score and three yeeres after, an Ambassadors of King Henry the 8. should write thus of Burdeaux it selfe, the Capitall City of Gasaigne and Guien: Anglorum nulla feri vestigia remanent, &c. There are (saith) that learned Gentleman) scarce any foot-prints of the Englishmen remaining. In the Churches, and other places newly refurnished and redified, such Armoies of the English as had, were utterly blotted and defaced: yet in the Church of the Fryers Preachers, the Armoies of the Duke of Lancaster stand entire in a Glass window, and in the eldest wall of the City those also of England, though consumed in a manner with age: The Lawes, Statutes and Ordinances which were made by the English, are notwithstanding observed at this day. But the Dukes eye could not looke so farre into the times to come. Nevertheless wee that see these things must confesse, that the best kingdome vnder heauen is not so worth the getting, as that with the willfull contempt of God and conscience any man should seeke to purchase it.

(94) But while the Duke was thus busied in Courting the Gasaignes good will, who had sent into England, to seeke causes why they should not returne to the Duke, (and yet were wrought at last to the point of yielding, hee receives a commandement from King Richard to returne, that hee might goe with him into France; which he obeyed. The King keeping his at Lawley in Hartfordshire, the Duke was there entertained with more honour (as it was thought) then loue. Being licensed to depart for a time, he repaired to Lonsme, where he a widower, married his old loue the Lady Katherine Swinford, now a widow. Mended wonder at it, but hee therein obeyed the remost of a Christian conscience, without respect to his owne vnequall greatnes; for having had sundry Children by her in his former wises time, hee made her and them now the only sufficient amends, which the law of God or man enioineth. And farther in a Parliament held the yeere following, the Duke procured an Act to passe, by which, such children as hee formerly had by his new Dutchesse, were legitimated; and intimated them Bonas, being foure of them, John, Thomas, Henrie, Iane, the second of which was by the Kings bounty created Earle of Sommerfet.

(95) The King, being specially accompanied with those his vncies of Lancaster and Gloucester, at a most sumptuous and chargefull enteruie between him and Charles King of France, in the parts of Calis and Guyen, espoused the Lady Isabella, daughter of the said Charles. At the delivery of her, King Richard, in the presence of all the greatest Princes, Peeres, and Ladies of either nation, gave the King his father in law great thanks for a gift so noble and acceptable, adding, hee tooke her vpon the conditions made betweene the two nations, so the intent that liuing in peace and rest, they might attaine to the establishment of a perpetual amitie, for avoyding the effusion of Christian blood, which would in likelihood haue followed, had not at that time amitie bene contracted betweene them. The young Lady was not above seven or eight yeeres old, but the truce was taken for thirty yeeres. Her person therefore was committed to the Dutchesse of Lancaster and Gloucester, and other great Ladies, who conducted her to Calis. From whence, after a short stay, the King, his young Queene (with whom hee had great riches) and all the glorious companie came over into England. Their persons arrived safe, but the Kings gorgeous Pavilions, and a great part of his stuffe was cast away by tempest in the transportation. This iourney (besides his losses at Sea) cost the King above forty thousand marks.

(96) The outward felicity of England seemed at this time verie great, and the rather seemed so, because it was likelie to continue. In the Duke of Gloucesters peris that bright prosperitie was first overshadowed. He, for fearfullum & precipitum ingenij (as a Flyder censures him) a most fierce man, and of an headling wit, thinking those times, wherein hee had mastered the King, were nothing changed, though the King was above thirty yeeres old, forsooke noe roughly, not so much to admonish, as to checke and schoole his Sovereigne. The peate with France displeased him, that therefore hee calumniates. The King had reformed Brest in Brittain to the Duke, vpon reembracements of the money lent; he tels the King that hee should first conquere a Towne, before hee parted with any; yet the King answers, that hee could not in conscience detain the same, now that the Duke had repaid his loane. There were other things which could not so well be answered. For a vaine rumor * that he should be chosen Emperor, put him belike into such a vaine of spending, as carried a proportion with that maichly his coffers in all short time founding like empty Caskie, there was no great monied man in whole debt he was not, nor any in a manner to meane to whom hee was not barthenous.

(97) The King had heretofore complained of this vice to the Earle of Saint Paul a Frenchman, (then in England,) whose iudgement was, that such infolency was to be reueged; but complaining to his other vncles of Lancaster and Torke, they wisely aduised the King, not to regard his words but his heart, which he and they knew sincere vnto him. Neuerthelesse, partly to weaken the intollerable humor of their brother, who like a constant Admirer of his owne wises, thought nothing well done, but what himselfe either did or directed, and partly to auoid the scandall of the Kings bad courtes, they withdraw their preferences from the Court. The King notwithstanding is the same man still, as the Duke of Gloester thinks, wherefore, he breakes his minde to such as he durst trust. Arundell in Suffex is appointed the Constable-place, where he, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Earles of Arundell, Warwicke, Marshall and others, take an Oath of Secrecy, and conclude to raise a power to remove the Dukes of Lancaster and Torke, and such other as they thought beill from about the King, so to enact a reformation.

(98) They are charged by some to have plotted the imprisonment of the King and Dukes, and the death of all other Councillours: which, howsoever it was perhaps no part of their intention, might yet have been a necessary consequent. The blunting Duke had breathed out dangerous words, as, 'that he would put the King (of whole courage he spake contemptible) into some prison there to spend his daies in ease and peace, as himselfe thought best. His brethren hearing herof, brotherlie admonish him to beware; but, as it seemes, they found him deafe on that side. This though some of the late Authors write, yet there are both *old and *new, who mention no such matter, but the contrary, not obscurely teaching vs, that the Dukes ruine was but an effect of old malignities.

(99) Thomas Mowbray Earle of Nottingham and Matthail, a party in the reported plot, though some in law to the Earle of Arundell, reueileth the same to the King. The Duke of Gloester is hereupon surprized by Mowbray * (lying in wait in the woods where hee was to passe) sent to Calis (where Nottingham was Captaine) and there imprisoned; the Earles of Arundell and Warwicke, the Lord John Cobham, and Sir John Cheiney, are arrested. Proclamation is then made that they were not committed for any old matters, but for heinous things newly contriued, as in the next Parliament should be made manifest; though the event (as Walsingham* truly faith) declared the contrary. But the Duke of Gloester, and the two said Earles are ended at Nottingham. The King to maintain the accusation of treason objected, had (as some say) libornd Edward Earle of Arundell, Thomas Earle Marshall, Thomas Holland Earle of Kent, John Holland Earle of Huntington, Thomas Beauchamp Earle of Somerset, John Montacute Earle of Salisbury, Thomas Lord Spencer and Sir William Scrope Lord Chamberlaine.

(100) In September begins the Parliament at London, where the king had a great guard of Cheshire men to secure his person, and the Lords attended also not without sufficient numbers. The Kings chiefe Agents were Sir John Baskin, Sir William Bagard, and Sir Henry Grene knights. In the first act (after the liberties of the Church and people confirmed,) we find these * words. The Commons of the Parliament have shewed to our Sovereign Lord the King, how in the Parliament holden at Westminster, the first day of October, in the tenth yere of his reigens. Thomas Duke of Gloester, and Richard Earle of Arundell, trait-ours to the King and his Realme and his people, by false imagination and compassing caused a Commission* to be made, &c. and that the said Duke of Gloester, and Earle of Arundell, did sende great man and Peere of the Realme in message to our Lord the King, wthin their part said, that if he would graunt and assent to the said Commission, HERE SHOULD BE IN GREAT PERIL OF HIS LIFE: and so, as well the said Commission, as the said Statute touching the said Commission, were made by contriuing, &c. Wherefore the Commons pray their Sovereigne Lord the King, that the said Commission &c. be vnterly annulled, as a thing done TRAITEROUSLY, &c.

(101) The sanctuary of former lawes, and all particular Charters of pardon being now taken away from the Duke, Earle, and others, they lay open to manifest ruine. The Duke of Lancaster late in judgement as High Steward upon Richard Earle of Arundell, where, for no other but for the old attempts, (though the other accusations seeme to have been auerred by the eight Appellants by which, as yehave heard, so many were displaced and put to death, hee araigned him to die that foule death of a common Traitor: but the King iustified himselfe with onely his head, which was as one stroke taken at Tower-hill. *T*hus he was a traitour either in word or deede, he utterly did deny, and died on that demill. The counte- nance of his Earles carriage aswell at his arraignment, passage, and execution, (as in which he did not discolour the honour of his blood with aue- degenerous word, look, or action) encreased the enmie of his death upon the prosecutors. The Earle of Warwicke confest with teares, (and as some say, drawe by faire hope of life) that in adhering to the Duke of Gloester in those ridings and assemblies hee was guilty of treason. The same sentence was there- fore pronounced upon him. The King neuerthe- less did only banish him into the Isle of Man. But the Duke of Gloester (whom, as the peoples saying, it seemed not safe to bring to a publicke trial) was secrete- ly smothered at Caie with pillows and feather- beds.

(102) The great Parliament (for so it seemes to haue beene called, by reason of the extraordinary numbers of Peeres, and their retinues, which came thertunto) was helpen by adournment at Sloughbury. In it, those Luthians, who were partly put to death and partly banished, but all attainted (as such time as the Duke of Gloester and the rest were in armes,) do all of them stand thereby cleared from dishonor, and such * Articles as they subscribed, (being, together with their answers, set downe in the Act) are publicly ratified, and the offenders against them pronounced Traitors. Amongst these Articles, one, concerning the great Lawyers iudgements concerning the orderly proceedings in all Parliaments, is very obseruable: That after the cause of such a felony is by the Kings commandment there declared, such Articles as by the King are limited for the Lords and Commons to proceed in, are first to be handled; but if any should proceed upon other Articles, and refuse to proceed upon those limited by the King, till the King had first answered their proposals, contrary to the Kings command; such doing herein contrary to the rule of the King, are to be punished as Traitors.* But the King, to content all parts, and to kindle new lights in the place of such as hee had extinguished, having first created himselfe * Prince of Chesler, made his cousin Henry Earle of Derby, Duke of Hereford; the Earle of Notland Duke of Somerset; the Earle of Nottingham Duke of Northfolke; the Earle of Kent Duke of Surrey; the Earle of Huntington, Duke of Exeter; the Earle of Somerset Marquesse of Dorset; the Lord Spencer Earle of Gloester; the Lord Neville Earle of Westmorland; William Scrope Earle of Wiltshire; Thomas Percy Earle of Warwicke. (103) The softmost in this goodly ranke, being Henry Duke of Hereford, not long after accused Thomas Duke of Norfolk, of certaine words sounding to the kings dishonour, which hee should privately venter to the said Henry. Polydore* (though very negligently hee makes Admiral the Attorney, and Hereford Defendant) may yet be heard in reporting the effect of the words, as *That King Richard held the Peeres of the land in no account, but as much as lay in him sought to destroy them, by banishing some, and putting others to death. That hee neuer troubled his mind with considering how his Dominions were diminished through his Idleness. Finally, that all thing; went to ruine, as well in peace as war. But the Duke of Norfolk, (who vntill it had bene to seele how the Duke of Hereford's heart was affected to the king, had little reason for to complain) most constantly denying that euer he spake such wordes; it should haue come to a combat within liits; but the king to auoid as hee pretended such deadly fewds as might rise in the families of two such potent Peeres, but (indeed to bee rid of an enemy with the losse of a friend) banished Norfolk for euer, and Hereford first for ten yeeres, then for life. Walsingham saith that this censure was giuen against Norfolk, vpon that very day in which the yeere before, he (by the kings commandement) had taken order for putting to death the Duke of Glocester at Calis, whereof the said Duke of Norfolk had the Captainship.*

(104) Fearefull were the tragedies which ensued these times; and beare now what is written of some Portents or wonders, prefiging the same. The Bay* or Laurell trees withered ouer all England, and afterward re flourishd, contrary to many mens opinion; and vpon the first of Ianuary, neere Bedford towne, the riuer between the villages of Swelfton and Harrisonford where it was deepe, did vpon the sodaine land fill, and so diuided it selfe, that the bottom remained drie for about three miles space, which seemed (saith Walsingham) to portend that reuolt from the King, and the diuision which ensued.

(105) Roger Mortimer Earle of March, Lieutenant of Ireland, hauing in the yeere before, while hee too much* trusted to his owne Forces, been slaine with very many others, by O-Bria*, and the Irish of Leinster, at a place called Kenil; King Richard determines in person to reuenge the blood of his Noble kinsman, being the man to whom hee meant the Crowne of England, if illuse failed to himselfe. Hee remembered not how broken an estate hee had in England, where the peoples hearts were strongly alienated, not onely for the death of the late great Lords, and banishment of the Duke of Hereford, (whose calamitie encreased his popularity) or for the like passed exasperations, but for that (to furnish his Irish voyage) hee had extorted money on all hands, taking vp carriages, widuall, and other necessities, without any recompence, whereby the hatred of his government grew vniuersall.

(106) But the euill fortune which hung ouer his head, laid forth an alluring bait to haste his destruction, by occasion of the Duke of Lancaster decaile, which happened about Candlemas, and the absence of his banished soune and heire Lord Henry. The king (most vniually) stretch vpon the goods of that mighty Prince his vine, & as if all things now were lawfull, which but liked him, he determines to banish the new rightfull Duke of Lancaster Henry, not for a few yeeres, but for euer; for which cause hee reuoked his Letters Patents granted to the said Henry, by which his Attorneys were authorized to sue his Liuitie (and to compound for the respite of his homage at a reasonable rate, whereby he made it seem plaine to the world, that hee had not banished him to auoid dissensions, but (as many said) to fill vp the breaches which his riote had made in the royal treasures, with plentifull (though an vndue) excheate, as that of his deceased vnclies fortune.

(107) The one steadfast base and buttresse of all lawfull Empire, is Iustice; that supports the kinglie throne. This hee ouerthrew, and how then could himselfe hope to stand long? Hee lands at Waterford in Ireland with a Naue of *two hundred ships, hauing with him the sonne of the late Duke of Glocester, and of the now Duke of Lancaster, to secure himselfe the rather. *His forces consisted much of Cheshire men. But that king is deceived, who repossesseth his lifeline in violence. It was no great matter hee did there, that which fell out to bee done elsewhere, was great indeed. His warre in Ireland was more dammagefull, then filthing with an hooke of gold, for here the baite and hooke was not onely lost, but the line, rod, and himselfe, were drawne altogether into the depths of irreconcilable ruine. Duke Henry sees the advantage which King Richard a blence gaue him and vseth it. In his Companie were Thomas Arundel the banished Archbishoppe of Canterbury, and his Nephew the sonne and heire of the late Earle of Arundel, and aboute fifteen Lessiers. His strength was (where the Kings should haue bene) in the peoples hearts. Nearethelste, the Duke did not sodainly take land, but boated vpon the Seas, shewing himselfe to the Country people in one place now and then in another, pretending nothing but the recovery of his rightfull Heritage.

(108) Edmund Duke of York, whom King Richard had left behind him to gouerne England, bearing this, call vnto him Edmund Stafford Bishoppe of Chichester, Lord Chanceller, the Earle of Wiltshire, Lord Treasurer, and the Knights of the Kings Councell, Baister, Baget, Greene, and Russell. Their conclusion was to leue a force to impeach Duke Henry entrance. The assembly was appointed to be at S. Albans, which came to worse then nothing, for the protestation that they would not hurt the Duke, whom they knew to bee wronged was generall. This made the Treasurer Sir John Baskie, and Sir Henrie Greene flee to the Castle of Brighthelm, Sir William Bagot to Chichester, from whence hee got shipping into Ireland. Meane while Duke Henry lands at a village heereofore called Raneshire, to whom repaired Henry Earle of Northumberland, his sonne Henry Lord Percie, lands at Newell Earle of Westmerland, and many others, who (saith Walsingham) greatly feared King Richard tyrannic. With an Armie of about threecore thousand (multitudes offering their seruice) they come to Brighthelm, besiege the Castell, take it, and in the same the foresaid Treasurer Baister and Greene, whose heades (at the cries of the Common) were the next day after their surrender scured from their bodies.

(109) King Richard was in the City of Dublin, when these most heauie newes arrived. His courage which at no time seemed great, was shortly none at all. Somewhat must be done: hee leaues the sons of Duke Henry, & of his late vncle of Glocester (which hee retained as pledges for his owne indemnity) in the Castell of Trim, and retournes himselfe into England, intending to encounter the Duke before his force should bee too much established. The great names which accompanied him, were his late noble Creatures, the young Dukes of Aumale, Excester, and Surrey, the Bishops of London, Lincolne and Carlisle, and many others. There had bene some hope for vpholding his right, if hee had not made the worlde know, that tenne yeeres space was not able to burie in him the appetite of reuenge, which made many forget their owne loyalty to him, and the Crowne. Princes see in him the vice of obliuion: but some conscience of euill defers seeming to haue taken from him all confidence, hee dismissteth his Armie, bidding his Steward Sir Thomas Percy & others to retrue themselves for better dayes.

(110) His last refuge is in Parke. For that cause there repaired to him, at the Castell of Canney in Northwales, (for thither he was now come) the late Archbishoppe of Canterbury, and the Earle of Northumberland at the Kings appointment; The form of his demands were, that if hee and eight, whom he would name, might have honourable allowance, with the assistance of a quiet private life, he would resigne his Crowne. This Northumberland did swear should be: whereupon he forthwith departs to the Castle of Fleet in their company. After a short conference there had with the Duke, they all ride that night to the Castle of Chesler, being attended by the Lancastrian Armie. If, to spare his peoples blood, he was contented to tane to quie his royall right, his fact doth not onely not seeme excusable, but glorious; but men rather thinke that was sloth, and a vaine trust in dissimulation, which his enemies had long since discovered in him, and for that cause, both held his amendment desperate, and ran themselves into these desperate Treasons.

(111) The King did put himselfe into the Dukes hands vpon the twentieth day of August, being both the forty and fiftieth from the Dukes first landing. From thence they traueiled to London, where the King lodged in the Tower. Meane while writs of Summons are sent out in King Richards name, for a Parliament to bee holden at Westminster, Crasno Michaelis. The tragical forme of Registration, you haue * had already in Edward the second, of whom this King is a Parallel. There are named to haue been present at this wofull-joyfull Act, Arundel Archbishoppe of Cantuarie, Richard Scrope Archbishoppe of York, John Bishoppe of Hereford, Henry Duke of Lancaster, (who in this serious play must seeme as if hee were but a looker on) the Earles of Northumberland, and Westmerland, the Lords Burcell, Barclay, Beaumont, Wyllingby, and Abegrenne, the Abbot of Westminster, &c.

(112) In their presence Richard as yet a King, and in his Tower of London, but not otherwise then as a prisoner, reads the Instrument of his surrender, with a seeming cheerefull countenance, as if he were glad the hower was come, in which hee might taste what it was to be a priuie man, and (having others wise first done and laid what then he could to put all right out of himselfe) subscribes it with his hands; but prays, that his Cousin the Duke of Lancaster might succeed him in the regall gouernement, and in token that it was his desire (for hee must seeme to desire what hee could not hinder) hee * plucked off his Signet ring, and put it vpon the Dukes finger. Then did hee consecrate the Archbishoppe of York, and Bishop of Hereford his Procurators, to declare to the whole Body of Parliament what he had done, & how willingly, where every one * except the loyal & magnanimous Bishop of Carlew being particularly asked, did particularly accept of the resignation. Nevertheless, it was not thought enough to haue his Crowne, y^e selfe they also published his name. Thirty * and two Articles are therefore openly (but in his absence) tend; of which, it was said (for then men might say what they listed) that he had confessed himselfe guilty. In the front was placed his abuse of the publicke treasure, and vnworthy waste of the Crown-land, whereby he grew intolerably grieuous to the Subjects. The particular causes of the Dukes of Glanester and Lancaster, the Archbishop of Cantuarie and Earle of Arundel filled sundry Articles. They charged him in the rest with dissimulation, falsehood, loss of honour abroad in the world, extorsions, rapine, deniall of Iustice, rasures, and embestelling of Records, dishonourable flouts, wicked Axiomes of state, crarke, couerousnesse, subordination, lasciuiousnesse, treason to the rights of the Crowne, priuacies, and briefly with all sorts of vaukingly vices, and with absolute tyranny.

(113) We may be assured, that nothing could then be objected so vntrue or incredible, but would haue gone for current and vnderstandable with affections so thoroughly prepared. Hereupon it was * concluded, that in all those thirty and two Articles, hee had broken the Oath of Empire taken at the Coronation,

& at the Statutes of the Kingdom (strange that so many should concur in disloyalty vnder pretence of equity) being asked what they thought; did hold that those causes seemed notorious, and sufficient to depose King Richard. Commissioners were therefore nominated by consent of the whole house, to pronounce the sentence of Deposition, which were, the Bishop of Asaph, the Abbot of Gloucestre, the Earle of Gloucestre, the Lord Barkly, William Thynne, Chief Justice of the common Pleas, and some others. The forme of pronounciation was, IN THE NAME OF GOD, AMEN. The Iohn Bishop of Saint Asaph, John Abbot, &c. Commissioners specially chosen by the Lords Spiritual and temporall of the Realme of England, and Commons of the said Realme, representing all the States of the said Realme, sitting in place of iudgement, &c.

(114) The definitive sentence of Deposition given thus in open Parliament, there were further named certaine persons, amongst whom * William Thynne Chief Justice of the Common Pleas was thought the fittest man, by whose lawlesse mouth that vniuersall doome should be delivered to the King, and who on the behalfe of the Realme, should renounce to the said Richard the realties and homages heretofore made vnto him, and to make relation of the whole manner and causes of their proceedings. The Regall seate was now reported void; whereupon Duke Henrie riseth from his place, and stands vpright, that hee might be scene of the people, then * signing himselfe with the signe of the Crosse vpon the forehead and breast, and invoking the name of Christ, he challenged the Crown and Realm of England, with all the members and appurtenances. His words are said to be these.

In the name of God, Amen. I, Henry of Lancaster, claime the Realme of England, and the Crowne, with all the appurtenances, as coming by the blood royall from King Henry, and by this iustice which God of his grace hath sent to me, by the helpe of my lawfull and friends, for recovery of the said Realme, which was in point of perdition, through default of Government and breach of Lawes.

(115) Which challenge and claime being thus made, all the States of the Kingdome doe with one consent grant, that the said Lord Duke should reigne ouer them. The Archbishop of Cantuarie (brother to the late Earle of Arundel) takes him then by the right hand, and the Archbishop of York (the late Earle of Westmerland kinsman) being his assistant, placeth him in the royal chaire, with the generall acclamation and applauses of the people. Lastly, in full complement of the present solemnity, the Archbishoppe of Cantuarie (that we may see how the Diminuty as well as the Law of those times were degenerated into temporizing Policy) made a Sermon vpon these words in Samuel, A Man shall raigne over the People. By occasion whereof * hee describeth out of the holy Scriptures, the happiness of that Kingdom which is gouerned by a man, and the misery of those Realms where a child (whether in age or discretion) wields the Scepter. He saith likewise as they had dangerously felt under the late King, so they hoped abundantly to enioy the other in King Henry. To all which the whole Auditorie ioyously answered Amen. Then rose the affable new Monarch, & among a few other words, hee gave the world to understand, that none should thinke he would as by way of conquest, dishonour any man, certaine had members vnlesse excepted.

(116) From henceforth hee was taken for King, and all Writs issued, and went forth in his name: which disorderly matters being orderly related to the deposed Prince in the Tower, by Thynne the Chief Justice, hee only used these words, I but hee looked not after such things, but (saith he) my hope is, that (after all this) my cousin will be my good Lord and friend. The Archbishop (otherwise law inexcusable in those proceedings) yet in his said Sermon seemeth greatly graciously and fully to have described the cause of this effect; for (quoth he) the elaid or support (which are with him quaquamable) draweth the forces and delusions w^{ch} are vniuersally, and pernicious to immortall men, which they are mingled with, will not be consumed and wrapped in all danger, as utterly the experience thereof hath bene apparent to all our sights and knowledges, and not without the great danger of all this Realme. Being thus brought downe to the floor, and little-accid of a priuate man, we leane him to draw his comfort out of holy meditations, as one whose violent death embled before him, and turne ouer to his politike and martiall Successor.

(117) Yet, in our way, we may not quite over-pass a cutbly considering of the affairs of the Church vnder this King, which, for anoking often interruptions of other argument, we haue put off to this last place. For albeit the Kingdome indured great crosses in the affaires of State, yet "some haue thought that it found as great blessings in matters of religion, which in those daies tooke fo deepe root in this our laud, by the preaching of Iohn Wicliffe, that the branches thereof did spread themselves ouer ouer the Seas: Nor were the common people oniy af-fauored with his doctrine, (though the "Londons fauoring of him is thought by Walsingham to haue deferred the Prelates from proceeding against him, and a scholler of his in Leicester is said to haue drawn by his preaching, "all the Laymen in that Country; but (in the same Authour reporteth) floodie of the Fryers themselves fell to him and embraced his opinions, amongst whom one "being alio the Popes Chaplain, fo discovered by preaching the murders, lawres and treasons of Fryers of his owne Hause, that the common people were affauored with the horror thereof, and cried out to haue them all utterly destroyed, which his acculations he particularly insuflued by publicke writing, professing be come forth of that Order, as out of the Drinels nest. But that which Walsingham much more "admiris, is that, Wicliffes opinions were not onely entertained in ordinary Cities, but euen in the Vniuersity of Oxford at Wile, where was "the very top of science and learning; and where not only two Chancellors successively. "Doctor Nicholas Hereford, and "Doctor Robert Rugey were most earneſt maintainers of Wicliffes doctrine, but alio, when the pope (to sup-presse the same doctrine) sent his Bull to the Vniuersity threatning the prauation of all their priviledges, the Proctors and Regents thereof were very doctifull, whether they should receive the popes Bull with com, or rather resist it with open diffidence. Yea, the whole body of that glorious Vniuersity (as the Pope there calls it in his Bull) gave a glorious "Testimony (vnder their publicke seale) of Wicliffes religious life, profound learning, orthodox opinions, exquisite writings, all farreth from any flaine of heresie.

(118) And therefore no marvelle, if not only the Duke of Longueville, with sundry Princes and great ones, but King Edward himselfe, were (as Copinger testifieth) a fauourer of him, and * King Richard 4. and the whole Parliamente did (according to his insubligions) much labour to abrogate the Popes Transubstantiation power, which was a principall cause of the Popes hatred against him. Norwithstanding to discontentance the truth which he taught, in defence of English Supremacy against Papall superstition, (as also against the Mass, Transubstantiation, Merci, against Adoration of the Image of Saints, Images, and Reliques, against Episcopall Orders, Pilgrimages, Indulgences, many new opinions by misconstruction (as his bookes * yet extant, shew) are fathered on him, say some so monstrous and diabolicall (as * that Men say yea, * that God himselfe ought, to dye the Diabell) that that say man which heareth them, will presently beleeue (without further perswasion) that they are but malicious figments. This famous Doctor * dying of a palfie, hath this charitable Ensigne Exposit bestowed on him by a Student. The Divels Instruments, Churches Enemy, Peoples Confusion, Heresies Idoll, Hypocrites mirror, Schismes breacher, heretics sewer, tyr tyr tyr, Flatterers fancie, who, at his death did see his Cane, and break on by the horrible judgement of God's treacher forth his wicked law to the dark manif * of the blacke diabell : Whereby, Gods beild children may learne, not to regard, whiles they live, the malice of the wicked, nor to respect after their death ought to tell but their slanderous rancor. And thus we conclude the rage, though not the life of King Richard 4.

(119) The first wife of King Richard the second, was Anne, daughter unto the Emperour Charles the fourth, and filster to Wenceslaw Emperour, and King of Bohemia, who was crowned Queene the 22. of January 1354. Having bene tenne yeres his wife shee dyed, without any issue, at Sheen in the County of Surrey, 1394. whence her body was conveyed and buried at Westminster, the seventh of the Ides of June.

His second Wife

(120) Isabel, daughter vnto Charles the sixth, King of France, was a virgin about fifteen yeers of age, when shee was affianced vnto King Richard, 1396. Neither had her husband (at firstemeth) anie nuptiall fruition of her, by reason of her tender age, before such time as his traitorous Lords, (to compass their owne disloyall purposes, and gratifie an vsurpers ambition) had dethroned him. What became of this young Ladie, we shall further see in the ensuing storie.

HENRIE THE FOVRTH. KING OF ENGLAND, AND FRANCE, LORD OF IRELAND, THE FIFTIE ONE MONARCH OF ENGLAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSE.

Monarch 51

CHAPTER XIIII.

HENRIE of that name the fourth, hauing thus obtained the title of king, in full accomplishment of all rites pecaliar to Maieſty, had the Crowne of England ſet vpon his head, with all worldly magnificence and honour at Weſtminſter, by Thomas Arundel Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury, vpon the ſeſſe day twelue moneth, in which hee had formerly beene baniſhed vnder Richard the ſecond. Power and fauour can ſet up and maintaine a King, though they cannot create right. But ſuch tranſcendent courtes deuſing from all due regulation of Iuſtice, haue been too frequent in this Kingdome. What right had William ſurnamed the Conquerour? what right, (we ſpeake of a right of Equity,) had his ſonnes William the ſecond, and Henry the firſt, while their elder brother liued? what right had that valians and princely Stephen? what was the intereſt of Henry the ſecond, during the life of his mother Matilda? or that of King John, till his Nephew Arthur Duke of Britaine died? yes, or that of Henry the third, till Arthurs ſiſter died in her priſon at Briſtow? How be it, in this preſent caſe, not only Richard the laſt king, but the houſe of Marſimer, claiming from the onely daughter and heire of Lancel Duke of Cleuer (an elder brother of John D. of Lancaſter) doubly might haue withſtood the legall challenge of this Prince! That obſtacle which grew by Richard, was in appearance greateſt, but the other was onely dangerous. Richard had no iſſue but the line of Marſimer (engraſſed by marriage into the houſe of York) ſeeing it ſelfe vnable to preuaile, and during Richards life time, hauing no right, ſecretly foſtered in it ſelfe thole fires, which afterward brake forth, and taking hold of the rooſe-tops of both the royall houſes, neuer left burning, till no one principall timber was vconſumed in either, all the Male-Iſſues which could claime by a direct line, waterlie lopt downe

(2) But this wife and valiant Prince Henry, besides all other helps toward the possession of the Crowne in present, had as much strength, as the vordinate affections and siding of a factious greater part could give, for translation of a right from one familie to another; which strength (as the bulls of his vniuersally reared building) he endeavourth by all the policie means he may, to make perpetuall. During therefore the former Parliament, (for Parliament, as Kingdome, give their voice with power, and he who hath the force, doth commonly carry the effect of right) he * provided for their indemnities, who either came in with him, or did afterward adhere to his sides, and doth vicerly abrogate, and make void the Acts made in the ooe and twentieth yeere of the late King Richard the second, for so much as concerned the Attendants disinheritions, or other forfeitures of any persons therein named, or (in generall words) compelled. Thereby, his vnice, Thomas Duke of Gloucester, who had been postdeath at Caler without any orderly condemnation, Richard Earle of Arundel beheaded at Tower-hill, and others, were freed from the infamie of that corruption in blood, which folloves executed malefactors. And the Statute made in the eleventh yeere of the said Richard, was againe fully set on foot and reuiued.

(3) In these things King Henry did (as it were) sacrifice vnto the people, as well as to the weale publique: The said Thomas Duke of Gloucester, meaning the reformation of the State, in that eleventh yeer of King Richard procured (as is before touched) an Act of Parliament, to * lettle a Superroyall power for a yeere, in certaine Peeres, by vertue of which commission the intended reformation was so farre procured, that sundry great persons and others (favorites of the vnfortunate King) were put to shamefull death banished and confiscated.

(4) But Richard * afterward (by the Duke of Anmaris instigation) reexamines all the former passages and proceedings, and finished his pleasure and displeasure, as already haue bene shewed. The Articles in those times sent oced for treasonable by the most eminent Lawyers, did extend themselves so farre, that the Prince seemed to haue too great means left to worke mischief to the Peeres and people: and that wee may see the constant humor in Lawyers to iodge with the will of the greatest, * the Lord William Thuring Chief Iustice of the common Bench, the Lord John Clifton Chief Iustice, and others, being demanded their opinions vpon the same Articles, for which Sir Robert Tresilian had lost his life, and for which others had so terribly bene censured by the Gloucesterian faction, affirmed (as Tresilian and others did) that the said Commission was against the royall Prerogative, and the procurers thereof were all Traitors.

(5) King Henry therefore, in this his first Parliament, redueth the state of treasons (being crimes of the highest and lowest nature) to a more certaine head, vicerly abolishing all such as were established by the late King Richard. The words of the * Statute it selfe are; Whereas, in the Parliament holden the one and twentieth yeere of the late King Richard, divers pannes of treason were ordained by Statute, in as much as therein as no man which did knowe howe he ought to behave himselfe, in doe, speak or say, for doubt of such power. It is accorded, and assented by the King, the Lords and Commons, that in no time to come any treason bee judged otherwise, then it was ordained by the Statute, in the time of his noble Grandfather, King Edward the third, whom God assile. So was that net broken, he perillous estate of Subjects reduced, the people well gratified, and the King hereby became gracious and popular.

(6) And that his indulgent magnificence might as well appeare, as his ciuill prudence, hee (in this Parliament) created Henry his eldest sonne Prince of Wales, Duke of Aquitaine and Cornwall, & Earle of Chesler, by * assent of all the States. To his friend the Earle of Northumberland hee gaue the life of James, as that which he had attached by Conquest, (so the * cited Record (speakes) of Sir William le Scrope Knight Earle of Wiltshire, beheaded at Bristol. The Earle of Northumberland had it granted to hold by the seruice of bearing Lucas his sword on the left hand of the King at the Coronation. Vpon the Earle of Wiltshire, hee bestowed the Earldome of Richmond. Lastly, as a binding knote, hee causeth the * Crowne to bee entailed vpon the heires of his body, hauing at that time foure sonnes a-lieue, Henrie Prince of Wales, Thomas, Iohn and Humfrey.

(7) Now, as in the workes of nature, what the Sea drawes from one Coast, is casteth to another, others were diminished, as these encreased; the King becauing enemies, to enrich his friends and followers. From Anmaris, Surrey and Essex, the titles of Dukes were taken, and generally all the great ones of that colour or faction, were reduced to the same estate (for honour and fortune) in which they stood, when first the late Duke of Gloucester was arrested. The Castles, Honours, Mannours, and the rest of things, which afterward grew to them out of the ruine of that Duke and his friends, or otherwise by the late Kings gift, from the day of that arrest, were by authority of this Parliament taken away, or put into the present Kings mercy. It was likewise made vnlawful for them to giue lineries or badges to retiners, or to keepe any about them but necessary seruants: They were also forbidden, vnder paine of high Treason, to goe about by any way to renewe the late King against the authority of this Parliament, in which the sentence of his depopulation was giuen and enacted. Finally, (a thing which had them open to infinite vexations) whereas, in the time of their late greatestte, they and theirs were charged to haue done, and patronized manifold wroogs and oppressions, all people (vpon proclamations to that purpose) were willed to come io, and declare their griefes, to the intent they might haue redresse and remedie. With these punishments of his aduersaries, King Henry contented himselfe; but * not the Commons who inoigned against the Archbishops of Canterburie, the Earle of Northumberland, and other Lords of Council, because the said Anmaris, Surrey, &c. were not also put to death, as persons who stood deepe in the peoples hatred.

(8) These provisions for his honour, safety and advantage, King Henry very fecingly contrived, and established at home; but not ignorant vnder what grievous constructions his actions might fall to foreign parts, sends honorable Ambassadors to * Rome, France, Spain, and Germany, to giue a reason of his doings. To * Rome, the Bishoppe of Hereford, Sir Iohn Cheney Knight, and Iohn Cheney Esquier. To France, the Bishoppe of Dorchester, and the Lord Thomas Bezie Earle of Worcester, and * William Heron to Spain, the Bishop of Saint Asaph, and Sir William Par Knight. To Germany, the Bishoppe of Beze, and others. These were armed with all sorts of instructions for iustificacion of their new advanced King.

(9) In France * was worthily found the greatest difficulty of giuing satisfaction, for that the French Kings daughter (the designed wife of the late King) did thereby leese the honour, profit and pleasure of a Monarchies fruition. Shee was as yet scarce twelue yeeres of age, and therefore, * till shee attained to more maturity, the late King had the rather sheltered himselfe in Ireland. France therefore took the newes roughly, and it seemed that matters tended to Armes, which yet came to nothing, for that King Charles relapsed into his old disease of frenzie, and a warre to bee made against so politicke a Captaine as King Henry, required a sober man, and not a mad a mad one. Certainly, in the death of Richard which shortly followed, all those tumultuous designs for revenge, immediately expired.

(10) They of Aquitaine (among whom the unfortunate Richard was borne) bare the late king great love, as being their Countinman. These discontentments were so publike, that Bordeaux (the capitall Citie and Presidentiall feat) strooke not openly to say, (as * Polydore hath it) that first the world began there was never a more cruel, unresonable, nor wicked fall done; that the good Prince was betrayed by faithlesse men, and that all law was violated. Thus do they exclaim, calling to God for vengeance with one voice. Neuertheless the French were deceived in hoping to convert these popular passions to their advantage; for partly by the chiefs * Magistrates wisdom, and principally by the comparison which the people made of the two sortes of government, English and French, that of the English being farre the more sweet and gentle, they continued here. Much good labour, and many faire promises Lewis Duke of Burbon was forced to spend in vaine, who by such baites cast into the troubled wits of the Gascoignes, traiailed to draw them to a revolt. The mischief was the better, and more strongly encountered, by the arrival of Sir Thomas Percy * Earle of Westmer with competent numbers of men, sent thither to withstand the French practises, and core the peoples affections, by applying to them the fouraige balm of reason, or with force to compell obedience.

(11) The first prosscution which was given to King Henric was by the Scots, who during the last Parliament exercised themselves in England, and took the Castle of Wark, whose Capitaine Sir Thomas Grey at that time gave his attendance at Parliament about the common affaires; and the whole North of England being also infested with peldence; the Scots had the more opportunity to range vnrconoured. Cause of other causing enemies which afterward broke forth, was (as it * seemeth) for that King Henric tooke into his protection George Earle of Dumbarre and other Scots, who fled out of Scotland to avoide the displeasure of Robert their King, and partly to take open vengeance for wrongs done vnto them. Such offences as the corruption of humane nature, that it will not pardon priuate injuries for the publike benefit, but thrust the pietie due to our Country vnder the inferior respect of particular interrestes. Princes also vpon oblique reasons of state (so had men call them) which is neuer well founded vpon iustitice, are (for their owne seeming good) contented to hold their neighbours in awe, by possessing meanes of their disturbance, which when time seruethe also, they are not slacke to vie, the profite whereof is seldom or neuer durable.

(12) But King Henric was scarce warme in his new achieved souerainty, when a nest of powerfull enemies beganne to hatch his destruction vnder the shadow of his owne wings. The deposed Richard was yet alive, and howsoever rough and headstrong men of the Kingsdome approovd his downethrow, all others did not; for some moued by ocerence of blood, as the Earles of Kent and Huntington his halfe brothers by one mother; some doubtlesse in confidence (because howsoever Richards actions were vnworthie of the Scepter, yet the right was onely his, and besides Henric seemed to them not the next heire) others transported with enie at Henric supereminence, and not a few with remembrance of receiued benefites, or hope of better fortunes in the change of times, inclined to let him againe vpon the English throne. But they whoeuer seeke the deliuerance of a Captiue Prince, doe commonly nothing else but hasten his death.

(13) It was our purpose in many great things to haue forborne the testimony of Walsingham (other wife a great light of these times) as one who dedicating his works to King Henric the fifth, sonne to this Henric, may be feared to speake the best and most he can, for setting forth the honour of that line; but the leuicy and dissonance of later writers, enforceth (though with some warinesse,) to follow his light, for that, concerning this great conspiracy it selfe, our late Authors doe foollie encounter one the other, and some of them (as it muft needs be) the truth. The principall Conspirators (if such in iust a cause may be so entiled) were such, whose hoar in the last Parliament had beene spared, though manie lockes in their periwigs of worldly honour were plucked away. John Holland Earle of Huntingdon, Thomas Holland Earle of Kent and (as * some say) Edward Earle of Hereford, * three the late Dukes of Excester, Surrey, and Gloucestre; John Montague Earle of Sarubury, Thomas Lord le Spencer, late called Earle of Gloucester, the Bishop of Carlisle, Sir Bernard Breke, Sir John Beche, (or Shelley) Knight, John Audley, the Pseudo Richard, or * Counterfeiter King Richard, whose Chaplaine hee had been, and resembled him verie neerely. The * Abbot of Wellesham is (by some) not only named a Conspirator, but the hirl wheele of all the practise, as mouing the rest; and with him they adde to the former, Sir Ralph Lumley, Sir Thomas Blunt, Sir Bonedil Celic Knight. There were sundry others, but those Earles and others first named, were vndooubtedly the chiefe.

(14) The maine point of the plot was to * kill King Henric and his sonne, and thereby to restore Richard to his rightfull dignity; which the more powerfully to effect, (because, though Henric were murdered, yet they were assured that the huiusselfe would not take end in a day, or a death) they resolved * to call the French into their succors, which they had reason to expect, for that the young Queene Isabel daughter to the French King, remained at that present in England. There was nothing keele or improbable in all this deuse; the difficulty was how to come so strong into the presence of King Henric, that they might ouerlie the Assassins, thereby to finish their enterprise, which as they could not hope for, but with the helpe of a multitude, nor a multitude bee assembled without conuenient Colour, it was resolved, that the pretence of some extraordinary shew in Christmas was the fittest.

(15) Not long before the time of intended execution, the whole Coniuration was discovered, some say by the late Duke of Anmari, and afterward by the Maior of London. Discovered it was, but with so short a warning, that the King scarce found himselfe out of danger, when the Earles of Kent and Salisbury, (not vnderstanding that the bad odour of their conspiracy was come to the King) enter with 400. armed men about * twilight into Windsore Castle, from whence hee was departed to London. But God (whose peculiar Word and Pupils Princes are) hauing deliuered the King out of that most certaine perill, did also sodeinly dissiuage the further enterprises of the Conspirators. The Lord John Holland Earle of Huntington, one of the chiefe, was not in this feast at Windsore, but honored in London, attending the sacrifice, there to raise meanes and men, and to worke such other matters as he could; and afterward (for we credit Walsingham who liued in that time, and knew the place and law, and diligetly noted things, rather then some o-thers) vpon the certaine report of the Kings falseife sought to flee away by water.

(16) The two Earles missing their hoped pray, though greatly grieved, yet necessarie and new hopes bid them to dare further. They therefore come to Swinsay. There the young Queene King Richards (spont) lay where hauing spoken certayne hig words, to little other purpose then to giue the poore Ladie a short comfort, and taken King *Henric*es Badges from such as wore them, saying King Richard was at libertie, and in the midst of an army of one hundred thousand thousand friends Amfret, they proceed to Wallingford, then to Abingdon, and so to Gloucester. The rumors vied by them to encrease their numbers were; that Henry of Lancaster (meaning the King) was fled with his James and friends to the Tower of London, and that King Richard was escaped. Maudlin also, one of Richard's Chaplains, wrote upon him the person of his said Lord, the more strongly to seduce the multitude, by so bold and perilous a fiction. Thus formed they to fit their words and sate their Arts to the place. At Wallingford, Richard (they said) was at Amfret, for there the gaile had been transparent; but at Gloucester, Richard was not at Amfret, but present.

(17) Howbeit the success was not answerable to the desire I for, besides that King Henry was in the heart of his strength at London, where six thousand men were put into a readiness, and would come upon them like a storm; the Townsmen of Gloucester assailed the Lords, took them, and (because their Town was fired of purpose by some of their followers, the better to recover them while the quenching found the people employment, yielded them forth, and without longer tarrance secured their heads from their bodies: The Earle of Huntington, with a trustie Knight of his, Sir John Stewell, hazing (after the faile at Wallingford) in vaine attempted to escape by Sea, was taken by the Commons at Widford; perhaps Prattel in Elfric, brought first to Chelmsford, and lastly to Widford, the house of the late Duke of Gloucester (whose Ghost a tragical Poet would suppose did haunt his persecutors for revenge, where, partly also by this Earles infatigation, the said Gloucester was first arrested. The Commons (out of whole hearts the image of that Duke was not vanished) at the Countesse of Hereford's infatigation who was the Dukes widow, took his infatigation upon the Earle, with the efficacie of his head, which there was sundered from his shoulders. The Lord Spencer called Earle of Gloucester (one of the Conspirators) had like execution done upon him by the Commons at Widford. Some other of them were put to death at Oxford, and some at London, where John Maudlin (the Counterfeite Richard, who as it seemes was a beautiful and goodlie person) and one William Ferly were drawne, hanged and headed. The Bishop of Carlisle notwithstanding the holy eunencie prefered used aine after the condemnatory sentence. There were a ninetee in all (whereof two had bene Dukes) put to death for this conspiracy, most of which were men of official note.

(18) The deligens and misfortunes of King Richard's friends being made known unto him, could not but worke strongly in a soule oppress with griefe; but whether so strongly as to make him resolute by voluntary abstinence to starue himselfe (as the same went) may be doubted, though it be past doubt that King Henry was not forrie hee was dead howsoever. That he was starued seemes verie plainethough, as it is not certain (neither yet unlikely) that King Henry was privity to so foule a parricide, so neither is it knowne, but that Richard might as well be starued of purpose, as starue himselfe. Master Stow (a man for honest indolry very praiseworthy) saith that King Richard was fiftene daies and nights together kept in hunger, thirst, and cold, till he died. How true that was in the circumstance, who knows? but in the point of staruing hee is clearely with Wallingham: and a Knight living about those times callith it a death neuer before that time knowne in England. Harding also, living vnder King Edward the fourth, agrees of the rumour of staruing. Master Cambden saith of Amfret Castle, that it is a place principall cause of longine infamie, but seemes to insinuate, that some other torments were most wickedly practised upon this King, as made out of the way with hunger, cold, and vexation of torments. A Polydore therefore may in this be beleaved, who writes of this poore depoeled Monarch, that, (which may well be called vexation of torments) his diet being served in, and set before him in the wonted Princely manner, he was not suffered either to taste, or touch thereof. Idle therefore seemes "his dreame, who writes hee was murdered in the Tower, and not more credible "theirs, who tell vs of Sir Peter of Exeter's assault, and the murder basely by him acted upon this most miserable Prince: but much more are they to blame who negligently for credit of the fable quote Wallingham, in whom no syllable of such a thing is found. Onely Heller Tacitus will vs to believe that Richard fled disguised into Scotland, was discovered to King Robert, and honourably entertained, but Richard who would no more of the world, gave himselfe wholly to contemplation, and both lived, died, and was buried at Strathclyde. Which fond fable hath needlesse faine what in it, for that some personated Richard might be doe is neither impossible, nor improbable, and indeed it was so.

(19) The late King Richard thus cruelly and helplessly murdered (for in regard of pining death he termed fable of his fight with Sir Peter of Exeter was a sport, it being both noble and full of comfort, for a man of honour and courage to die with weapon in hand) King Henry causeth his dead body to be brought up to London. O Henry, if thou wert Author, or but priue, (though for thine owne pretended safetie, and for that errors cause which is lewdly mis-called reason of state) of such a murder, I woe not see, how the shewing of the people his vacanted face in Paul's, did either concale or extenuate the execrable crime. But to let the world know that there was no hope nor place for a Richard, that course was vied, which may rather confirme the triph of his enfamilment: for a violent death by braining could not but deform him too much: and it is most probable that such a death would bee sought, as might least appaare. Surely he is not a man, who at the report of so exquisite a barbarisme, as Richard's enfilment, feels not chilling horror and detestation; what if but for a iustly condemned galley-slave so dying? but how for an anointed King, whose Character (like that of holy Orders) is iudicible? The tragical spectacle of his dead body (perhaps because it moued too much both pite and chaire) was after a while transported without honor to Langley in Hertfordshire, where the last rites were performed by the Bishop of Chelms, the Abbots of S. Alban and Waltham, but neither King Henry present, (as at the exequies in London) and the great Lords and such other as were had nor so much as a funerall feast bestowed on them for their labour. But Henry the fifth, in the first yeere of his raigne with great honour did afterward cause those royall remains to be interred in the Sepulchre of his Ancestors at Westminster. Among the rising Latine verses of his Epitaph, yet may marvel to reade thee, considering vpon what points he was tried out of Mairie and Stair:

*Exilem fatis platis suppeditant,

The Church befaunted, casting the proud to ground, And all that would his small State confound.

The said Author therefore Robert Fabian, observing the scope of those lines (to dampe their force) doth vnderwrite and annex this Stanza, with much greater discretion then elegancie:

*But yet alas, though this meeter or rime, Thou dost embroill this noble Princes rime,
And that some Clerke which favoured him sometime, Lift by his cunning thus to enhance his name, Let by his story appeare in him some blame: Wherefore to Princes is fast memory, Their lines to exercise in vertuous confluence.*

More rare and furer is the cenſure of Gower vpon this Prince, one of whole verſes * Steu gives vs thus,

So God doth hate ſuch rulers as here viciously do liue.

That beautifull picture of a King fighting, crowned in a chaire of eſtate, at the vpper end of the Quier in Saint Peters at Wyndſor, is ſaid to be of him, which witneſſeth how goodly a creature he was in outward lineaments.

(20) King Henry to diuert the humors and eyes of the people from the remembrance of this Tragedie, prepareth now a puilliance, therewith to invade Scotland, ſome ſubjects whereof, together with their Admirall Sir Robert Legu a Scotch Knight, were taken at Sea by certaine English ſhips. But K. Henry may ſeeme to haue done any thing rather, then to haue made a warre, for altho he had ſome hurt by * walling the Country, yet did not the Scots offer battle, and therell will wel appear in thoſe words of * Boetius, He did ſmiliaritate to the people therof: for he deſired might but his banner to be erected on their walls. He was more a pleaſant enemy, and did great humanity to the people in all places of Scotland where he was lodged. Finally hee ſtoode to the Lords of Scotland, that hee came into their Realme rather by counſell of his Nobles, then for any hatred he bore to Scots. Some after hee returned into England. Whether the remembrance of the curtheſies ſhewed to his Father Duke John, or the feare of his owne great lance ſo neere to an overthrow by the late furious conſpiracy, wrought theſe gentle effects, it was not long before the euent ſhewed, that his providence in not creating new acerbities was therein needfull.

(a 1) For altho the face of England ſeemed ſmooth, yet God thruſt a thorne into King Henrie ſide, when and where hee little expected; for the Welſh, whom former Kings of England had ſo yoked, and ſubiected, diſcourtesy to all mens expectation, brake forth into open acts of hoſtility, vnder the conduct of a Gentleman of that Nation ſurnamed Glendower, of the Lordſhip of Glendower in Merionethſhire, whole owner he was; the wrath and iuſtice of heauen is alwayes fowell furniſhed with meanes to exerciſe the mightieſt, thoſe chiefly at whole amendment God aims by chaſtiſement. The original of ſo great an euill was in the ſeed but little, as but this: Owen Glendower, * whom the Welſh call the ſonne of Gruſſeth Vabon, deſcended of a younger ſon of Gruſſeth Vabon, Lord of Braunſfield, was at firſt a Student of the common laws, and an Vtter Baſilisk, (but not therefore an apprentice of law, as Doctor Fowell miſtakes, for an apprentice of the law, is hee that hath beene a double Reader) and afterward ſerue the late King Richard in place of an Elſquer, & was well beloued of him, but in King Henrie time (reſtoring himſelfe as it ſeemes to his Mannour of Glendowry, the L. Gray of Rother entred vpon a peece of common, which lay betwene Rother and Glendowry, which Owen (deſpite the Lord Gray while Richard continued King) had formerly holden, though not without coſtutation. Owen (a man of high courage, and impatient of force) armes heretupon, and encounters the Lord Gray in the field, whete he ſcattered the ſaid Lords people, and tooke him priſoner, as hereafter will elſe where be touched.

(22) It ſeemes herein that hee had forgotten the lawes which hee had formerly ſtudied, and when hee had been a licentiate; for ſhortly after, as hee had troden law vnder foot, ſo did hee alſo caſt off loyaltie, burning & deſtroying the Lord Gray in heruitances, and killing ſundry his ſeruants. The King a diuerted hereof, paſſeth with an Army into Wales, b urnes, kills, and takes ſuch reuenge as that time would permit. Meanewhile, Owen (whom pride & folly armed to the farther ruine of his Country) with his trueſt friends (which were not few) withdrawes into the inextinguishable ſiſtence of Edmond, where during this tempeſt, he kept his head ſafe. Shortly after the King with ſuch riches and ſpoiles as thoſe Parts had afforded, returns. His next moſt neede action was peaceable. For one of the houſe of Palatines, and Emperour of Conſtantinople, came into England to pray ſome ſuccour againſt the Turke, and vpon the day of S. Thomas the Apoſtle, was met at Blackheath by King Henry, highly deſired, richly preſented, and his charges borne till departure. But as Tibull * ſaith of his ſucceſſe in France, verbi Opromiſſantantum aduentu eſſi, ſo here his ſpeed was not much better, the point of armed aides, being only therein aſſiſted with words and promiſes.

(23) In a Parliament held the next yeere, * by reaſon of the numbers of Lolards, (ſo called) merging, the puniſhment for them enacted, was burning. And in the ſame yeere alſo, the Articles of peace being firſt agreed vpon betwene the two Nations, Engliſh and French (norwithſtanding that they had denied to match with the young Prince of Wales, * becauſe the former marriage with Richard thriued ſo badly) the Lady Iſabel who had been crowned Queene of England, in ſpoile of the late King, was now ſent backe into France after a moſt princely manner, hee being not as yet * twelue yeeres old, had * no dowrie allowed her in England, for that the marriage was neuer conſanitated. Before ſhee was reſtored to her friends, the Lord Henry Percie, before the Ambaſſadors of both the Nations, where they were met betwene Calais and Belogone, proſtelled. That the King of England had ſtill kept her to be delivered to her Father cleare of all bonds of marriage, or otherwiſe, and that hee would take it vpon his ſoule, that ſhee was ſound and entire, even as ſhee was the ſame day ſhee was delivered to King Richard, and if any would ſaye the contrary hee was ready to prove it againſt him by combat. But the Earle of Saint Paul ſaying, hee beleued it to be true, the Lord Percie tooke her by the hand, and delivered her vnto the Earle, and then the Comiſſioners of France delivered certaine letters of receipt and acquitall. She was afterward married to Charles Duke of Orleans.

(24) Owen Glendower perſiſting in his pride and diſobedience made inſurrections vpon the Engliſh, doing them great harme, and returning ſome with out any, but K. Henrie danger was greater at home; for treaſon had crept into his moſt ſecret Chamber. In his bed there lay hidden a Gallipot or Envy with three ſmall yron pikes, lung, ſlender and paſſing ſharpe all of them with their points fer vpward, but (God ſo diſpoſing) in the King before hee laid himſelfe downe, perceiued them, and thereby avoided that hidden miſchiefe, but who was actor therein it doth not appeare.

(25) This appeares that the ſplendors of his new regality had drawne vp many thicke and poiſonous cloudes of enuie and praethie, to darken if it were poſſible the farther brightneſſe thereof. Neither was it long before it grew to ſome extremity. For Owen Glendower vpon the cauſe beforeſaid, waſting the Lord Reynold Gray lands, was encountered by him, as preſuming that Owen and his friends might eaſily be overcome, but the contrary hapned, for there in fight hee loſt very many of his companie, and was himſelfe taken Priſoner. This fortune made the ſwelling mind of Owen overflow in vaine hopes, who compelling the ſaid Lord to marry his daughter, yet obtained hee not his liberty the ſooner, but died (ſay ſome) in the power of Owen, if perhaps our Author miſtake not the Lord Gray for Edmond Lord Murmer Earle of March, who indeed did marrie ſo after hee was alſo overthrowne by the ſaid Owen with the ſlaughter of about a thouſand principall perſons of Herefordſhire, aſſembled vnder his conduct, to reſiſt the Welſh inuafions, and there alſo himſelfe was by treachery taken priſoner.

(26) Walsingham doth * write, that about this time ſundry conſpiracies were diſcovered in the yoke (as it were) or embrion; the whole hopes whereof reſted vpon calumniation, and forgery, for by the first they *adrued (in libels) Henries actions, so to make him hateful, and by the second they distinguished that * Richard was still alive, thereby to raise an head of separation. Henry thus galled in his honour, and endangered in the main, resolved to spare none, upon whom the crime or concealment was found. The first of them that fell vnder his iustice, was a Priest of Worce, with whom was taken a list, or roll of names which hee had gathered, supposing them such as in regard of benefits received, would live and die for King Richard, which vanine of his created trouble to many, till it appeared that he had therein wronged them, as persons who were vntill ignorant both of the man and matter. Whereupon hee was drawne and hanged. The like fate had Walter Baldock Prior of Leander, who confessed that he had concealed others counsels against the King, though himselfe had acted nothing. A Prior Minor also being taken with some other of his Order for like iocundments, was asked, what he would doe if King Richard were alive and present? he confidently answered, that he would fight for him till death against a ny whom so; which cost him his life, being drawn and hanged on his Fryers weeds. Neither did this hard fortune fall only upon the Clergy, for Sir Roger Clarendon Knight, (reputed the balde foote of Edward, late Prince of Wales) together with an Elquies and servant of his, finished the affection which they bare to the deceased Richard by hanging. Not long after eight Franciscan Fryers, or Admirites were taken, conspired, hanged, and headed for the like causes, which made the King an heavy Lord to that whole Order. It is said that somewhat before this knot was discovered the diuell appeared in the habit of a Minister at Dunbury Church in Essex, to the incredible astonishment of the parishioners, for at the same time there was such a Tempest & thunder with great fire-bolts of lightning, that the vault of the church brake, and halfe the Chancel was carried away.

(27) But howsoever these out-branches were pared away, the rootes of all the practise lay deeper out of sight, for the * Perceis, Henry Earle of North- umberland, Thomas Earle of Worcester, and Henrie Baillie * Perry, because perhaps they thought they had done wickedly in helping to set up Henry, beganne to imagine that bloody mischief, which afterward was profecuted. This malice, the late fac-cels of Owen Glendore against the Lord Mortimer Earle of March, (taken prisoner, as it said, with no little slaughter of his Herefordshire men) did perhaps nourish; for that hee saw an enemy appeare, who was not vnkely to prove an able member of a greater rebellion. Certainly the King having in Septem- ber led an Armie into Wales to take revenge upon his Rebels was in great danger to have perished with foudaine stormes and raines, the like whereof none of his people had euer felt or feared, so that after he had done some waits upon the Countrey hee returned.
 The common fame went that Owen was a Coniurer, and had raised those hideous tempests by hellish arts; they seemed so excessive, which (whether true or false) did yet impart no little strength to the Welsh faction.

(28) The Kings fortune was happier in the North, where his Lieutenants had two faire victories, the one at * Nisbet, and the other at St. Albans - hill, according to a village called Waller. And although the first was not a small one, yet the other destroyed the name of a iust battell and garrison. To the Scots, having with above ten thousand men vnder conduct of * Archibald Earle of Douglas, whom the Scots called named Tyue-man, because he neuer wanted field, though no sort of true manhood was wanting in his person; made great spoiles in England as farre as to Newcastle, and were now vpon returne; Henrie Perceis Earle of Northumberland, the noble Henry Beaufort Lord Perceis his sonne, and George Earle of Dumbar (who fled as you have heard out of Scotland) with the forces of the Countreys there about, not meaning to let them to passe in so slight a sort, opposed themselves.

 The chiefe feat was wrought by the English Archers, who first with their stille, close, and cruell stormes of arrowes made their enemies footme breake, and when the noble Douglas descended to the charge with his choicest hand, himselfe being in a most rich, and excellently tempered armour, and therewith singularly well appointed, the Lord Perceis Archers making a retreat, did wuhall deluier their deadly arrowes, ten times, ten times, ten times (saith our Monke) so lively so courageously so grieuously, that they ranne through the men of Armes, bored the helmets, pierced their very bowels, broke their langes to the earth, and easily slew those who were more lightly armed through and through. There were taken prisoners the Earle of Douglas himselfe, (who notwithstanding his armour of the best Steele, had five wounds, and lost an eye.) Mordeke Stewart Earle of Fife (eldest sonne to Robert Duke of Albanie), George Earle of Angus, the Earle of Marrey and Orkney, the Lords Montgomery, Erskin, and Grane, with about fourscore Knights, besides Esquiers and Gentlemen. There were slaine the Lords Gardens, and Suynton (Scotishmen better call them Knights) with sundrie other men of honour and mark, beside flore of common soldiers. The river Tweed doth it selfe more English, did likewise fight for them by swallowing about five hundredth in his unknowne depths, as they, who fled from the battell, sought to passe. This victory hapned vpon Whitsunday in harvest. The troubles which afterward hapned, did not only hinder the Lord Perceis from farther protection of such a victory, but eclipsed the honour hee had gotten now and gave his dayes a bloody & foule Catastrophe.

 through feare of Owen (whose prisoner hee was) or hope of recouering his right, or for reuenge (because ter, by which hee must necessarily declare himselfe an enemy to King Henrie, entertained intelligence with his neere kinsmen the Perceis, and sundry other his friends in Cheshire, and elsewhere, to what purpose will shortly appeare. The night in which this Lord Mortimer (though some refferre it to Owen birth) was born, all the horses in his fathers stable, are said to have bin found hanging Belly-deep in blood.

 A fearful prodigie as then tho't seemed, but verrified afterward in the fate more fearful euents, when (vpon the quarrell of Mortimer title, by which the house of Turke claimed,) the houses of warre did not onely stand belly-deepe in blood, but also swam therein. The mischief was already be-guo: for Henry Earle of Northumberland (when now his owne and his houses strengths were mightily encreased by this late victory against the Scots, which he vnder-hand seemed to haue counteracted to his secret priuate end,) closely * animated his brother the Earle of Worcester, and his fiery spirited son, against the King, to both their confusions.

one the other in most terrible manner, but when they drew neer, nothing was to be found. Of another nature were the fury attempts of the Percees. The first of them who discovered in armes his mortal hatred, was the noble Haifur, who (under colour of the Scottish warre) made head about Chesler and the marches of Wales. To him (by the private of Haifur father,) repaires the naughty old man the Earle of Worcester, leaving the young Prince of Wales and the Princes household, over both which (for their better Government) the King had placed him. Now was the torch of warre lighted up, and began to blaze, for though the chiefe plot-maister the Earle of Northumberland was not joined to them, as hee did intend, yet were their numbers growne mightily, with which they meant to enter the Towne of Shrewsbury, to make thereof a Seat of warre.

(12) Colourable causes of their armes were the ordinarie paintings of the like attempts. Care of common-wealths reformation, and their owne satisfactions, for having first professed their intentions not to be the breach of loyalty, they pretend and by letters sent about, doe signifie. 1. That as the publique weale was not employed upon the pretended defence of the kingdom, but vainly wasted. 2. That by reason of bad tongues about the King they durst not approach him, to declare their innocency, while the Prelates and Priores of the Realm did first guard for them. 3. That they take armes onely to guard their owne heads, and to see the Kingdom better governed. These Articles had the place of the Hooke, but the kernell of the enterprise had principallie theie. 1. To thrust King Henry out of his seat, and consequently to deprive him of life. 2. To advance the title of the Lord Mortimer Earle of March to marry Albion for the Earle of Northumberland had married Elizabeth the daughter of the Lord Edmond Mortimer the elder, Earle of March, by Philip daughter to Lionel Duke of Clarence. 3. To take away from King Henry, for seeking to drawe the shewe benefit to himselfe of the victory at Halidowne hill, whose principall prisoners be required, and for such other private grudges. 4. To share the Kingdom betweene Mortimer, Percey and Owen Glenclower. Concerning which partition it is in some found written, that Indentures tripurite were sealed, showing that South-England should remaine to Mortimer, North-England to Percey, and Wales beyond Severn to Glenclower. But Archibald Earle of Doerglas (who did his Countrey good service by making one in our Combustions,) by common consent was allowed for his share to be free from ranfome, and to have Berwick.

(13) This (in our English Adages) is called to reckon without our holt, or to count our chickens before they are hatched. But though at this time God would have it so, yet who doth not easily see what a wild horse a kingdom (so gotten) is, and how hard to tie, and not to manage onlie? Yet it seemeth, that if Mortimer, having to iust a tide to the Crowne, had openly professed the cause of his attempt against King Henry, it might iustlie have beene exempted from all blame of diabolical. But this partition is said to have beene wisely built upon a found Welsh prophetic of Mortimer: as if King Henry were the Mortimer cursed of Gods owne mouth, and Mortimer, Percey and Glenclower the Dragon, Lyon, and wolf, which should divide this Realm betweene them. Surely the Welsh dividing any hand in such a partition, it is not likeley they could thinke it had the right secte, if it stood not upon the supposed Mortimer his ridiculous coineages and riddles. The English (not to be behind in leasings) doe in the meane time every where spread that Richard was safe alone in the Castle of Chesler. Who can wonder that this name should be so gravisous, as if alone it were enough to have shaken Henry out of his Seat? when Nero himselfe had so many favorites, that twenty yeeres after his death an obscure fellow faining himselfe Nero, was so backt and countenanced by the Partians, and others, * that not without much difficulty the Romans could get him into their hands.

(14) On the other side King Henry affiailed with so unexpected jeopardies, defends his cause by letters, and strongly puts the blame upon the accusers, saying, I had hee marvelled exceedingly, seeing the Earle of Northumberland, and Henry his Sonne had the greatest part of the publique money delivered to them, for defence of the borders against Scotland, by they should make that a quarrell, which was a mere exactione. Meane while the King armes with all speed against the enemye, the rather at the counsell of George Earle of Dunbar, who (like a valiant man at Armes, and a wise friend) advised him so to doe, before their adversaries numbers were too mightily augmented. The King with his sonne the young Prince of Wales, and a very noble fellowship, was now advanced within sight of Shrewsbury, as the gallant Percey stood ready to assaile the Towne. But so soone as the roiall Standard was discovered, that enterprise was left off, and he drew out his people (being about fourteen thousand choice and hardie bodys of men) to try the fortune of war against a well trade warrior.

(15) Peace notwithstanding (by the exceeding tendernes of the King) had ensued, but that the mischeuous Earle of Worcester, by miteporting and falsifying his Soveraignes words, did precipitate his Nephew into sudden barrel. If there were any praise or good example to bee drawne out of so detested bloodshed, as that of civil warre, we would willingly describe unto you the order and actions, but we cannot too soone passe over such mournfull objects, which are rather to bee celebrated with teares then triumphes. There is no doubt but Percey, Doerglas, and the rest fought terrible. Why should we admire that in them? So doe Lions, Tygers, & Bears, and yet wee admire them not. Where was dutie, where conscience, where the other respects, of which onely we are called men? Let none of us honour, or imitate them, in whose eyes the price of English blood is so vile, as that (for private families) they can be content to confound all regards, and make sport for common foes, with mutual massacres. Therefore we will content our selves with the knowledge of Gods part in this daies workes, who gave the garland to the King, though the first arrowes flew from the Percey Archers.

(16) The Kings courage was not small in the fight, neither was the danger, the yong Prince of Wales alio (being then first to enter himselfe into the schoole of blood and battell) gave no small hopes, that perfection which afterward shone in him, being wounded with an arrow in the face. The Lord Percey and Earle Doerglas (then * whom the wide world had not two braver Champions) in freed of spending themselves upon the multitude, set the point of their hopes upon killing the King, as in whose person they were sure ten thousand fell. For this cause they most furiously rushed forward with speares and swords; but the noble Earle of Dunbarre, discerning their purpose, drew the King from the place which he had chosen to make good, and thereby in likelihood for that present saved his life, for the Standard royall was overthowne, and (among other valiant men) the * Earle of Stafford, Sir Walter Bass, the Kings Knight and the Standard-bearer himselfe was slaine, such was the fury of these fisdine thunderbolts. That day the Doerglas flew with his owne hands three in the Kings Coat-armour, (perhaps some in Heralds Coats) though * Nature yet saw a fourth. Sure it is, that manke of the subjects thought the King was slaine, and not a few * ranne out of the field. Who notwithstanding, like a valiant Prince, did reinforce the fight, performing marches in arms with his own hands. The slaughter could not be small on both sides, the Archers shooting so continually, and the men of arms doing their utmost for about the space of three whole hours.

(17) That which gave an end to this wofull worke was the death of Hatfield, who riding in the head of the battell in defiance of danger and death, was (by an unknowne hand) suddenly killed, with whole fall (as if his whole army had had but one heart) the courages of all others fell into feere, which now altogether they trusted to. But the King abhorring to make farther execution of the misguided multitude, suffered them to shift for themselves. The Earles of Worcester and Douglas, Sir Richard Ferrers, the Baron of Kindlamore, and divers others were taken. Of the Kings side was slain (besides the Earle of Stafford) ten new Knights, whose names (as dying in an honest cause) deserve immortality, and were Sir Hugh Shurly, Sir John Clifton, Sir John Calvain, Sir Nicholas Gaisel, Sir Walter Blunt, Sir John Calverly, Sir John Maltre, Sir Hugh Mortimer, Sir Robert Gaisel, and Sir Thomas Wendesley, who dyed of his hurt not long after, as most of the other did about the Strand; all which fighting for their spure, (as being knighted but that morning) bought them with the honourable losse of their whole bodies; there were also slain many Esquires, & Gentlemen, and about one thousand and five hundred common souldiers, besides three thousand forely wounded. On the other part, (omitting that second Mars, the Lord Percy (who drew a rune after him futable to his Spirit and greatness) there fell most of all the Esquires and Gentlemen of Cheshire, to the number of two hundred, and about five thousand common souldiers. This battell was stricken nere to Shrewsbury upon a Saturday, the one and twentieth of July, and the day of Saint Mary Magdalen.

(18) The Earle of Worcester (the seducer and destroyer of his noble Nephew Hatfield, and therefore if but for that, very worthy to have dyed) Sir Richard Ferrers Knight, and the Baron of Kindlamore had their heads cut off upon the Monday following. Hatfield's body had beene buried by permission, but upon other advice, the King caused it to be drawne out of the graue, beheaded, quartered, and the parts sent into divers Cities of the Kingdome. The Earle of Northumberland (pretending to come with forces to the Kings aide) was embached by the Earle of Westmerland, and Robert Waterline who had raised a great host. Northumberland taking neither of them for friend, wheels about, and returns to his Castle of Warkworth. But what can be secure to a subiect against the victorious armie of a martiall King? The Earle knew as much, manifestly feeling the irreconcilable maines of his house in the losse of his sonne and brother, and therefore shaped his court accordingly. The King therefore being altogether as prudent as fortunate, having fed the flare of things in the Marches about Shrewsbury, sets forth to the City of York, from thence to take order for such perils, as he foresaw might happen. He fed himselfe the more seriouslie and enervic to this needfull worke; for that his Ambassadors had effected an abstinence from warre with France, till the first of March, which pausing space though it might seeme little, was not a little welcome to the King, the Realme of England being then so full of dangerous perturbations. While hee was at York, he commands the Earle of Northumberland to come thither in person, which he accordingly did upon the morrow after the day of Saint Lawrence, and that also with a small traine in the nature of an humble suitor. He could not in reason hope for the wonted familiar favour of the King, neither had he yet, for it was accounted matter of grace, that his life was pardoned, though his meanes and liberty was abridged, the King allowing only necessary maintenances. The life of Princes is like a perpetual motion. The Northern Countreys are now settled, but hath the King therefore any the more rest? Nothing left; for Wales & the troubles thereof call him thither. What should hee doe? Money the Cement and foldure of all such actions, (for Armies cannot otherwise bee held together) utterly failes. The Archbishop of Canterbury sees the needs and vices of his Sovereign, and like a Father supplies him with a Tenth, which the Clergy at their Metropolitan motion, consent to give: upon the strength whereof, the King knows how farre hee may proceed against the Welsh in his goodtime.

(19) Toward the reliefe of these his necessities, the valiant exploits of William de Wyndesore an Esquire, who was in the meane time abroad for the King upon the narrow Seas, brought some assistance, certainly store of contention; for hee tooke forty lawfull prizes laden with yton, oyle, soap and Ruchell wine, to the number in all of a hundred tunne upon the Coastes of Britaine, and in his returne set forth aule on fire; and to make the Britains know that hee was not only a man of his hands at Sea, hee comes on shore at Fenarch, burnes Townes and houses about six leagues into the Countrey, and afterward did as much for them at the Towne of Saint Mathewes, which hee consumed with flames and washed the land for three miles about. The French not to seeme slow to like mischiefs, land at the Wyght, but were compelled with losse to beake themselves againe vnto their Fleet, with farr worse success then the Britons vnder the conduct of the Lord of Castell had not long before, who landing at Plimmouth invaded, tooke and burnt it.

(20) The King having humbled the Earle of Northumberland in such sort as you heard, looks againe upon him with an eye of compassion and favour, not without a secret respect to his owne safety; and hee had little appetite to augment enemies, but to allay them rather, whereas by this gracious vantage of that Earle, (for hee restored him fully to all) hee now thinks those North parts sufficiently secured. This reconciliation was made to the Earle in the Parliament holden at London about the midst of January, where the King obtained an vnusuall Taxe or Subsidy, of which (that it might not be drawne into example) no record, nor writing was suffered to remaine. Some part of the gold which the King thus drew into the Exchequer, hee had occasion to bestow at this time. For, three hundred themselves vnto him a boisterous troupe of plaine Welshmen, who brought to the kings view three Lords, and twenty knights of note; These were prisoners, whom the Countrey people about Dartmouth in Devonshire had gotten in plaine fight. The king was therefore pigen to understand, that the Lord of Castell the Briton, who had formerly burnt Plimmouth, thinking to doe the like at Dartmouth, came on shore with his forces, where these and the like people fiercely encountered him; at which time their warrens (like Amazons) by hurling of flints and pebles, and by such other artillery, did greatly advance their husbands and kindred victory. The Lord of Castell himselfe and many besides were slain, these other were slaine as more of them might have beene, but that the ignorance of language alike confounded the cries of indignation and pity. They therefore in reward of this hazard and service, doe pray they might reape some commodity by their Captivities. It was thus returned; wherefore the King, who tooke pleasure to talke with the lusty Welshmen, himselfe, amongst their parties to be slaine with golden Coyne, releasing the prisoners to repay himselfe with advantage out of their ransomes. The like good fortune against Owen Glendower and the Welsh would have gladdened him indeed; but they burne and destroy the Marches, they kill and captivate the people, and partly by force, partly by fraud, get many Castles, some of which they rase, and fortifie others.

others. Neither came these evils single, for the Flemings and Britons took certaine Merchant ships of England, and either flew or hung the Sailers.

(41) It is more strange that King Richard was not suffered to be dead, after he had so long a time been buried. Serle, who had beene a Gentleman of his Chamber, having heard that King Richard was secretly abiding in Scotland, left the favour of the French Court to see him, but it was not worth his so much loase and labour for hee that bare the name, was but an impostor. Loath yet that led the opinion die, because it might do King Henry harme; Serle assumes that Richard was alive. What cunning madnesse is so great which hath not some great fooler or other to support it? The old Countesse of Oxford (mother to the late Duke of Ireland) will needs perswade her selfe and others in Essex, that Richard was alive; certaine it is, that she desired it might be true. To make others more firmly beleue the same, she secretly gave siluer and gilt Harbs (the badges which King Richard used to bestow vpon his followers) as tokens. Hitherto the deuise held out, for it had no great danger in it; but Serle seeing the necessity of greater friends, which appeared not, grew weary, and knowing that Sir William Clifford Knight, Captaine of Berwick had refused sundry favours from King Richard, hopes by him to be furnished with money, to beare his charges out of Scotland into France. Clifford farre otherwise minded, seizeth vpon Serle, as a fit meane to reconcile himself with the King, in whose high displeasure he stood, (for that hee had conspired his charge in Berwick contrary to expresse commandement) and carrieth him to the King, who was then come to the Castle of Wimbor, being weakened with these rumors, and suspecting that the chiefe nest of danger lay in the North; whither the Earle of Northumberland brought his grandchildren (as pledges) to assure the King of his loyalty: thither also Sir William Clifford brings poore Serle, who both confesseth the practise, as also that hee had a guiltie hand in the murder of the Duke of Gloucester, which made him farre more odious then the other forgery. The crimes being manifest, Serle is drawn fro Wimbor beginning his pain, where he had his doom, & at London knies vp the Tragedie in an halter. The Countesse of Oxford for this foolish losst of her goods being morouer committed to close prison. To make this imposture the more probable & passable, Serle had caused K. Richards signet to be counterfeited, wherwith he sealed sundry consolatorie and exhortatory letters to his friends, indeed in K. Richards name; wherupon many in Essex gave credit to the Countesse, & among the rest four Abbots of that Countie. Into this smokedd al the deuise evaporate.

(42) And no lesse smoke was both the deuise & successe of certain in the Parliament held this year at Conway, & called the "lack learning Parliament" either for the want of sense of the persons, or for their malice to leaured men; where to supply the Kings wants, a bill was exhibited against the Temperances of the Clergy, but by the conrage of the Archbishop of Canterburie (who told them, it was at the conuincing of themselves, not of the King, which they respected in their sacrilegious petitions) and by the gracious care of the King, (who vowed to leave the Church in better state then he found it, rather then in worse,) their motion vanished to nothing, but the infamous memory of the attempters. It is obserued, that a Knight the chiefe speaker in this bill against the Clergy, had bene himselfe a Deacon, and so himselfe first advanced by the Clergy. With great reason therefore did our forefathers distinguish the people into the learned and *learn*d, inferring truly that such commonie were *learn*d, who were not learned, and that *learn*d and wicked were but two words of one signification, as in this Parliament well appeared, whose Commons might enter Common with their cattle for any vertue which they had more then brute Creatures.

(43) Twice after this, betwene Christmas and Palmesunday, the King assembled the Seates againe; once at London, and then at Saint Alban, for the cause of money; but with much default, the Peeres of the land rising from the last Session thereof meanelly contented, as it well appeared not long after, though to the enterprises ruine. Thomas Marbrey Earle Marshall, one of the chiefe men which disliked the carriage of publike matters, draws Richard the Scrope Archbishoppe of York into a conspiracy, in full hope that Henry Percie Earle of Northumberland the Lord Bardolf, the Citizens of York, and the common people would assist their cause, which was gloied with the specious pretence of redressing publike abuses, hapning through the Kings default. The Earle of Westmerland hearing of this attempt, wherein the Earle Marshall and the Archbishoppe were leaders of the people, gathers a force to encounter them, but perceiving himselfe too feeble, he betakes himselfe to fraud, and by feining to like the quarrell, got them both into his power, and presented them as an acceptable oblation to the King, who about Whitsontide comes to York, where (albeit the Earle of Westmerland had promised them their liues) aswell the Archbishoppe, as the Earle Marshall were beheaded. But the next yeere the Pope excommunicated all such as had a hand in putting the Archbishoppe to death. It was said of Thomas Casler in a Satyricall libel, regnat sanguine manib.

Ad regnum quousq; venit ab exilio.
Who, first Exil'd, is after crown'd, His rage with blood will much abound.

(44) Thus the King veried in his person, who coming out of banishment, could not support his Title and estate, but by shedding much blood of subjects. For not contented with those two liues, he pursueth the Earle of Northumberland and Lord Bardolf with an invincible Armie of fiftene and thirty thousand men: but they vnable to make head against so mighty a force, take Berwick for refuge. Thither the King marcheth, at the found whereof, they both distrustfull of their safety, flee into Scotland, where the Lord Fleming entertains them. Berwick vpon hope of succours out of Scotland, (which gladly nourished the English miseries, and the English thies) refused to render, wherupon the King plants a battering piece against a Tower in the walls, which as it threw downe the halfe thereof with one shot, so did a quire overthrow all the defendants courages, who presently yielded the place vpon hard and desperate terms, for they were partly hang'd, and partly emprisoned. After Berwick was thus recovered, the King takes Alnwick, & all other Castles belonging to the Earle, and thinking the like happines would shine vpon him in Wales, he crosseth over thither, where it fell out far otherwise, not by the manhood of the Welsh, but by the sodaine rage of waters which destroyed his carriages and about fiftie wains (as was said, laden with much treasure: therefore he returns to Worcester. Owen Glendowr the chiefe captain of the Welsh naue, expecting & fearing a reuenge bad before this time condescended himselfe with the French, who in 140. thies arrived at Malford haven to the aid of Owen, having well nere fift loth all their horles in the passage for want of fresh water. The Lord Berkley and Henrie de Poy (by what meane appears not) burnt fiftene of that number in the harbour. They made the entrance of their warre by laying siege to the Towne of Carmarthen in South Wales, which, the Garrison being permitted to depart with baggage and baggage, was yielded.

(45) The King being againe in need of money, after long unwillingnesse and delay, the Parliament furnished him, rather overcome with wearinesse in contradiction, then for any great good will. Some of his treasure was employed, as it seemes, vpon secret practises with the Scots, that the Earle of Northumberland, and the Lord Bardolf might be deliuered into his hands, in exchange for some Scots.

whereupon they fled into Wales, and the seats misting their purpose, slew Daniel Lord Flemming for discovering their intention to his distressed guests, (as by the laws of honour and hospitality he was obliged) which filled Seotland with civil discords. To avoid the dangers whereof, and to better his education, the King of Scots sent his sonne and heire by sea into France, whom, together with the Bishoppes of Orkney certaine Mariners of Clay in Norfolke surprized at sea, and presented to the King, who committed him prisoner to the Tower of London. Meanewhile the French prosecuting their affaires in Wales, sent thither eight and thirty shippes full of souldiers, of which number the English tooke eight (the rest escaping in great feare to Wales), and not long after other fiftene shippes laden with waxe and wine. This fortune though good, was nothing in regard of the service which Henry Fay, with certaine shippes of the Cinque Ports, and about fiftene other, employed vpon a great Fleet, containing sixscore sail, whose loadings were yron, salt, oyle, and Rachel wine. The same times was a felon put to death for hating in many places of London, dared secretly to set vp bills, containing newes that King Richard was alive. The fearful plague of pestilence flew multitudes of people through the Realm, chiefly in London, where, within a short space is destroyed thirty thousand. That most renowned Captain Sir Robert Knollys, who had led so many laing men to their honourable deaths in battell, was now captured himselfe by death vpon the fiftenth day of August. His fame grew principally by martiall deedes in the great warres of France, vnder Edward the third, but speed and felicitie itselfe by good workes, among which the goodly stone-bridge at Rechefer in Kent was one.

(46) In the meane space, the wars of Wales were managed by Prince Henry, who tooke the Castle of Aberystwith; but Owen Glendower soone after got it againe by faire fraud, and thrust into it a Garrison of his owne. Thus Owen prospered for a time; but the Earle of Northumberland and Lord Bardolf forsaking Wales, and seeking to raise a force in the North, were encountered by the Sherife of Turkesbury, who after a sharpe conflict slew the Earle in the field, and so wounded the Lord Bardolf, that hee died thereof. The Earles head was cut off, which being first ignominiously carryed through London, was fixed vpon the Bridge. The King hauing thus vanquished his chiefe enemies, went to Turke, where iniquities were made for the Earles adherents, of which hee condemned, ransomed, and imprisoned many. The Abbot of Hales, because hee was taken fighting on the Earles behalfe, had sentence to die, which was executed vpon him by hanging. In forraigne and transmarine parts, the Kings affaires had mixt success; for Edmund Earle of Kent, at the siege of Brant in Britaine, was stricken with a quarrell into the head, whereof hee died; but yet after hee had first taken the said Castell, and leuid it with the earth.

(47) The peace of Christendome hauing bene long tempestuously troubled by a Schisme, raised by ambition of opposite Popes, whereof the one was chosen at Rome, the other at Auinion, by contrarie factions of the Cardinals: A general Council was summoned to bee held at Viza in Italie, whither the King of England sent his Ambassadors, and the Clergy elected Robert Alton Chancellour of Oxford, & Bishoppes of Sarum, to signifye, "that unless both the Popes would give ouer their Papacie, neither of them should be acknowledged for Pope. The King in his letter then sent to Pope Gregory, chategeth him (as Platina likewise doth) with Pernery, and that this Papall emulation had bene the cause of the murder of ^{more then two hundred} and thirty thousand Christians in warres. There assembled a great number of Cardinals, Archbishops, Bishoppes, and mired Prelates, who elected a new Pope, Alexander 5. (a man^{trained vp at Oxford}, where hee tooke degree in Theologie) reiecting the two others, who long and bitterly had contended for the place. The King also calls his Parliament to find out means for more money, to the subsidy and charge whereof hee ordained Sir Henry Scroppe, creating him Treasurer, as Thomas Beaufort the Kings halfe brother, Lord Chancellour. In which Parliament was renewed the sacrilegious Petition of spoiling the Church of England of her goodly parsonages, which the pietie and wisdom of so many former ages had consigned. But the King (who was bound by oath and reason to persecute the flourishing estate of the Church) detested their wicked proposition, and for that cause denied all other their requests. The Duke of Burgundie provisions which hee had made to reduce Calais to the French dominions, & stood at Saint Omers, were consumed with casual fire or silber.

(48) About these times the great and bloody factions betweene the Dukes of Burgundy and Orleanse brake forth. The cause was for a murder committed vpon Lewis a brother to the French king, and father of the said Duke of Orleanse, as hee came late one night from the Queens lodging, who at that time lay in of a child. The murderers to preuent pursuit, strewed galktrops behind them. The Duke of Burgundie iustified the fact, for that Lewis had (as hee said) laboured with the Pope to put the King from his seat, vpon pretence that hee was as vniu to gouerne as reuer Childerike was, whom Pope Zacharie pronounced against. This prepared the way for that keorge wherewith God meant to chastise the pride and sinnes of France. Each partie fought to forfice it selfe with friends, atwel at home as abroad. The Duke of Burgundie had the King and the Dolphin on his side; the other had the Kings of Nauarre and Aragon, the Dukes of Berry and Britaine with many of the mightiest Earles and Lords. The Duke of Burgundie, (who together with the King and the face of gouernment, kept in Paris) perceiving his adueraries strengthes to bee more then his owne, offers to the King of England, a daughter of France in marriage with the Prince, and many great promises, so as hee would be in defence of the King, & send ouer competent forces; whereunto hee is said to haue answered: *Our aduise is, that you should not in this case adventure battell with your enemies, who seeme to prosecute a just reuenge for the death of his Father; but labour to assuage the displeasure and anger of the exasperated young men by all the good means which are possible. If that cannot bee, then stand vpon your guard, and draw into place of meet safety, with such force of men as may best serue for your defence. After all this if hee will not bee appeased, you may with the better conscience encounter him, and in such case we will not faile (more fully) to dispe, according as your request. For the preiut hee sent ouer the Earls of Arundell and Kyme, and many men of Armes, with plenty of English Bow-men, who came first to Paris, where they in nothing diminished the ancient glory of their nation, but behanded themselves valiantly.*

(49) The Duke of Orleanse, and the Peeres of his faction, seeing their successe, consule how to draw the King of England from their enemy, and thereupon send ouer one Falconet and others, with solenne letters of credence, whom they made their irreuocable "Procurators, to entreat, agree, and conclude, (on their behalves) with the most excellent Prince, Henry by the grace of God King of England, and his most noble sonne, &c. for the restitution and reall redemerme "of the Duchie of Aquitaine, with all the rights and "appurtenances, which (as it is affirmed) are the inheritance of the said most excellent Lord the King of England, by them to bee made and done, &c. The Ambassadors hauing shewed forth this Prose, exhibited the points of their negotiation in their Articles, by which we may fee how farre the desire of reuenge will transport great minds: 1. That he should assaile against the said Duke of Burgundy and his followers, till they had repaired all the losses which they, their friends and servants had suffered through that occasion. 3. That he should help to settle the quiet of the realme &c.

Their demands.

The King forsakes the Duke of Burgundy and joins the Duke of Orleans.

(10) These Offers being put into the balance with the Articles, upon which the Duke of Burgundy had obtained succours, outweighed them so farre, that about the middle of August, before all those which had been sent with the Earle of Armadolet to the contrary part, were returned into England, aydes were decreed to the Duke of Orleans, to the wonnet of all men, who understood not the secret, so that Thomas Duke of Clarence, Edward Duke of York, the Earle of Dorset and very many other principall men with a competent puissance were sent over to ayde the Duke of Orleans, the Earle of Angoulême remaining hostage in England, for the sure payment of one hundred and nine thousand Crowns for performance of the other Articles: They came on shore in Normandy; but, whether the confederates moved with the perill into which their Country & Nation should by these means be precipitated, or for some other causes, (though none indeed so just, as the sorrow and shame for their so disloyall a combination with the Capitall enemies of France,) the Duke of Orleans (contrary to agreement) came not at the appointed time and place, whereupon the English burnt, spoiled and took much riches in the Castles, Countrey and good townes, therewith to satisfie themselves, till the Duke of Orleans should see them payd. At last yet the Dukes of Clarence and Orleans came to a treaty, after which the English campe toise peaceably and march into Aquitaine there to winter it selfe, the Duke of Orleans returning to his owne. While these matters were in hand, the Lord of Heyle Marshall of France with many other Lords, and about foure thousand men of armes layd siege to a certaine strong place in Gascoigne; which Sir John Blunt Knight, with three hundred soldiery not onely defended, but drave them also from the siege, taking prisoners twelve of the principall and about six score other Gentlemen. The King liued not to see the carriage, and fortune of these warres, for falling sicke at Eltham in the Christmas time (at which our ancient authors begin to draw the circles of their yeeres) but recovering himselfe a little, he repaired to London about Candlemas, there to hold a Parliament; the end whereof he liued not to see, but upon the twentieth day of March finished his short, but politicke and victorious reigne, in peace and bonour, had not the infirmity of his first entrance left a dishonourable stayne upon his worthiest actions.

(51) The vulgar Chronicles tell vs a strange Story, the truth whereof must rest upon the reporters. The King, say they, lying dangerously sicke, caused his Crowne to be set on a Pillow at his beds head, when suddenly the pangs of his Apoplexie seizing on him so vehemently that all supposed him dead, the Prince coming in, took away the Crowne; which, his father reviving, soone mist; and calling for his sonne, demanded, what he meant, to bereave him of that, whereto hee had yet no right? The Prince boldly replied; Long may you live Sovereign Father to waste your selfe; but all men deeming you were departed to inhabit another Crowne, this being my right, I tooke as mine owne, but now doe acknowledge for none of mine; and thereupon he set the Crowne againe where he found it. Oh sonne, (quoth hee) with what right I got it, God onely knoweth, who forgiveme the inane, but woe it was got, sayd the Prince, I meant to keepe and defend it, (when it shall bee myne) with my sword, as you by sword have obtained it. Which the King bearing, hee entered discourse of aduise, shewing him that hee feared some discord would arise betwixt him and his brother Thomas Duke of Clarence, who with better respect had borne forth his youth then Prince Henry had done, and whose distemper was like to breed great troubles, if it were not in time stayed. If my brethren (quoth Henry) will be true Subjects, I will honour them as my brethren, but if otherwise, I shall as soone execute iustice upon them, as on the month of birth in my Kingdom. The King reioicing at this unexpected answer; both prudently and Christianly charged him before God, to minister the law indifferently, to ease the oppressed, to beware of flatterers, not to deferre iustice, nor yet to be sparing of mercy. Punish (quoth hee) the oppressors of thy people, so shalt thou obtaine favour of God, and love and feare of thy Subjects, who whilst they have wealth, so long shalt thou have their obedience, but made poore by oppressions, will be ready to make insurrection. Reioyce not so much in the glory of thy Crowne, as meditate on the burthens, moos care which accompanieth it; mingle love with feare, so thou as the heart shalt be defended in the middle of the body: but know, that neither the heart without the members, nor a King without his Subjects helpe is of any force. Lastly my sonne love and feare God, ascribe all thy victories, strength, friends, obedience, riches, honour and all, unto him: and with the Psalmist say with all thanks, Nisi datus es Lord, non erat tibi laus thy help nonne te gressu laudat et prae.

Henry V.

HENRIE THE FIFTH, KING OF ENGLAND, AND FRANCE, LORD OF IRELAND, THE TWO AND FIFTIETH MONARCH OF ENGLAND, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSVE

Monarch 52

CHAPTER XV.

Monst the many Monarchs of this most famous Empire, none is found more complete with all heroicall vertues then is this King, whose life by order and successe of story wee are now to write, which is Henry of that name the fifth, the renowne of England, and glory of Wales. Of whom, what was spoken of Titus in the flourishing times of the Romans, may for the time of his raigne be truly verified in him: both of them being the lowly darling, and delightfull toy of Mankind. But as Titus is taxed by his Story- Writers, to youth to have been riotous, profuse, wastfull and wanton, for which (as he saith) with the dislikes of men he slept into the throne; so if wee will beleue what others have writ, Henry was wilde whilst hee was a Prince, whose youthfull pranks as they passed with his yeers, let vs haue leave here to rehearse, and leaue them motiues to our owne vse, as hee made them for his.

(1) His birth was at Mansfield in the Marches of Wales, the year of Christs assuming our flesh, 1388 and the eleuenth of King Richards raigne, his father then a Subiect, and Earle of Derby, Leicester, & Lincoln, afterwards created Duke of Hereford, inright of his wife, then of Lancaster, by the death of his father, and lastly by election made the Soueraigne of England, (that vnfortunate Richard) being deposed the Crowne. His mother was Mary second daughter and coheire of Humphrey Bohun Earle of Hereford, and Northampton, high Constable of England, as we haue said.

(2) His young yeeres were spent in literature in the Academie of Oxford, where in Queenes Colledge he was a Student vnder the tuition of his vncle Henry Beauford, Chancelour of that Vniuersity, afterwards Bishoppe of Lincoln and Winchester, and lastly made Cardinall by the title of Eusebius. But his Father obtayneing the Crowne, and himselfe come to the age of twaine yeeres, had the succesi-on thereof entailed on him by Parliament, and accordingly was created Prince of wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earle of Chesler, and presently had the Title of the Dukedome of Aquitaine conferred vpon him, the better to effect the thing then intended, which was to have obtained in marriage young Queene Isabel, late wife to the murdered King Richard, daughter of Charles the sixt, King of France.

(4) From Oxford, Prince Henry was called to Court, and the Lord Thomas Percy then Earle of Worcester made his Governour; but being himselfe false to the Father, could give no good example vnto the sonne, whose hostile attempts in the field of Sherburne cost that disloyall Earle his head, and almost had done Prince Henry his life, who in battell against him was wounded in the face with an arrow.
This mark of his manhood, with the overthrow of Hotspur in that bloody conflict, were hopeful signes of his following successe, which presently were seconded with as fortunate proceedings against Owen Glendower that scourge of his Countrey, and Arch-rebell vnto Englands peace, whom this Prince so pursued through the vast mountaines of wales, that from the Denues of those deserts hee durst not shew his face, but therein pestilish by famine, & naturall other wants, though the Prince had then scarcely attained vnto sixteen.

(5) But growne from his tutors command, or control, and come to the yeeres for dispole of himselfe, as his youth stood affected, so were his consorts, and those (many times) whose conditions were worse of the best; whether led by an inclination of youth (which commonly lets the raine loose vnto folly) or, to know that by proove, which other Princes doe by report, I will not determine: yet vnto the latter doe I rather incline, knowing that Salomon the wisest of Kings did so himselfe, and rather by Rosell am lead, who writeth that Prince Henry in Oxford had in great veneration, such as excelled in vertue or learning, and among many, two bee na-meth, Thomas Radclou of Merton Colledge a great A- scholar, by him preferred to the Bishopricke of S.
David in Wales, and John Carpenter of Oriel Col- ledge, a learned Doctor of Theologie, whom hee advanced to the See of Worcester. But let vs heare how his wilde mates were spent, and with what increase the harrell was got. The translator of Liuis, who wrote the storie of this worthy Prince, and dedicated his paines to King Henry his sonne, affirmeth for truth, that many actions hee did, farre vnfitting his greatnesse of birth; and among other, doth take him with no better then theft, who in the raigne of his Father, accompanied with such as spent their wits vpon other mens spoiles, laide waite in the way for his Renes recievers, and robd them of that which indeed was his owne, when sometimes in shuffling hee nothing was spared, but bare away many knocks.
The kinder whereof hee would frankly reward, when they complained vnto him of their losses re-ceiued, which euer were abated in the foot of their accounts.

Sir The. Eliot Governour.

(6) Outlearned Knight Eliot seeing his pen to portraire a perfect Governour, recordeth a story retaining this Princes great fame, the credit whereof lee is vpon himselfe. It chanced (saith he) a seruant of his to be arraigned for felony at the Kings Reuch-Barre, where standing ready to receive sentence of death, the Prince had intelligence, and posted thither, where finding his seruant made sure for flaring, commanded his feters to be stricke off, & the fellow arraigned to be freed the Court. All men amazed at this his approach and speech: the Chiefe Iustice hood vp, and shewed the Prince that his late was the Kings, that lawes were the lawes of the Common-wealth, that himselfe was sworn to doe Iustice, and must yeeld an account for all that hee did, that hee honored him as the eldest sonne of his Soue-raigne, and Prince, but to let free the prisoner, hee could not, having so apparently endangered his life to the law, and therefore desired the Prince, if hee held him in such esteeme, to save him by pardon from the King, and not to infringe the law, which he told him plainly he should not doe.

(7) The Prince enraged to haue the deniall affaid himselfe to let free the Prisoner, which the Chiefe Iustice forbadd, commanding him vpon his allegiance to cease from such riot, and to keepe the Kings peace: whereat Prince Henry in a fure threpe vnto the Bench, and gaue the Iudges blow on the face, who nothing daunted, first still, and with a bold countenance, spake thus to the Prince, Sir I pray you remember your selfe, this seat of iudgement which you I possesse, is not mine, but your Fathers, to whom and to his lawes you owe double obedience. If this I misse be thus contemned, and his lawes violated by you, that should sweare your selfe obedient to both, who will obey you when you are a Soueraigne, or minister execution to the lawes that you shall make? wherefore, for this attempt, in your Fathers name, I counsel you prisoner vnto the Kings Bench, there to remaine until his Maiesties pleasure be further known. With which words the Prince greatly abashed, stood mute by the Iudges, and fixing his eyes vpon his reuerend face, presently laid from him his weapons, and with humble obedience done, departed to prison. The King vnderstanding the whole circumstance, greatly reioy-ced that hee had some of such obedience to his lawes, and a Iudge so vp-right to administer them without either fauour or feare of the person; notwithstanding for this, and other like actions of his youth, hee removed him from being President of his Princes Council, and placed in his stead Thomas Duke of Clarence his second brother; to Prince Henric it little grieued and discontented.

(8) Howbeit his followers were nothing diminished, but his Court frequented more then his fathers, which bred some suspition in the crazie kings head, left among his other wild parts, hee would attempt to play with his Coyne, which was increased by his domestick flatterers, who dayly buzzed new ialousies into his eares. This made Prince Henry (as Ottherbourne noteth) to strengthen himselfe with his chiefe friends, and well-willers, and with such a troupe repaired to his fathers Court, as a greater in those dayes had not bene before. The translator of Liuis reports the manner of his approach, euen from him that was an eye witness, and the same no lesse then the Earle of Ormond in Ireland, whose relation is this.

Tho. Ottherbourne.

(9) The King somewhat craie, and keeping his Chamber, hearing newes dayly of his sonnes loose exercises, too meane for a Prince, and their contributions euer made to aine at his Crowne, hee both be-ganne to withdraw his fatherly affection, and to feare some violence against his owne person: which when Prince Henry heard of, by some that fauoured him of the Kings Council, in a strange disguise hee repaired to his Court, accompanied with many Lords and noble mens sonnes. His garment was a gowne of blew Satten, wrought full of Eyot-holes, and at every Eyot the Needle left hanging by the silke it was wrought with: about his arme hee wore a daye-roller full set of S.S. of gold, the Treat ther-of being most fine gold. This comming to West- minster, and the Court of his Father, having commanded his followers to aduance no further then the fire in the hall, himselfe accompanied with some of the Kings household, passed on to his presence, and after his duty and obedience done, offered to make knowen the cause of his comming. The king wakened with sicknesse, and suppling the word, commanded himselfe to be borne into a withdrawing Chamber, some of his Lords attending vpon him, before whose feet Prince Henry fell, and with all reuerent obsequies, spake to him as followeth.

(10) Most gracious Soueraigne and renowned father,

"father, the suspicion of disloyalty, and dimnished reports of my dangerous intendments towards your royall Person and Crowne, hath enforced at this time, and in this manner, to present my selfe and life at your Maiesties dispose. Some faules and mispent time (with blithes I may speake it) my youth hath committed, yet those made much more by such fleeing pickthinks, that blow them through into your vniwilling and distillie care. The name of Soveraigne ties allegiance to all, but of a Father, to a further feeling of natures obedience; so that my finnes were double, if such suggestions possessed my heart: for the Law of God ordaineth, that he which doth presumptuously against the Ruler of his people shall not live, and the child that smiteth his father shall die the death: so farre therefore am I from any disloyall attempt, against the person of you my Father, and the Lords appointed; that if I knew any of whom you stood in the least danger or feare, my hand according to duty shall be the first to free your suspicion; yet I will most gladly suffer death to ease your perplexed heart; and to that end I have this day prepared my self both by confession of my offences past, and receiving the blessed sacrament. Wherefore I humbly beseech your Grace to free your suspicion from all feares conceived against mee, with this dagger, the stabbe whereof I will willingly receive here at your Maiesties hand, and to doing, in the presence of these Lords and before God at the day of iudgement, I clearly forgive my death. But the King melting into teares, cast downe the naked dagger (which the Prince deliuered him) and raising his prostrate soane, embraced and kissed him, confessing his eares to have bene over-credulous that way, and promising neuer to open them againe against him. But the Prince vanisished, infinitely desired, that at least his accusers might be produced, and if convicted, to receive punishment, though not to the full of their demerites; to which request the King replied, that as the offence was capital, so should it be examined by the Peeres, and therefore willed him to rest contented vntill the next Parliament. Thus by his great wisdom he fastid his father from further suspicion, and recovered his loue that neuerly was lost. Hetherto of Henry as he was Prince (some ocher of whole youthly actions we will forbeare in his fathers raigne) and now to his Acts after he was King.

(11) Henry ordained successor, and overseer of his dying Fathers Testament, had in his entrance to fortunate proceedings, as hee seemeth to exceed all his Predecessors; his Nobles proffering the oath of their Allegiance, before him selfe had made his, for the iust goauernment of the Common-wealth, which lo farre was from separation, that hee desired God neuer to admit him to the Crowne, vntill he should to his glory raigne, and rule the Scepter to the good of the Subiects. The day of his entrance and of his Fathers death, being the twentieth of March, and yeeke of Christs Incarnation, according to our accounts, 1412. on the ninth of Aprill following hee was solemnly crowned at Westminster, Thomas Arundell Archbishoppe of Canterbury performing the roiall Ceremonies: which no sooner was ended, but to beginne a good gouernment, hee beganne with himselfe, banishing from his preiſence and Court the vnbridled youthes which had bene his comforters, commanding them richer to change their manners, or neuer to approach within ten miles where hee lay. Then chose hee worthy and prudent men for his Councell of Estate, and aduanced his Chapley with dignity and power: being himselfe as zealous in devotion, as liberal in building, and indowing of places for deuotion of others. His Iustice was found of all that sought it; for every day after dinner for the space of an houre, his iustice was to leane on a cushion set by his exchequer, and there himselfe received petitions of the oppressed, which with great equity he did redresse.

And for a further testimony of his tender and compassionate heart, the slaughtered body of K. Richard once-meane entered at Langley, in great estate hee removed into Saint Peters Church at Westminster, and there laid him enshroued by Queene Anne his first wife (as him selfe had desired and prepared) founding a weekly memoriall to bee celebrated, and six shillings eight pence thereon distributed vnto the poore, and yeeleie twentie pounds giuen vpon his anniversary day, besides foure tapers to burne before his monument day and night for euer. And so neerely did his death touch this innocent King, that hee sent to Rome to bee absolved from that guilt of his fathers Act, by the Popes holinelle, then accounted another God; whose penance enioined, he willingly performed, and afterwards purposed to haue made warre in Palestine against the enemies of Christs; for which end, hee sent Sir Hugh de Lang of Hennault to Ierusalem, to discover the state of things there; but before his returne he was departed to the heavenly Ierusalem himselfe.

(12) The obsequies of his Father being solemnized at Canterbury, and the King in person attending the Corps, sice occasion was giuen vnto Archbishoppe Arundell to complain of the Witchbishops, (then termed Lollards) great rube in the wayes of the Clergies pride and proceedings; whereof Sir John Oldcastle was thought a chiefe, who by his marriage contracted with a kinswoman of the Lord Cobham of Chesham in Kent, obtained the title thereof, a man strong and valourous, and in especiall fauour with his Prince. This Knight in their Synode assembled at London, immediately after the Kings Coronation, was accused by them to haue rent Christs sacrament, in maintaining Wickliffes doctrine to bee taught, especially in the Diocesse of London, Becheles, and Hereford: against whom also some chollie Inquisitors at Oxford, appointed for Heretics (though that whole Vniverſitie had formerly vpheld both Wickliffe and his doctrine,) informed and presented his name with two hundred forty sixe conclusions, which they had collected to be hereticall.

(13) The King incensed (by the Archbishops suggestions) against these discontented dilapliners, was further made beleeue that they themselves had set vp billes in diuers places, threatening that an hundred thousand persons were ready for armes, against all that withstood their reformation, and among these that Oldcastle his Knight was repeated the chiefe. The King graciously inclined, heare the Archbishops complaint, and being at Kennington promised to conferre with the Lord Cobham himselfe, which accordingly hee did, infinitely willing him to submit himselfe to the censure of the Church and obedience of the Archbishoppe: but Cobham, no tyme coere from his profession, haumbly told the King he owed his subiection only vnto his Maieaty whom God had placed in these his Dominions, as his onely priegerent to gouerne his people and Subiects, and that himselfe forced nothing Rome lesden sword, vntheated by the Pope (that Anichrist) against the Lords seruants, nor would suffer the key of Canterbury to open the closet of his conscience, where the spirit of God was residing, bearing witness with his conscience stood in the truth for whose defence as his Champion, he was ready to liue or die.

(14) This answer received, was so deliſtered vnto the Archbishoppe, with power to cite, examine and punish, as their owne Canons in such cases had decreed. The Lyon thus laid for, whose paw they still feared, was leried by proceesse to appeare in the Archbishops Court, and the same deliuered by one Bulwer a leuant of the Kings Priuy Chamber, for that the bold Sumner durst not dole himselfe, and the Archbishoppe (diligent lest he should forget the day) caused his letters citatorie to be set vpon the gates of the Cathedral Church of Becheles, which were preliently tumbled down, and others againe set vp, were againe pulled off, to the great offence of the Clergies eye, and the rather, for that the Actor could not be knowne. The Knight not appearing (as knowing their malice and his own danger) was condemned of contumacie, and afterwards in a Synode at Rochester, was by the Archbishop pronounced an Heretike, where himselfe then enacted that heretikal decree, that the holy scriptures should not be translated into the English tongue. But marke the iudgement that fell vpon his own tongue, whose rootes and blade shortly after (as is recorded) grew so big in his mouth and throat, that he could neither speake nor swallow downe meat, but in horror lay languishing, till lastly he so dyed starved by famine.

(15) In the meane time the Lord Cobham wrote his Belief, which was very Christunlike, and presented it himselfe to the King, who (being much prepossessed) in no wise would receive it, but suffered him to bee summoned in his presence, and priuie Chamber, when the Knight for his purgation offered an hundred knights and Esquires, which would not be accepted; then, according to his degree of Order, and law of Armes, he required the single Combat to fight for life or death, with either Christian or Heathen in the quarrell of his faith, the King and Council onely excepted. This notwithstanding could not be suffered, but needs must he appeare before the Archbishop his Iudge: where, after diuers examinations (in all which hee most religiously iustified himself & his profession) he was condemned of Heresie, and committed Prisoner vnto the Tower of London, whence shortly he escaped, and got into Wales.

Vpon which escape great feares were conceived, especially of the Clergy, the causes of his troubles, and mortal Enemies to him & his wellwillers, for the king was confidently (but as it seemeth maliciously) informed; that Oldcastle with his adherents laid for his life, & that in S. Giles Fields neere vnto Holborne twenty thousand were to assemble in hostile manner, with an intent to destroy the Monasteries of Westminster, Saint Albans, all the religious houses in London, and the Cathedral Church of Saint Pauls. The King therefore in person himselfe after midnight with a great Army came into these fields, where (if we will believe their professed enemies) fourescore of that faction were apprehended, who sayd they came to seeke the Lord Cobham. But as the answerer of Copius from more ancient times hath observed, that in daies of persecution, such assemblies often had beene made to heare the Gospel preached, which otherwise they could not enjoy: so in this place * then overgrown with bushes and vnto for battell, those few were in likelihood assembled vnto John Beuery agodly man their Preacher, without any intent of treason, having for their Chieftaines no greater persons then Sir Roger Allan a Knight of no great account, a Minister, and a male man. But their Apologies we lue to authors, onely the Lord Cobham could not be found, though the King by Proclamation had promised a thousand markes to his taker, besides many liberties to the City or Towne, that would disclose him; & whereby (John Walsley) it may be guessed, that the whole Kingdome, well were, embraced his opinions which that Fryar calls his madnesse. Thirty feares of that assembly were condemned, whereof of scaues were consumed with fire and strangled, Allan, Beuery, and Mary were likewise executed.

(16) As the zeale of this King is much commended for his fauours towards his Clergy, so is his Princely pietie in the commiseration of young Perce distressed, whose father Haywar slaine at Shrewsbury (as we haue said) and hee by his Grandfather sent into Seotland for security, was there notwithstanding detained a Prisoner, for that James their King was forcibly kept in England by Henrie, and as they rooke it against all Iustice. But his occasion being offered for young Perce release, and exchange made betwene him and Abride sonne of Robert Duke of Albany (who had bene taken prisoner at the Battell of Halidon) the king restored him not only in blood, and to grace in his Court, but also inuested his person with the Title and State of his Grandfather, to his owne no little honour, and faithfull seruice attained of that honourable family.

(17) Vpon Archbishop Arundels death, starved by famine as we haue said * Henry Chicheley a stout Champion also against Walsley's doctrine, was with the Kings consent, by the Monkes of Canterbury elected their Archbishop, which the politticke Elec neither accepted nor reuiled, but left it to the will and pleasure of the Pope: who first tooke snuffe that it so farre proceeded without his direction, yet was soone pacified by Chicheley's submission, and (as faith mine Author) with other Gratiulations besides. The man though not so rich by birth as Arundel was, yet as strong for the Clergy, and more gracious with his Prince as the feble proud.

(18) The first allies of both was made knowne in a Parliament holden at Leicester, where in a Bill exhibited, complaint was made, that the temporall Lands giuen to religious houses and spiritual persons for deuotion were either superfluous, or disorderly spent; whose reuenues (if better imployed) would suffice for the defence of the Land, and honor of the king; fifteen Earles, fifteen hundred knights fixe thousand two hundred Esquires, and one hundred Almshouses, for the reliefe of impotent and diseased persons, and vnto the kings Cofters twentie thousand pound by yeere. Which Bill (John Hall) made the fat Abbot to sweate, the proud Prior to frowne, the poore Friars to curle, the silly Nunnes to weepe, and indeed all her Merchants to feare, that Rabell would downe.

(19) To stop the breach of which searching spring, no better meanes could be found, then to direct the Parliament with other businesse, and to driue other proiects into the kings munde, whose head (as this new Archbishoppe there tolde him) "had the best right to the Crowne of France: for not onlie the Dutches of Normandy, Aquitaine, and Arroun, the Counties of Gales, Gascon, Mein, and the rest, were his lawfull though vnlawfull "detained inheritance; but therewithall the whole "R Realme of France, as true heire vnto his great "Grandfather king Edward the third, and vnto "Philip the faire, in right of his mother Queene Isabella, the only daughter and Child liuing of the "said French king. As for the law Salique alleged "against the English claime, he affirmed, that Text "touched only those parts in Germany, which lay "betwixt the riuers Elbe, and Sala conquered by "king Charles the great, who placing his French "there to inhabite, for the discomfort of those "Germane women made this law. In terram Salicam Mulieres non succedant, which the Gloss did "falsly expound for the whole kingdome of France.

Whose practise notwithstanding he shewed to be the contrary, by many experiences both in king Peppin which depouled Childericke by the claime of heire General (as defended of Walsley daughter to Clotwars the first), and by Hugh Capet, who, viurping the Crowne vpon Charles Duke of Lorraine (the sole heire male of that line from Charles the great) to make his claime good; which indeed was "stark naught) deriued himselfe as heire to the Lady Lingular, daughter to Charlemaine, sonne to Lewis the Emperour, that was sonne to Charles the great. King Lewis also called the Saint; (who was the heire to the viurper Hugh Capet) could not bee fauished in conscience, how he might iustly keepe and possesse the Crowne of France, till he was falsly instructed that Isabel his Grandmother was lineally descended of the Lady Ermengard daughter and heire to the aboue named Charles Duke of Lorraine, by the which marriage the blood and line of Charles the great was againe vntied, and restored to the Crowne of France. Whereby (said "the Archbishop) most manifestly appeared, that the

but not the French.

Their claiming by the same title.

"the title of Peigne, the Claine of Capet, the possession of Lewis, yea of the French Kings themselves to this day, deriue their onely rights from their heires femall, and that this pretended Law Salique was but a shifting device to debarre the English Kings from the claine of the French Crown. Which exclamation howsoever they pretend to be right, yet the law of God (say he) hath made it mere wroong, which with better regard of the Sex alloweth the woman to inherite her fathers possession, as we see in the practise of that state, where of Christ himselfe is called king, where the five daughters of Zelophead for want of heires males, were admitted to succede to their fathers inheritance, allotted them in the Tribe of Manasse; and a law made by the Lord himselfe, that if a man died and had no sonnes, then his inheritance should be transferred vpon his daughters. Neither is it to be doubted but that the daughter of Shebam was the sole heire vnto her fathers patrimony, he dying without issue male, though shee married an Egyptian, whose posterity had their possessions among the Tribe of Isacharn, to the Captiuitie of Babylon: so that if such a law were, as in truth there was no such, better were the breach by the warrant of diuine direction, then the continuance by colour of such prescription, seeing God hath ordained as well for the daughter as for the sonne.

(20) The Archbishops vnexpected but not vnprepared Oration thus ended, so stirred the blood of the young Courageous King, that his heart wasall on a flame; and so tickled the eares of his Auditory, that they presently conceived that France was their owne, the Title whereof descending from Isabel, the mother of the famous third Edward, and thence the daughter and suruating heire vnto Philip the faire, his right was, lineally deriued thence as followeth, first Philip by Isane his first wife intirely Queene of Nauarre, had three sonnes and one daughter, namely Lewis, Philip and Charles, all three successiely Kings, and this Lady Isabel, by whom the English claine: his second wife was Constance the daughter of the King of Sicily, who bare him a sonne after his owne decesse which liued not many daies after his father. Lewis his eldest sonne and tooth of that name succeeded Philip in the Kingdom of France, and by Margaret his wife the daughter of Burgundy had his daughter Iane intirely Queene of Nauarre, who made claine also vnto the French Crowne, but neuer attained it; so that her Title fell with her death. Lewis by his second wife Clarence of Sicily, had a sonne named Iohn borne vnto him, but presently both father and sonne departing this life, left the Scepter to his second brother, who by the name of Philip the first, a while wore the Emperiall Crowne, of France: his wife was Iane the daughter of Burgundy, who bare vnto him only foure daughters.

(21) Vnto King Philip succeeded his brother Charles the faire, the fourth of that name, whose first wife was Blanch, detected of incontinency and brought him no fruite, his second wife was Mare daughter to Henry Luxemburg the Emperour, who bare him a sonne that dyed soone after birth, and the mother likewise shortly came to her graue, Margaret the daughter to the Earle of Euroux, was his third and last wife, who at his death hee left with Child, and thus the three sonnes of Philip were breached, reigned, and died, whom Queene Isabel their sister succeeded, and in that right her sonne King Edward the third, by his royall consanguinity whilst the Crowne stood thus at suspense, till a Prince should be borne, claimed to be Regent in the Interregnum, and in the anage of the looked for issue, against which, Philip de Valois sonne of Charles the hardy, who was brother to Philip the faire, being a second branch from Hugh Capet, and first Prince of the blood of France, maintained that the Regency of the male (if so he were borne) as also of the Realme

(if a daughter or the sonne dyed) belonged onely vnto him as the next in blood. The state thus standing, and a daughter borne, Philip was saluted and proclaimed King, no other right alleged then this foisted and falliey termed fundamentall law Salique, for no otherwise doth Ottoman the French famous Lawyer esteeme of that vngodly and vniuelt Ordinance, if any such had bene ordained.

(22) The Kings right thus apparent, and sufficient possessions to be had in France: the Bill of complaint against the Clergies excesses was quite dashed, and all mindes addicted for the affaires that way; thinking it vnreasonable to pull the Provisions from their animes and brethren, when as the Circuit of their inheritance extended more large in compass and therefore with the Daniers they determined no longer to sit so pent with increase, seeing God had giuen them another Kingdome, but would free their own straitnesse by dint of sword, and spread their Tents wider in the Continent of France: Neither was there any motine more forcible in conference, then was the successe of those intruding Princes, who assailed the Crowne by that vniual claine of law Salique.

(23) For did not the sword of God (rather then man) in the hand of King Edward the claimer cut downe the flower of France in the Battell of Crecie, with the slaughter of Lewis King of Bohemia, of Charles the French Kings brother, of James Dapkin of Viennois, the Dukes of Lorraine, and Barben, the Earles of Armorie, Sauoy, Montbelliard, Flanders, Niuer and Harcourt, the Grand Priour of France, the Archbishop and Zancinus and Neyone, of Lords, Barons, and Gentlemen to the number of 1500 with 30 thousand of the French Souldiers, and Philip not able of himselfe to defend himselfe, inciting Dauid of Scotland to invade and weaken England, therein did but only vex his owne spirit, for in that attempt the Scottish King was taken prisoner and brought so to London, leaving Philip to struggle with his hard fortunes in France, which with bad successe hee died to the day of his death.

(24) Iohn his sonne by the same title and elaine felt the same brooke of iustice from the hand of that thunderbolt in warre Edward surnamed the blacke Prince, the sonne of England Mary, who farre inferior to the French in number, farre exceeded them in marshall power, when at the battell of batliers the French royall Standard was stroke downe, an hundred English wonne by the English the Constable, Mattheall and great Chamberlaine of France with fifty two Lords and seuen hundred Gentlemen slaine in the field. King Iohn himselfe, his sonne Philip, two Bishops, thirteene Earles, and one and thirty Lords taken prisoners by the Prince, to his great praise and confirmation of his iust cause.

(25) Nor was the possitment of the father any whit lessened in King Charles the sonne then reigning, who besides the intestine warres in his own dominions was by Gods iust iudgement strake into a Linnacy, being vnable to gouerne himselfe much lesse his Kingdome, vpon which advantage (as the French would haue it) King Henry now playd; though it be most certaine he sought his right farre otherwise, for so it standeth vpon record dard the ninth of February and first of Henry the fifth his reign, that he sent his Ambassadors vnto the French King, who could not be admitted to his presence, and him whom they employed to procure access was by the French committed to Prison: wherat King Henry most iustly conceived a grudge, Paulus Emilius their owne Scoy-writer faith, that Henry King of England sent honorable Ambassadors to demand in marriage the Lady Katherine daughter vnto the French King: which (as he faith) was neglected with this answer, that the King had no leisure to thinke on that business: whom Franciscus Rosellinus doth further enlarge, saying, the King scornfully snubbed answered that France was neither destitute of Dukes, nor hee as least to thank of the Prophecy; and being jealous lest Burgaigne would match his daughter with Henry, sent him a command to the contrary, and again at their Conclusion of peace, expressly enioyned the said Duke, and all other Princes of the blood, not to make any alliance of marriage with England, whereby K. Henry was further exasperated against France. And lastly, by his counsell and conference vpon the Archbishops Oration sent a Summons and demand of the Dutches of Normandy, Aquitaine, Guyen, & Anjou, in derision thereof, as Caxton recordeth, the Dukes of France, sent him a Tonne of Tennis Balls, as Ballets most fit for his tender hands, who had spent his youth (as he thought) more among Rackets, then regard of his person or matters of State: so forward is man to be an Actor in common miseries, when the Fates haue made the Subject of the Scene Tragical, that hee drawes the hand of Desdemona, sooner to strike, and heavier to fall vpon that proiect decreed to bee cast downe: for by these dildaius and vnprincely dealings the Crowne of France was graft by the English hard hand, and that faire soile stained with her Natiues owne blood: for the Prince receiued as it was sent, had promise to bee repayed with balles of more force, whose stroke should bee such as the strongest gates of Paris should not be sakers sufficient to bandy the rebound.

(26) Grudges thus growne, and warres in preparing, the French thought it fittest to make Scotland their friend, whom they incited to molest the English Marches, which accordingly was done, and that with such violence, as it was a question decideable, whether of the Kingdoms was first to be dealt with. Westminster thought it safest to checke the Scots as the ancient and continual backe-friends. But Essex held it better policy to beginne with France the stronger, especially now disquieted through the factions of Burgundy and Orleans, and vnto this the most voices gaue way, whose forwardness was such, that the Clergy granted a Truce, and the temporall Lords their aides to the King, as followeth.

To put back the Scots, Sir Robert Pymfrenle was sent who in a skirmish vpon Mary Magdalens day tooke 360 of them prisoners, and with great spoile returned to Rockberough Castle whereof hee had charge, the news whereof K. Charles vnderstanding, and the great preparation made against France, being better aduised vpon the dangerous content, sent his Ambassadors into England, whereof the Archbishops of Bourges was principall, who at Winchester made offer of money, and some other Territories (but none of the best) with the Princess Lady Katherine to be giuen in marriage vnto King Henry, so that he would dissolue his Arme, and conclude a peace. To this Oration the Archbishops of Canterbury made answer, that his King demanded the Dutches of Aquitaine and Anjou, with the other Seignories anciently appertaining to his Progenitors the Kings of England, which as they were his most rightfull and lawfull inheritance, so would hee wish all possible diligence endeavour (if not otherwise) by fire & sword to recover, which his assertion the King himselfe in presence confirmed.

(27) But Burges the Archbishops presuming more vpon his Prelacy, then respectiue vnto whom hee spake, with an vnreuerend boldnesse (liberty obtained) seconded his Ambassage with the termes of an Herald, and with bended bowes thus spake to the King: I thinkest thou & King wrongfully to put downe and destroy the most Christian, the most renowned, and the most excellent King of all Europe, both in blood and preeminence, or thinkest thou that our mighty Soueraigne Charles hath offered thee lands, summes of money and possessions with his most beautiful daughter, either in feare of thee, of thy English Nation, or of all thy well-willers whomsoever? I tell thee no, but moved in pity as a leuer of peace, and to save the shedding of christian blood, hath made thee these offers: & his cause being supported by equity and truth, God and his good Subjects be trusteth will set a period forme to thy quarrell. Wee therefore his Ambassadors demand thy safe conduct to passe out of thy Realme, and that thou wilt write thine answer, and send it vnder thy seale.

(28) Henry now whil daunted with his big looks and words, answered the Archbishops with milder and better set termes: My Lord (said he) little esteeme of your gallant brauadoes, and lesse weigh your imagined power or French bragges. I know my owne right to your Region, and so doe you: felues, wileste you will deny a most apparent truth: the strength of your Master your dayly see, but mine as yet you haue not tasted, he (you say) hath many louing subjects and friends, and (God be thanked) I haue both as well affected to mee, with which, ere long I hope to make the highest crowne in your Country to stoop, and the proudest Miter to kneele downe: And say to the Viceroy your Master, that within this three monethes, I will enter France, not as into his land, but as into mine owne lawfull patrimonie, intending to conquer it not with bragging words, nor flattering orations, but by power and dint of sword, though Gods assistance in whom I trust: and I assure you I will not speake the word, the which I will not write and subscribe, nor will I subscribe to that to which I willingly will not set my seale. Therefore your safe conduct shall bee dispatched, and mine answer in writing deliuered, which once receiued you may depart into your Country, when I trust sooner to visite you, then that you shall haue cause to hid me welcome.

(29) The Statute enacted, the first of his raigne hee now put in execution, and commanded the French out of his land, according to that made the 13. of Richard 2. which disabled the Alien Religious to enioy any Benefices within England, and now fearing to nourish a snake in his bosome, King Henry forbade the French from all preferments Ecclesiasticall, and those Priors Aliens consensual, who had institution and induction, to per in security, not to disclose, or cause to be disclosed, the counsell nor secrets of the Realme: and that the French might hold hold his dealings honourable, and open, hee sent Anthonis his purfuant at Armes, vnto King Charles with letters of defiance: next making Queene loose his mother in Law the Regent of the land, he drew his forces vnto Southampton, commanding his followers there to attend him in readinesse by the fealt of Saint Iohn Baptist ensuing.

(30) Charles the French King expecting present invasion, sent his Ambassadors vnto Iohn the first Duke of Brittain, who had married his daughter with an hundred thousand Crowns, to leue forces for his aide, and a fewell worth five thousand Crownes more to himselfe, which the Duke promised to come in person to performe. And as it is reported, King Charles sent to Serape, Grey and Cambridge (all three in especiall fauour with the King) a million of gold to betray Henry into his hands, or to murder him before hee should arrive in Normandy. These to make their faction longer, though Serape was Lord Treasurer, Grey a Privie Councellor, & Cambridge the sonne of Edmund Duke of Turke, meant to draw in, Edmund Earle of Marck the sonne of Roger Admirer, and finally the heire vnto Lionel Duke of Clarence, the next in succession for the house of Turke, and revealing their intended purpose, forced him to sweare to their secrecie, which if hee refused, they threatened his death: whereupon he required but an howres respite, which hardly granted, he went to the King and revealed the conspiracie, even the night before the day that hee meant to put to act.

(31) The parties apprehended and brought before him in presence of many nobles, King Henry thus spake: With what horror O Lord may anie true English heart consider that you for pleasing of a forreine enemy, should imbrue your hands in our blood, as also in the blood of our brethren, to the toine of your owne native soile I reuenge herein touching my person though I seeke not; yet for the safeguard of you my deare friends, and for due prefecution of the Realme, I am by place and office to minister remedy against these Offenders: Get you hence therefore you miserable wretches, to receive the iust reward of your deeds, wherein God giue you repentance for your foule finnes.

(32) Notwithstanding this their offence, their indiuement as it standeth in the Record, includes matter of other quality: that, Richard Earle of Cambridge of Canterbury in the County of Turke, and Thomas as Grey of Heaton in the Countie of Northumberland Knight, for that they in the twentieth of Iuly and third of King Henry the fifth reignes, at Southampton had conspired together with a power of men, to haue led away the Lord Edmund Earle of March into Wales, and to haue procured him to take the Government of the Realme, in case that King Richard the second were dead; with a purpose to haue put forth a Proclamation in the name of the said Earle as heire to the Crowne, against King Henry by the name of Lancaster usurper, and further to haue conveyed a Banner of the Armes of England, and a certaine Crowne of Spain set vpon a Pall (laying eye to the said Earle of Cambridge;) into Wales; As also that the said conspirators had appointed certaine into Scotland, to bring thence one Trumpington, and another resembling an ishop, fauour and countenance King Richard. And Henrie Serape of Malghem in the Countie of Turke was likewise indicted as consenting to the Premises. Thus well appeared their purpose, though Richard Earle of Cambridge, considering the possibillity of his owne issue had secretly carried that boile: whose fortowfull letter of his owne hand writing, as it came to ours, we thinke not unwise here to insert.

Most dreadfull and Sovereign Liege Lord, I Richard Turke your humble Subject, and very Leigeman, beseech you of grace, of all manner of offences which I haue done or offered vnto, in any kind by stirring of other felts, egging me vnto, whereas I was well I haue highly offended in your Highnesse, beseeching you at the remembrance of God, that you like to take mee into the hands of your mercifull and pitious grace, thinking yet well of your great goodness my Liege Lord: my full trust is, that you will haue consideration (though that my person be of some value,) your high goodness (where God hath set you in so high estate) to every Leigeman, that you length, plentifully to giue; that you like to accept this my simple request for the loue of our Lady and the blessed holy Ghost, in whom I pray that they may your heart ever to all pittie and grace for their high goodness. Notwithstanding this his humble petition vpon the sixt of August following, hee, with Serape, and Grey, were beheaded, and his body with head cnerred in the Chappell of Gods house in Southampton; whose apprehensions, arraignments, and deaths, were so followed each after others, as the French knew not, but that the reason had successe, and their returned Ambassadors told it for certaine, that King Henry had either dismissed his Army, or (which was thought more true) himselfe was slaine by the Conspirators; so easie an entrance hard babbling report into the wide eares of credulous deile.

(33) But King Henrie now ready to embarke his men, vpon Wednesday the fourteenth of August with fiftene hundred Saile tooke to Seas, attended with six thousand speares, and twenty foure thousand footmen besides Gunners, Enginers, Artificers and Labourers a great number, and the fiftenth of the same month cast Anchor in the mouth of Seuere, at a place called Kidwiler, about three miles from Marlow, where he landed his men; and failing desuently vpon his knees, desired Gods assistance to recover his right, making Proclamation vpon paine of death, that Churches should be spared from all violence of spoile, that Churchmen, women and Children, should not be hurt, abused or wronged: then puing the order of Knighthood to many of his followers hee assigned his Standards to men of milt strength and courage, which done he tooke the hill nere adioyning, and thence sent his spiall to the Towne of Marlow, making that the first assay of his fortunes in France. But before we enter any further discourse in the affaires of that Kingdome, it shall not be amisse to speake of things commenced in England before that King Henry tooke to the Seas.

(34) The Churches throughout Christendome, hauing bene disquieted the space of twentie nine years, and now growne intolerable, through the schismaticall ambitions, maintained by three Papall Monarchs, mounted into Saint Peters seate, each of them grasping the Chair with so fast a silt, that the toints thereof were forced alunder; and the triple Crowne so battered with their thunderbolts of their curses that it was flatted and made vnfit for any of their heads. The petitions arreared were Iohn 23. by the Italians elected; the second was Gregory 12. whom the French had set vp; and the 3. was Benedict 13. preferred to the place by the Spaniards. These striving for the helme, the ship was so flattered, that her wracke was apparant vpon their raging and vnquiet Seas. To preuent which the Christian Princes put their helping hands, and by a generall confent, ordained a generall Councell to be held at Constance in Germany, which began in February 1414. and continued about the space of three yeeres; wherein were assembled besides the Emperour, the Pope and the Pallgrave of Rheine, foure Patriarchs, twentie seuen Cardinals, forty seauen Archbishops, one hundred and sixty Bishops, Princes, Barons and Gentlemen with their attendants about thirtie thousand.

(35) Vnto this Councell King Henry sent Richard Clifford Bishop of London, Robert Malam Bishoppe of Salisbury, made Cardinal, and died at the same Councell. Iohn Ketwiche, Bishop of Conseuer and Lichfield, Nicholas Salisbury Bishop of Bath and Wells, Iohn Wakering, Bishop of Norwich, Robert Masfale, Bishop of Hereford, Stephen Patrizen, Bishop of S. David; the Abbot of Westminster, and Prior of Worcester, in company of whom, and for whole greater honour honour, Richard Earle of Warwicke was sent, themself, and attendants amounting to eight hundred hofs: so as it stood in dispute whether their honorable preference more graced the assembly, or their learning or judgement bettered the whole body of the Council: in somuch that two of these Bishops were made Cardinals, and of the thirty in best esteem appointed to assist the Cardinals in their Election of a new Pope, London, Cantuery, Bath, and Wells were chosen, wherein Robert, Bishop of London was first nominated for Pope, and he first nominated him that succeeded, which was Otho Colonna by the name of Martin the fifth. Whole Coronation with great magnificence was celebrated of the five nations assembled, and this honour given to the English, that the Priore of Saint Iohn was a supporter of the triple Crown. Touching the decrees that this Council enacted, let it suffice vs to know that Wicliffe bookes were condemned for heretical, that Iohn Hus (notwithstanding the Emperours second) and Jerome of Prague, were both of them burned.

The holy maid Bridget canonized a Saint, and that England was made a nation in rancke before Spain.

(36) The deaths of these two diuines manie lamented, especially the Solomonians, who had reaped much fruit from the seed they had sown, for whose doctrine they sent a defence vnto the same Council, and often became humble Petitioners for their liues, as largely appeareth in their letters written on their behalfe; in whom may truly bee verified that the blood of the Martyrs is the seed of the Church, which so increased in the parts of Solomonias that Pope Martin fearing all would bee mard (Yesse the scourge of the Papacy then in Arms to defend them) sent for aid out of England, to repress the Coliards (as he termed them) and published his Bulls against those Hussites, with as terrible roarings as usually were his Crocoders against the Turks.

(37) His Legate for these holy warres, he made House Beaufort, the rich Cardinall of winchester, who with foure thousand English assisted with a buldiffe of the Clergies Grants, did there verie valiantly for certaine months together, untill hee was recalled by the Pope: wherein Countie Zues (though euer a victor) lost both his eyes, and being blind led forth his army with such terror to his foes, as his name became fearefull, and oftentimes was sufficient to attaine victory without any stroke, inasmuch as hee commanded his owne skinne to be head off after his death, and to hee made the head of their drum, affirming that the very sound thereof, would drive the enemy out of the field. Bot from their Church matters and Prelates proceedings, let vs returne from whence we haue slept, and continue the affairs of our fassions K. Henry hauiug now let footing in France.

(38) His followers and fellows in these new beguane warres were his two brethren the Dukes of Gloucester, and Glocester, as also his vncles the Duke of York, and Earle of Darby, accompanied with the Earles of Kent, Cornwall, and Huntington, besides a most noble fellowship of the other Lords, Barons and men at armes with these from Kildare he marched towards Harlowe, affecting that Towne the first, being a port commodiously liaced vpon the mouth of the Riuier Seyne, and a safe entrance vnto his intended Conquest, as well for the landing of his men, as to hinder the passage vnto Reade and Paris, both which received traffique by the same Riuier.

Sea, his horses, munition, and victuals all brought a shore, with his whole army, the King marched up the hill, and from the height presented himself before Harfleur. His brother Clarence here sent with certain Regiments of horse and foot, to lodge upon the other hill, which before he could approach, (by reason of the nature of the ground and way) hee was forced to march fullie nine miles : which hill attained, he commanded his ships to call anchor as neere the Towne as with safety they might, whereby the place became besieged both by land and Sea, then mounted he his Artillery, began his mines, brought his workes close to the Counter-scarpe of the ditch, prepared faggots to fill it, and presently wanne the safe Towne.

(40) Within the Towne it left Monsieur Gracourt was Generali accompanie with Courtesy of Stanteille Chastellaine de Beaucourt Lieut of Brangemont and others to the number of an hundred Knights and Squires, who with the Townsmen issued out of the Baile, upon that quarter where Huntington, and Cornwallis, by whom which side on either side, they were beaten backe, the gates fired, some breaches made, and fireworks shot into the freetoes to no little annoyance of the besieged, but nothing dimmed them more, then did the Mines made vnder the walls: against which though they within countermined, and came to fight hand to hand with the besiegers, yet they saw it little preuailed, the walls being ready to fall, and such batteries therin already made, as they well perceived. K. Henry was resolved to carry the towne by assault: wherupon Monsieur de Gracourt foreseeing the eminent danger, demanded a Parley, promising to render the towne if it were not relieved by a certain day assigned.

(41) And albein that Jehan de Beauguise, and Charles de Albou Marthall, and Comtable of France, the one at Candebie Callell, the other in Harflow; either of them having in their companies one thousand and five hundred men at Armes, were yet I troubled by the English, that no great service they did, and lesse hope was looked for from the French King, whose strengthes were not ready as the Dolphin returned answere, either to remove or relieve the Siege at Harflow, wherupon the twenty two of September, Gracourt the Governour with twenty four selected Captaines and Burgeises came to King Henry, who fate in his Panilion under a cloth of estate; his Noblemen about him, and the Earle of Kyng upon his right hand, bearing his casket, whereon was an imperial Crowne set with stones of great price: The Governour and the rest prostrating themselves at the Kings feet, delivered unto him the Keyes of the town, according to the covenants betwixt them comprised, which was a respite for five dayes, and then if no succour came to surrender the towne vnto the King, & to deliver him his hand thirtie of their chieft persons to stand for life or death at his owne pleasure; the rest to depart without armor, weapons, or any of their goods.

(43) Harlow thus surrendered in to short a siege continuance, the King sent 7 honnors Earle of Darlow with sufficient troopes to possesse the Gates, who then erected the Kings Standard, and Sainte Georges banner vpon the principall Ports, and affixed the Towne with guards competent. Moreover, he sent the said Messieur de Gracourt, and with him Ouyse King at Armes vnto the Dolphin to let him knowe, that he would lay eight dayes in Harlow, to expell him comming, where they might treat of an accord, whereunto himselfe was well inclined, if he were not obstinate, for his purpose was not to demand more then his right, and if they could not accord, for the shewing of Christian blood, he was pleased to decide the quarrell by single combat between them two.

(43) His entrance into Harflew was not as Cæsar into Rome with Coronets, Ensigns and Triumphes, a treading his Chariot, but in a more humble his humble manner hee passed along the streets barfuted, vntill hee came to the Church of Saint Martin, where with great deuotion hee gaue most humble thanks vnto God for this his first achieved enterprise. Then that the Towne might be English, and free from French dangers, hee made proclamation, that whosoever of his English Artificers might transport themselves vnto Harflew, houses should there be giuen to them and their heires wherby in short time the towne was repeople with English Artisans. Here King Henry abode the space of twelve or fiftene dayes, expecting an answer of his message sent to the Dolphin; but the time prefixed (and more dayes expired) hee commanded his souldiers to furnish themselves with victuals for eight dayes, leauing his vnkle Thomas Beaufort Earle of Dorset Governor of Harflew, himselfe with two thousand horie, and thirteen thousand foot, marched towards Calis through the Countie of Caux and Eu.

(44) The French Court notwithstanding ir swarmed with factions (whilst vnder a weak and braue-sicke King) the great ones sought to make themselves greater, and the common enemy endangering all, King Charles, the Dolphin, his brother of Peulherie, the King of Scot, the Dukes of Berry and of Britaine, with the whole force of France assembled at Raux, and in Conncell concluded, that the English should be fought with, before they got Calis, and forthwith decreed to endamage King Henry on his way, which presently was attempted. For besides their continual skirmishes vpon his marching Army, they brake down the Bridges, plashed the woods, intrenched the wayes, strucke stakes in the Foords, and in places of aduantage, laid store of souldiers to empeach his passage, and consumed all victuals out of the Countie, through which hee should goe; whereby they well hoped, as a Deere taken in the toils, so both hee and his host should haue bene insinared, who now was approached to Perrou, with purpose to haue passed the river Saone at Blanchetagne; but there the French had fortified against him, so as hee well law that was not the way, and thereupon changing his Counsell, hee marched by Wormes, and lodged at Sailly, with an intent to haue passed the river at Port le Roy, but that also guarded, he kept along the Riuer to Hargely, the French Army marching vpon the other banke, vnder the leading of Charles de Albret Constable of France.

(45) Henry still seeking to get ouer Saone, meant to allye it, even to the head, and passing by Amilly, Tenney, and Carles, in a valley adioyning, there lodged his host, where hee commanded his Archers to prouide flukes sharped at both ends, which afterwards flooded them in singular good head: Then hearing by his spials that the water was passable at Rethen-curt, by the negligent guard of them of Saint Quintin, hee got ouer the river. His souldiers both weary and faint, many of them sicke, and their provisions spent (some twelve dayes before, were forced to feed vpon nuts, roots, and Berries, such as they could get, and their drinke was the water that ranne in their way).

(46) The day they spent with great toyle and long march, the nights were cold and wet, and no where good lodging, alwayes standing vpon their owne guard, and the French alwayes (swarming about them without intermission. These things moued Henry as the French Writers report, to proffer the restitution of Harflew, with other holds in Normandie, and to make satisfaction for the harmes done in France, to suffer him free passage vnto his Towne of Calis. But certaine it is, that great reliefe hee got by the iniurie and pety that hee vied in those parts: for albeit hee was in the middle of his enemies, and his Souldiers pinched with penury and want, yet made hee Proclamation vpon paine of death, that none of his Army should rob any Church: wherein a souldier offering, hee caused retribution to be made, and commanded the stealer to be put to death: the fame of which pety moued the people (albeit they were forbid by the French King) plentifully to supply the fasting English with their owne provisions.

(47) But the Nobility vnderstanding that the English had got ouer Saone, the Constable, the Dukes of Orleanse and Bourbon, sent vnto Henry an Herald with defiance, demanding battell vpon Thursday following; which the English King granted, but therein failed, faith the French Secretarie, and tooke his march towards Calis without any stay. True it is, that Henry was not desirous of fight, his impediments being such as we haue said, and therefore returned answer, that he meant to keepe on his march vnto Calis, and would not secke them; but if they would disturbe him, he committed the issue thereof to God, assuring himselfe that it would bee to their owne great danger and perill, and so passing forward to Perrou, 20 May. 15. Leftailles, to Baugy, vpon thursday the 24. of October hee came to Azenourt, where the French in a field of aduantage (purposely chosen) in the Countie of Saint Paul, and neere vnto Azenourt had pitched their Banner royall, with an infinite host, whereof the Constable of France had the conduct.

(48) His power (saith Perradin) consisted of an hundred and fifty thousand horie (besides them for carriages which were innumerable) wherein were ten thousand men at Armes, all of them (a very few excepted) Princes, Noblemen, Knights, and Esquiers. The Vanguard was led by the Constable, the Dukes of Orleanse, and Bourbon, the Earles of Eu and Boucardis the Marshall, Dampier the Admirall, Guyard Dolphin of Auvergne, and Clement of Brabant. The maine battell, by the Duke of Berry, the Earles of Alencon, Nemours, Blamont, Saluers, Grandpre, and Rouffe. And the reargard by the Duke of Brabant Earles of Marie, Surquenberge, and Monseigneur de Lorrai; the right wing was commanded by Arthur Earle of Richmond, and the left by Lewis de Bourbon, Count of Perouse great Master of France, whome particular reuerence Francis Reine doth largely declare: all ranged together in their array appeared to the eye (saith Perradin) six times to exceed the English, but as Peter Dinart effemed them to be ten times more.

(49) King Henry seeing himselfe so farre ingaged, and many of his men sicke of the fluxe, sent the second rine vnto these assembled Princes his proffers to surrender Harflew, and what else he had won, so as without disturbance he might depart for Calis. Whereunto the Constable and Marshall were willing, but the other young Princes despising the small number of their adneraries, refused all conditions of peace, and were not onely negligent in the duties of Commanders, but with an assurance of victory diuided the pray, disposed of prisoners, and prepared a Chariot to carry thencepaine King in triumph, commanding the Cities and Townes adjoining to ring their bells, and to render thanks vnto God, who had deliuered their enemies into such place of aduantage as an assured victory must presently follow: and so confident were they thereof, that they sent to King Henry to know what ransom he would giue. But faith Chartier, what answer the King made, is vncertaine: for that all who were priuer thereto, were slaine, the Duke of Orleanse only excepted, and he a prisoner retained in England. They also sent for King Charles, and the Dolphin his sonne (then residing in Rouen) to come in their persons vnto the battell, that so they might haue the honour of the field. Whereat the Duke of Berry was highly offended, and aduised the contrarie, laying before the King the hazard of warre, out of his owne experience, being himselfe at the battell of Poytiers, where King John vnfortunatly was taken by the English, which proued (as be alleged) a great breake-neck vnto France.

indifferent, the French gallant, fresh, and through vain hope of honour, already mounted above men of meaner rank, the English weaker, weary and foreboded, made no such show, and yet their courage no less than the other. The one spending the night before Battell, in Feasts, Triumphs, and other like sports, distributing their Captives, dividing their spoils, and decreeing none to be slain but the King, and his nobles; all others must die or be incurably maimed: the other trimming their arrows, sharpening their spears, buckling their armours, and refreshing their bodies for the next day: and besides other observations, by the light of the great fires made in the French Camp, the English discerned what was therein done, and took the advantage of their order and ground.

(51) The morning approached, the French took the field, thronging forward, who should be first to this most easy and certain victory (as they took it) their greatest strength consisting in horie. Against whole violence King Henry commanded two hundred strong bow-men to lodge in a low meadow, where a deep ditch full of water might secure them from the horie, and the bushes cover them from sight. These having flukes prepared and shod with iron at both ends, were appointed to strike them slope-wise in the ground, yet so that they might be removed as occasion was ministered, to guard them from the danger of the horie: which policy accomplished, King Henry (whose hope was in God, and the goodness of his cause) about ten of the clocke ranged his English against the French then in field: he disposed his host into three battels, placing his bow-men on both sides of the maine.

(52) The vanguard, consisting of Archers, was led by Lord Edward (his cousin) the Duke of Berke, & with him the Lords Beaumont, Willoughby, and Fauke. In the maine Battell all in complete and bright shining armour, the King rode himself, his shield quartered with the royal achievements of England and France, upon his helmet he wore a Coronet, the circle whereof glittered with pearls and stones of an vneestimable price: his horie of a fiercer courage carried as he went, the bridle and furniture of Goldsmiths worke, and the Caparisons most richly embroidered with the victorious Ensignes of the English Monarchy: Before him in gold and glorious colours the Royall Standart was borne, and many other banners in warlike order waied with the wind.

(53) The French had framed their Battels into two sharpe fronts, as intending with their points to have runne through the English squadrons; altogether relying upon their horie men and shining in bravery with an incredible exerce. And farthe the beauty and honourable horror of both the Armies, no heart can judge of, vlesse the eye had seene it, the banners, Ensignes and Pennons streaming in the ayre, the glittering of armours, the varietie of colours, the motion of Plumes, the Forests of Lances, and the thickets of shorter weapons, made so great and goodlie a shew; but the silent expectation of the bloody blast was as the bullet rann into the Canon, whole roaring voice is not so soone heard, as the stroke of death felt by the aimed-at mark.

(54) The Battels thus ranged a while stood still, and faced each other euen in the face: The French (whether upon error like to that of Pompei at the Battell of Pharsalia, where Caesar was victorious, or to draw the English farther from their advantage of ground, is altogether vnkowne) but certain it is, that King Henry was resolved to open his way for Calu over the Enemies bosome, or els to die: and therefore with a cheerefull countenance and words full of courage, he comforted his followers and said, "My most faithfull Companions and worthy soldiers, we now go into the field of honour, and to the worke of manhood, which your great valours so long have expected and praised for, loe the day "is now come, and your worke the noblest in the world: pour forth therefore your utmost forces, that ages may know what the lance, the Axe, the sword and the bow can doe in the hand of the valiant: Who soeuer therefore desires riches, honour, and rewards here he shall find them. Nimis cum hoc mactis posuit Deus omnia Campa. When hee had thus said, his army fell prostrate on the ground, and committed themselves vnto God every man taking into his mouth a peece of earth, in remembrance of his owne mortality, being thereof made) or of the holy Communion whereof hee was incorporated to be a partaker; and so resolved, arising the King with cheerefull countenance commanded his Standard to aduance for word, saying, because our inuincible enemies doe attempt to shut up our way, let vs upon them in the name of the most glorious Trinity, and in the best hour of the whole yeere.

(55) The ranging of the Battell King Henry committed to an old experienced Knight called Sir Thomas Erpingham: who with a warde in his hand led the way, which when he saw time he threw vp into the ayre, whereat the whole army gave a great shout; which done, he alighted frō his horie, & came to the King, who was in his place on foot. The French beholding this Offer, kept still their owne standing, which the English perceiving made forward and came on, giving another shout, when immediately the Archers, layd in the meadow, darkened the ayre with a shower of sharpe arrows, most fearefull to the sight, but more deadly to be felt, and withall, the English charged their Battell with an admirable Courage: the most of them for nimbleness being but halfe clothed, without hat, and bare-legged. And such was their courage notwithstanding their wants, as he that ere while could scarcely bend his Bow, is able now to draw his yard-long arrow to the verie head, whose roaring make was the flanke of the French, so rightly aimed at, and so strongly thicke on, that their sides were altogether larded with arrows, whereby the vanguard was instantly distressed, and disordered into such a confused presse, as they were not able to vfe their weapons at any aduantage. Their wings likewise assayed to charge the English but Monsieur de Lagnie in the one not well seconded by his troopes was forced backe and Guillaume de Sarravies charging home in the other, was slaine. The Battell now broke, for safety fled to the Main, where they breed both feare and confusion by the vnruliness of their wounded hories, so galloped with arrows as they could not be gouerned.

(56) The first troope of the French horie, were exquisitely appointed, whereon their riders much presumed and meant to haue burst through the Archers with a violent coorse, but they quing backe left their sharpe pointed flukes sticking, which till then were vnesse the French stopping the Archers had fled, came on with their horie upon the spur, and that in such heat, as the earth seemed to tremble vnder their thundering feet, and being forced forward, without forethought of danger carried their proud Riders into the lawes of destruction: for falling by troopes vpon those goaring flukes, they were miserably ouerthrowne, and paunched to death. The tempests of arrows still whirling in the ayre sparkled fire in their fells from the helmets of the French, and with their Steele heads, rang maimie thousand their kuelts that dolefull day, who like to come cut downe with the scythe, fell by whole plumes in that fatal field; the English still following the aduantage: against whome Anthony Duke of Brabant, hoping by his example to encourage others followed with a few turned head, and brake into the English Battell, wherein manfully fighting hee was slaine.

(57) With the like manhood Duke Alencon a lusty French Lord, pressed into the Battell where King Henry fought, and encountering Humphrey Duke of Gloucester the Kings brother, both wounded

ded and overthrew him, to whose rescue if Henry had not come, he had died more honourable then afterward he did, for King Henry betriding him, delivered his laid brother from danger, and wanne him selfe much honour by the deed. Alencon then coped with King Henry in fight, and with his Axe cut a part of his Crowne, which blow was so furelie laid on, that there with his helmet was battered vnto his brow, and the Lyon enrag'd, with redoubled strength, broke the French Gallant vnto the ground, and slew two of his men that incooded their Master. The Duke thus down, cried to the King, I am Alencon, whom Henry fought to haue fained, and so had done, had not the deafe cares of reuenge flopt all found of life, against him, that so had endangered their Soueraine Lord.

(58) The French Reregard surpris'd with feare, at the disfaller of the vanguard, and the maine battell fled, not striking one stroke (except some principall leaders and they not many) the English horsemen fetched a compasse and wheeled about vpon their backs, which no sooner was perceiued, but that the tere of fighting was ended, and the worke of killing began; as by the words of Walsingham doth manifestly appeare: The way (saith he) is at length made by force; the French did not so much give place, as fall dead to the earth: for when they saw their beaten vnder foote, whom they repaid vnconquered, their minds fortwith grew amazed, and such an isewfare fild through their marrow, that they stood still like senselesse Images, while our men twisled weapons out of their hands, and slew them therewith as beaues. Slaughter then had left the way of it selfe, and fight did follow no longer, but all the warre was made at the vnter, which (as it were) offered themselves to be cut, neither can the English kill so many of the enemies, as may be killed. Thus therefore the whole glory of the French name is almost perished, by the hands of these few, whom immediately before they hold in much extreme contempt. But the sword now made weary and drunke with blood, all danger past, and humanity retired, prisoners were taken, and lues spared, which hitherto was neglected, least mercy might haue proued the destruction of themselves.

(59) Whilst the King was thus busied, & the successe of the battell in dispute, his carriages (but secretly guarded) by the French were assailed, & all made spoile of, that was to be had. The Captaines of this cowardly enterprize, were Robinet de Bourneville, Riffant de Clamasse, and Stanbert de Arcineourt, with sixe hundred Peasants, who had turned their faces at the first brunt of Battell, as men of better practise to pilfer, then to purchase by manhood the spoiles of the field. Where among other things they found a rich Crowne and sword, which they bare away in triumph-wile, saying that King Henry was taken, and as a prisoner followed their troopes, the sight of certaine English prisoners by them taken and led away confirming the report more strongly in the beholders conceits. But King Henry breathlesse, and in heat of blood, seeing certaine new troopes of the King of Sicily appear in the field, and the same strong enough to encounter with his weary men, tearing (as hee had cause) that the Bourbon Battall vpon sight of fresh succours would gather into a body, and againe make head, considering withall how his men were over-charged with multitudes of Prisoners, who in number surmounted their Conquerours: that the charge would be double at once, to guard and to fight, and that the prisoners would be ready vpon every aduantage to take armes and free themselves from their taskers: these and other necessities constraining, King Henry contrary to his wonted generous nature, gaue present commandement that every man should kill his Prisoner, which was immediately performed, certaine principall men excepted. Which done, and falling againe in Order, hee sent his Heralds vnto these troopes assembled, commanding them forthwith to come vnto Battell, or else to depart the field, either of which if they delayed, he threatened to reuenge with their deathea, without any redemption or mercy; at which furee sentence their hearts were so daunted, that with flame and dishonour they departed the field. The bafe surprisall of the Kings carriages, (the only cause as some allege of the French prisoners death) was so ill digested by the French themselves, that the Duke of Burgundie imprisoned the Adorn thereof, and was minded to haue put them to death, had not his sonne the Count of Charolais mediated for them, vnto whom they presented King Henries rich sword, the guards whereof was gold set with stones of great price.

(60) The day almost spent in spending French blood, and evening approaching nere the set of the Sonne, the field cleared, and no enemy leene, the retreat was sounded, and all were assembled to giue thanks vnto God; which done, while his souldiers pillaged the dead, King Henry sent for Montjoy herald at armes in France, and for other heralds both English and French: vnto whom he laid, *we haue not of our souldiers made this great slaughter, which the sword in our weak hands hath laid at our feete, but the Arme of God for the offences (no doubt) of the French hath done, whose blood lieth now rest vpon their crum heads, and wee guiltlesse in following our right: and then demanding the name of the place, was answered, it was Asenourt, then said he, to all posterities following, this Battell shall be called the Battell of Asenourt. Thus dismissing the heralds, he returned to Massenmedes, where he lodged the night before. The spoile was great, and the pray rich in armour, jewels, and apparel, for which by the Countrey Peasants many (left as dead) were stripped stark naked, who afterward crept from the place, but most of them mortallie wounded without reliefe, lay in great dolor and died in the ditches: so certaine is the calamity of warre, and vncertaine the sword till it bee quietlie flattered.*

(61) King Henry lost his cosen Edward Duke of York, and the Earle of Suffolke that day, besides some others, hee French writers say three or foure hundred, yet Caxton will haue them but twenty and sixe: and Paulus Aemilius addeth to the two flaine Lords, two Knights and only ten priuate souldiers, without anie more; vnto whom an ancient manuscript addeth * David Com an Elquire, and twenty eight priuate souldiers, affirming confidently, that no more of the English died that day.

(62) A farre larger role is writ of the French, flaine at this Battell, yet diuers and different among their owne Authors, the true Catalogue as wee cannot certainly set downe, yet as wee haue many Collections wee will deliuer the same in part, and referre the rest to be seene vpon the record: Only naming the Officers and Leaders in the same field either flaine, or taken Prisoners, by this famous King Henry in this his triumphant and fortunate day.

To be short, Jehan Tillet saith, that there were ten thousand slain, and almost as many more taken: and most of their owne writers account the successe of this Battell to be with the slaughter of foure thousand Princes, Nobles, Knights, and Esquires: but the history of Normandy account eight thousand to be slain of that rank, whereof an hundred and twenty bare Banners: among whom died foure Dukes, nine Earles, one Archibishop, and ten thousand common soldiers, as the Herald's relation in that behalfe hath reported.

(27) Prisoners of account taken in this field, were Charles the Duke of Orleans, and Iohn Duke of Bourbon, Arthur Earle of Richmond, extremely wounded and left for dead, as he lay gasping among the slaine, was by the English recovered and received their Prisoner. Louis de Bourbon Count de Pentefieve was there taken Captive, was Charles Earle of Eu, being carried into England, where he remained prisoner twenty three yeeres. Others of great account were likewise taken and put to ranisme, as Edward de Reims, Oliver de la Froidaie, Jehan Giffart, with these and many more the next day King Henry marched to Calais, leaving the French to search for their wounded, that in ditches and bushes had made their heavy beds: In commiseration whereof, the Countess Charolais extreme penitence for the losse of his vncles, and other his friends, in charity came to the field, and caused the dead to be buried, the charge whereof he committed to the Abbot of Walsingham and the Bailiffe of Weyre, who inclosed a peece of ground with a deep ditch of two hundred and fifty yards square, fencing it with an hedge of thornes against the raucings of dogs and wolves. Wherein were interred five hundred and eight thousand Chrilian carcases, in regard whereof it was sanctified by the Bishop of Ely, and made a Churchyard.

(28) The Duke of Brianne with his forces was come to Amiens within two daies march of Asincourt to ayde King Charles, but the French upon a conceited assurance of victory, would not buy his coming: who now hearing of the glorious day obtained by the English, dismissed his troupes, and retired to his owne Countrey, not meaning any more to intermeddle in the warre between England and France. Now King Henry upon Saturday the 26. of October, being the next day after Battell,ooke his march towards Calais, but in passing the field wherein they had fought, he caused search for all the English, which he caused to be entered according to their estates. But the Bodies of his slaine cosen the Duke of York, and of Michael la Poole Earle of Suffolke hee tooke away thence, carrying them both into England, and so passing to Goussier with his Prisoners hee entered Calais, whither, those left at Harflew resorted, to pay their ranmes to them assigned.

(29) His holt now refreshed and courage augmented, it was disputable in Councill, whether the King should returne againe into France, to pursue his enterprize already begun, or else to imbarke for England. But the time of yeere spent, the winter wet, and the field Camps very much tumbled to fluxes, wherewith many of his soldiers were as yet infected, and more vexed of their wounds; it was thought fittest to make for England, and the sooner, for that victuals became somewhat scarce in Calais. These things premised, King Henry upon the sixteenth day of November spread sayles for England, and in the passage was met with such stormes, that his French Prisoners were in as great feare, as they had beene in danger at the Battell of Asincourt: but arrived at Dover and all dangers past, upon the three and twenty of November in triumph with hee made his entrance into London, foure hundred Citizens riding before him in red and white hoodes, the gates and directes were garnished with Paganes, and the Conduits plentifully pouring forth sweet wines. The religious men met him with profession, and foureteen mitred Bishops attended his approach vnto Saint Pauls, where, out of the Centers the sweet Odours filled the Church, and the Quier chanted Anthems cunningly set by note: in all which the honour was ascribed only vnto God, the King so commanding it. And so farre was he from the vaine ostentation of men, that he would nor admit his broken Crowne, nor beuiled armour to be borne before him in shew, which are the vntill Ensignes of warlike triumphs. The Cite presented him a thousand pound in gold, two golden basons worth five hundred pound more, which were received with all Princely thanks.

(30) And now to doe the last office of a foundler for those two noblemen slaine at Asincourt, hee willed the body of the Duke of York to be interred in his Colledge at Fotheringhay in Northamptonshire, and the Earle of Suffolke in Wolme in Oxfordshire, commanding most of his Bishops and Abbots to celebrate the Exequies in London, wherunto likewise hee reinforced his vncle Dorset the Governor of Harflew, whom for his good seruice done, hee created Duke of Exeter, and gave him a thousand pound by yeere out of his owne Exchequer: but in his absence some attempt were made by the French against the laid Towne, whereby hee was enforced the sooner to returne.

(31) The calamities of these times by the flattered ichemies of the Church and their bloody warres among Chrilian Princes, signified the Emperour a man of great wisdom and integrity, much lamented at the Councell of Constance, & as another Constantine solicited the three floure flaring Popes vnto vniue, but failing of that purpose, from those parts hee travelled into France, and thence into England: seeking to make peace betwix these two Western Monarchs, the better to withstand the common knowne enemy of Chrilendome the Turke. King Charles hee solicited first, finding him in words very forward, with many faire shewes to embrace the motion, wherupon taking with him the Archibishop of Rheims as Ambassadour from the French King, came vnto Calais, where hee was most honourably entertained by the Earle of Warwicke, Deputy of the Towne, and diuers other Lords thither by King Henry to attend him, as also thirtie of his tallest shippes to waite him to Dover gallantlie rigged and manned with a noble traine. The Duke of Gloucester accompanied with many of the nobility, was appointed to receive him at Dover, where they attended his coming.

(32) The Emperour arrived, and ready to take land, Gloucester and the other Lords with their drawne swords entered the water, and thus spake to the Emperour, that if his Imperial Maestie intended to enter as their Kings friend and a mediator for peace, they would recetue him with all willingness accordingly, but if as an Emperour to claime any authority in England, which was a free Kingdome, they were there ready to resist and impeach his entrance. Which rough demand being most mildly answered by signifund, hee had present access, and by them was attended to wards London.

(33) This worthy Emperour, King Henry greatly respected, as well for his owne worth, and the amity held euer with the house of Beane, as also for that hee had married Berbara the daughter of the Earle of Zule the Kings Cousen Germaner removed. His entertainment was Princely, and charges altogether borne by King Henry, who the more to honour him at Windsore, solemnly entailed him Knight of the Order of Saint George or Garter, with a most sumptuous fest parposely prepared, as which the Emperour late in his Collar and Robes; but not following the cause for which hee came, hee instantly vrged the peace for France, wherein hee was gentle heard heard by the King Henrie, but upon new disputes for some little of men in the Territories of Rouen, the motion at that time was dashed, and would not proceed, least (as King Henrie alleged) the French should suppose that a small losse had weakened his spirits: yet the Emperour continuing his intercession for peace, had brought it to that passe by his pi-thy persuasions, as had not the French at that verie instant belieged Harlowe both by Sea and land, it had been effected.

(34) For not long before Thomas Earle of Dorset, having made a roade into the County of Caues, was set vpon by the Earle of Armaignac Constable of France with other strong men at Armes neere vnto Padiment, who so distressed the English, that Dorset tooke into a Garden for defence, and hauing had private conference there with the Constable, early before day, departed with the losse of ^{four} four hundred men. Armaignac puffd vp by his great victory, with his French powers followed the English in a hasty march toward Harlowe, and vpon the lands intercepted their passage, where betwixt them a cruell conflict was performed, with the overthrow of the French, and flight of the Constable, who retired to Chambray for safety.

(35) This his vnlookt attempt he tooke greatly to heart, and therefore purposing to repurchase again his honor, he determined for Harlowe, where hee set downe his land siege, before the English Garrison within, were well aware, when also the Viscount Nor-thon Vice-Admiral of France, with a Flecte of tall ships entred the haven, so that the Towne was besigt on every side as we haue said. King Henrie hearing of these newes, called home his Ambassadors, which were the Bishop of Norwiche and Sir Thomas Espingham in commission then at Braxois, and in conference for a Peace, and the Emperour well perceiving that the French plaied vpon aduantage, and that King Henrie was not of temper to turne edge at their brookes, law is vaine to prosecute the peace for France further, and therefore sought to enter league with the English himselfe, vnto the which King Henrie was so willing as he confirmed the same vpon these Articles following.

(36) That the said Emperour & King, their heires & successours ^{shou'd} be friends each to other as Allies and Confederates against all manner of persons of what estate or degree locuer, the Church of Rome, and the Pope for the time being only excepted (for he was the Malher Bee that then lead the swarme.)

(37) That neither themselves, their heires nor successours should be present in Counsell or other place, where either of them, their heires or successours might sustain damage in lands, goods, honours, states or persons: and that if any of them should vnderstand of losse or hindrance to be like to fall or happen to the others, they should impeach the same, or if that lay not in their powers, they should aduertise the others thereof with all conueni-ent speed. That either of them, their heires and successours should aduance the others honour and commodity without any fraud or deceit. That neither of them, nor their heires or successours should permit their subiects to leaue warres against the others. That it should be lawfull and free for each of their subiects to passe into the others Countrey, and there to remaine and make merchandize either by Sea or land, paying the Customes, gables, and duties due and accustomed according to the Laws and Ordinances of the places, and Countreys where they should traffique. That neither of the said Princes, nor their heires, nor successours should receiue any rebell, banished man, or traitor of the others willing'y, but should cause euery such person to auoid out of their Countreys, Realmes, dominions, and Iurisdiccions. That neither of the said Princes, their heires nor Successors should begin any other warres against any other person, other then such as they had warres with at that present without the consent of the other his Confederates, except in defence of themselves, their Countreys and subiects in case of insurrection made vpon them. That it should be lawfull for the King of England to prosecute his warres against France for the recovery of his right, as should seeme to him expedient, and for the Emperour, for the recovery of any part of his right receiued by the French. Lastly, that either of them should assist other in recovery and Conquest of their rights, lands and dominions, witheld and kept from them, by him that calleth himselfe King of France, and others, the Princes and Barons of France. These conclusions and agreements bare date the 19. of October, in Anno 1416. In the meane while the French that had felt the hard hand of the English, and seeing that Henrie had with-drawne his commisioners for peace, King Charles made a league with the States of Genoa, requiring their aide against this dangerous enemy, who supplyde him with sixe hundred Croise-bowes, and eight tall ships of warre, and as many gallees with munition and victuals. These waiting the Seas with many brauadoes, King Henrie in person meant to haue mette with himselfe, but the Emperour disuinding his purpose, the charge of that Enterprize was committed to John Duke of Bedford, accompanie with the Earles of March, Marshall, Oxford, Warwick, Huntingdon, Arundell, Deuonshire, and Salisbury, these falling vpon the County of Norwiche, a herce encounter was begun, and long fought, till at length the victory fell to the English, so that the French Navy was most of them battered, suncke and taken, amongst others three great Carricks of the Genoues were sent to England, with whom the bastard of Barbon was brought away Prisoner; and the Viscount of Narbon, Le Sieur de Montaigne, and Le Sieur de Terrar chaled into Brittain. This victorie obtained, the Duke past forward to the Towne of Harlowe, and reuelked it with victuals without any impeachment; for Armaignac the Constable hearing how his Conforts had kept tune on the Seas, thought it not best to let to their note, least his meane would not be heard, the base of this mischiefe founding too deepe, and therefore he put vp his pipes, and got him to Paris. This seruice performed was so commended by the Emperour, as he openly said, that Realme was happy that had such a King, but the King more happy that had such Subiects, and euer after held Bedford in a most speciall account.

(38) His affaires now finished, and Princely entertainments thankfully receiued, he prepares for his returne toward Germany, and King Henrie to doe him the more honour would needs accompany him to his Towne of Calles, whither after their arrivall the Duke of Burgoyne repayed to doe his homage vnto the Emperour, which Burgoyne some months before, had concluded a peace with the Earle of Warwick in the behalfe of King Henrie, for the Countries of Flanders and Artois. Henrie therefore in hope of a further friendship with him, sent his brother the Duke of Gloucester, and the Earle of March vnto Saint Omers to lye hostages with the Countie Charrolais, for Burgoyne passage and safe returne, with whom hee sent Warwick to conduct him to Calles.

(39) His entertainment was honourable both by the Emperour and King, which as acceptably he receiued, and vnto Sigismund performed his homage, and with Henrie renewed the truce for the time of two yeres, both which were so disoblittue to the French flomackes, that the Emperour is taxed, he came not with an intent to worke the good of France, but rather to augment her miseries by alienating Burgandy to bandy against Orleans: and that King Henrie was pnt with an humor of pride, his affaires so properous against a weakie King. But this busines ended, Burgandy returned to Graueling, Henrie vnto England, and the Emperour toward Germany, being wait-ted into the low Countreys with the Kings Flecte and attended vpon by the Kings seruants.

(39) At Calis King Henry had made great professers vnto Burgundy to enioy with him into the warres against France, promising him part of his Conquests, and to spare and fauour all his vassalls, allies, and friends, but Burgundy refusing the offers, remained his enemy for France, bowbeit he sent Embassadors into England to treat a continuance of the truce, which was granted to his Commissioners to indure from the next Michaelmas-tide vnto Easter ensuing, which was confirmed at Poncheby the 23. of Iulie and yeere of Christ 1417. For the signing whereof King Henry sent the keeper of his priy Seale to Amiens: where the Duke of Burgundy declared the same signed, which beganne in this sort. Iohannes Dux Burg. Comes Flandria, Artois & Burgundia, Palatinus, Dominus de Salina & Anticlausa vniuersis presentes literas inspectis: Salatem, &c. datum in villa Ambianensi 17. die Mensis Aug. 1417. This notwithstanding the said Duke returned, and in November following made a league (whereunto he was sworn) with the King and Dauphin of France against England, which his doings King Henry took nothing well. But his proceedings prospering in France he called a Parliament at London, where the Lord Chau-celler, Henry Beaufort, Bishop of Winchester and Cardinal, in the Kings behalte made an eloquent Oration, declaring the great desire his Master had to make Peace with the French, which their King notwithstanding refused, and against the law of Armes denied vpon ranfome to render his prisoners taken at Agincourt, so that the peace which was to be expected must be with the sword, concluding with this saying.
Let us make warre that we may haue peace, because the end of warre is peace. Whereunto the whole body consented, and granted to the King a Subsidie and a Tenth which was graciously accepted, but was farre too short to defray the great Charge, so that he was forced to pause his Crowne vnto the said Bishoppe Beaufort his vncle, for a great sum of money, as he did certaine leuies to the Lord Maior of London for ten thousand Marks.

(40) Money thus got and the Seas made safe, King Henry purposed further to follow his fortunes in France, his aduantages many (as the French would enforce) through the weak-kneed King, not able to correct the Passions of the Burgundians and Orleans, which troubled all France; and the death of Lewis the Dauphin whose funeral might haue bene solemnized by the mourners from Agincourt, his death (as was thought) happening immediately vpon that distresse; and to heape more distractions vpon the miserable French, John the Kings second sonne and new made Dauphin shortly left both his title and life, who together were entombed at Campeigne.
These, say the French, were the banes of the State, and the baits that made King Henry to bite; notwithstanding we shall finde them but curiaunces to shadow the light if we looke into the proiect with an indifferent eye, for the Kings weaknes was supported by Burgoyne Armagnac and other potent estates; Burgundy by Oath, made a mortal enemy against King Henry. Orleans in England a prisoner and without racket in hand could not bandy the Ball to marre the French plea: and as touching the deaths of the two Dauphins their raked vp after kept in the spate that afterward was the only light of France, for these, (though Crowned) were not the pillars of strength able to sustaine the great weight of that Empire: The first a Prince of little valour, and great toyle, presuming to know much, and vnwilling to learne, busying himselfe with his selfe, and by his insufficiency rather troubled then managed the estate. The other, none of the wisest and of nature so remisse, chache was euer ready (as waxe) to take the stamp of any impresse, but as the prouerbe is, let the loo-sers haue leue to speake, and vs to relate our Englishe French busineses.

(41) All now in a readinesse, King Henry with a puissant armie prepared his second expedition into France, his Fleet consisting of fiftene hundred saile, many Loeds and men at Armes, the muster roll ingrossed with twenty five thousand five hundred twenty seuen souldiers, euerly fourth being a horseman, besides a thousand Carpenters, Artificers and Labourers: But before his departure he ordained his brother John Duke of Bedford to be the Protector of England in his absence, which done vpon the 23. of Iulie he tooke to Seas, the sailes of his owne ship, being of purple silke most richly embroydered with gold: and the sixth of August arrived in Normandy to such terror of the inhabitants that they fled further into the maine, leaving the Countrey bare of men and bestiall: Inform that twentie fue thousand families of them repayed into Brittain, so dreadfull was the approach of the Englishe.

(42) No sooner King Henries foote had touched the shoare, but to the incouragements of his Marshal followers, he dubbed forty eight knights, and then sending to view Harfleur laid his siege against Can-quest, the strongest Caltie in Normandy, which he tooke the 16. of August, and gaue both it and the whole demaines belonging vnto his brother Thomas Duke of Clarence: And vnto Salisbury the leader of his second battell, he gaue the Caltie Ambulliers, which at the same tyme he wonne, as also that of Lanery vnto the Earle Marshall, and these were the first that were invested with any reueren in France.

(43) Caen to withstand the enemy was strongly fortified, well manned, and victualled, so that nothing was wanting needfull for defense: yet the King late downe before it, and his battery not working the expected effect, he attempted it by mine, and ruined some parts of the Wall: Notwithstanding the defendants made stiff defense, and manfully put backe the entrance or scale. Neuerthelesse Henry seeing that they could not long subsist, vnwilling to carrie it in fury, which must be the destruction of the Inhabitants, whom he sought to saue, and to make his true subjects, summoned them by an Herald, and promised them mercy: which they in hope of reliefe vterly despised: hereupon his enry was forced, and great slaughter made, till the King flayed his souldiers furies, and caused the Citizens to disarm themselves, setting a strong guard aswell to keepe the spoilers from pillaging, as the Townesmen from all hostile attempt: and they that did, were either put to death or ranfome, which was freele distributed among his Captaines and souldiers, by which regular action King Henrie got him the estimation of a great Capitaine, and an vpright Prince.

(44) But whether by the working of the French, or by instigation of the discontented reformalists (as Walsingham hath it) The Scots would worke wonders in reuiving a dead King Richard, that should indammage the Lancastrians cause, and dispossesse King Henry of his Crowne: who now absent and forward of Conquest in France, at some was endangered by these his emulating neighbours, and his coo lines in hostile manner entered vpon, by the Duke of Albany, together with the Earle Drunglas the Scottishe Leaders: These bringing with them their huge-like *K.
Richard*, laid straite siege against Exburgh, and Berwick, where all allies were attempted, by vndermining the walls, and turrets, all extremities vied and nothing left vnattempted, that might annoy either by Sea or by Land.

(45) But Beauford Duke of Excester being at Bridlington in doing his deuotions, had present newes of this present necessity, and therefore scarce cometo the end of his Orizons, he layd by his Beads and tooke to his armour, which was not rusty with lying, so lately put off, neither did John Duke of Bedford the Protector, forsooke any time, but with five thousand strong, repaired into the North, where, with the Earles of Westmerland and Northumberland, his power was increased, vnto whom also the Archbuihop of York Henry Beuefided, with age to decrepitate, that he was borne into the field in his Chaire, the fanse of whole comming, and the feare of their worthy Generals so daunted the Scots, that leaning their ladders and other engines of warre, in the night they broke vp their hege, and well was her that could first attaine Scotland.

(46) The Kings affaires thus effected in the North, the Clergies eye-force was also somewhat calied by the apprehension of Sir John Gualdus their disturber in the South, who not contented to fit the God of Rome at nought, but like wise defaced the faces of his Saints, trimly limmed in their Letanyes and other like mass bookeles a matter indeed of such moment, that the Abbot of Saint Albans (in whose precinct they were pictures) sent these poore misfited and scratched faced pictures, to complaine of their iniuries vnto the King, but his peace not broken, for no blood was drawne, he remitted the offence and punishment thereof vnto Chishley Archbuihop of Canterbury, who lent them to Pauls Croffe to shew their Countenances vnto the people, the Preschter that day beating their mouth in iudicating the offence to be done vnto the triumph Santes in heauen.

(47) A Parliament assembled by the Regents authority for the supply of money to maintain the warres in France, a matter of as great importance was therein to be paid, and that was the apprehension and iudgement of the Lord Cobham, with a consideration of reward for his taker the Lord Penfyll in wailes, from whence force wounded he was brought to Westminster before the Lords, and having heard his countenances would not thereunto answere in his excuse, vpon which record and proceffe, it was adiudged that he should be taken as a traitor to the King and the Realme, that hee should be carried to the Tower of London, & from thence drawn through the streets vnto Saint Giler fields, and there to be hanged and burned hanging, which accordingly was done. That N. D. author of the three counterfeits hath made Gualdus a Russian, a Robber, and a Rebel, and his authority taken from the stage-plaies, is more belittling the pen of his slanderous report, then the Credit of the iudicious, being only grounded from this Papist and his Poet, of like conscience for lies, the one euer faining, and the other euer falsifying the truth: that Caput hath made the Lord Cobham a Traitor: and Stew from Ottoburn altogether Iudgements drawne bewixt him and the Scots, to bring in a Counterfeite Richard, and to invade the land with foraine power, that he acknowledged no King but the lame Counterfeite in Scotland, and made himselfe a false Christ in rising againe the third day (as Walsley him will haue it) I am not ignorant: but his attainture of Treasons, I leaue it to the answer of Master Fox, who largely handled it: and for his combination with the Scots, vnto the letter of King Henrie owne hand, who having intelligence of the Scots intent, and the meanes by which they meant to worke, signifieth vnto his brother and vnic in these wordes, as from the Originall is taken.

Part of a letter written with King Henrie 5. in owne hand to the Duke of Beaufort.

Furthermore I will that ye commune with my * brother, with the * Chancelleur, with my Cousen of Northumberland, and my Cousen of Westmerland, and that ye set a good order and discipline for my Kerrie-Merches, and especially for the Duke of Orleans, and for all the Remnant of my Prisoners of France. And also for the King of Scotland, for as I am secretly informed by a man of right notable force in this land, that there hath bene a man of the Duke of Orleans in Scotland, and accorded with the Duke of Albany that this next summer hee shall bring in the manner of Scotland to Barre what he may. Also that there should be founden waies to the hawing away specially of the Duke of Orleans: and also of the Knight, as well as of the remnant of my foresaid Prisoners, that God defend. Wherefore I will that the Duke of Orleans be kept still within the Castle of Penfyll without going to Kerrie place, or to any other disport, for it is better he lacke his disport, then we were deceived of all the Remnant death as ye thinketh.

(48) Wherein we see the Complot, that heere not a word that it should be of Cobham composing. But as I affect not to iustifie the wicked, nor to make crooked things straight, so am I farr from discrediting authorities: only the eye of those times looking through the thicke foggy Cloudes, made the Sunne (which is bright in it selfe) to seeme in their lightes all bloody and darke.

(49) The like troubles (though not for the like cause) happened vnto Queene Isabe in the Kings absence, and time of Bedfords regency, whose offence was Capitall, if the accusation were true; that shee should by forcefleeke the death of the King, shee therefore was committed to safe keeping in the Castle of Leicester in Kent, and from thence to Penfyll attended only with nine other seruants: her Counsellor Frier Randolph a Doctor of diuinity was likewise apprehended as her Counsellor and worker in this diuillish art, for which he was committed to the Tower, where falling at words with the Parson of Saint Peters (the Church of that place) he was wounded to death: and Queene Isabe thereupon presently deliuered.

(50) King Henry proceeding in his Conquest of Normandy, about Hollande laid siege to the strong Towne and Castell of Fallais, continuing the same vnto the 20. of December, when the defendantes not able longer to resist, demanded and had Parley, with whome Thomas Earle of Salisbury, Henry Lord Fitz-Inghe, Sir John Carnwall, and Sir William Herrington Knights were by the King appointed Commissioners, who after some conference, lastly accorded vpon these conditions. 1. That if the King of France, the Duchesse, or Constable, did not by force raise the siege before the second of Ianuary ensuing, that the Towne should be rendred to Henry. 2. That all the strangers that were not properly Inhabitants of Fallais and had formerly fought against King Henrie in any place, belized and taken within Normandy, should be left to his mercie. 3. That all English Prisoners which were in the Towne should be (er at liberty, ranfome free and acquitted of their Oathes made vnto them while Prisoners they were. 4. That all natives of England, Wales or Ireland, that had fered against the King, should be left to his Iustice. 5. That neither Capitaine, Burgesse nor Townefman of Fallais should give any reliefe to the Castell, or victuall or munition, during the truce accorded. 6. That no person within Fallais should receive the Persons or Goods of any within the Castell, whereby they or their goods might be protected. 7. That the Captaines and Souldiers should receive no preiudice in their Horfes, Armes, or Goods: great Artillery, Shotte, powder and Croffe-bowes excepted: but thestrangers formerly spoken of in the second Article were exempted from that fauour. 8. That the Artillery, Powder, Shotte, and Croffe-bowes afore mentioned, should not, during the truce, be embazzelled, wilfully broken, or made away. 9. That during the truce, the raines made should not be repaired, and no new workes of defence erected. 10. That no oppression be vied by the sayd Souldier vpon the Burgesse, and if any were found fanity and not presently banished for the same, they should looke the benefite which otherwise they should haue by the accord. 11. That no Capitaine, Souldier, or Townefman should vnderhand comsay away any Prisoner, ornaments, Jewels, or Church Reliques, either belonging to Fallais, or to any other Church or religious Hoose, that were brought thither for safety. 12. That no goods should be purloined or carried out of the Town during the treaty.

13. That none of the Captaines nor Souldiers, nor any Burgesse should forsake the Towne, vntill the second of January next; and his maiesty of his grace and mercy, was pleased that all such as would remain in Falaise, should remain there in safety both in body and goods, so as they would be true subjects vnto him. 14. That none of the defendants of the Castell should be received into the Towne, nor their goods secretly kept by the Inhabitants vnder any pretence or Colour whatsoever. 15. That during the treaty no assault or offence should be offered by the kings army, to the Towne or to the Inhabitants, so as they do not ayde, assist or relieve the defendants in the Castell. 1. That for the true performance of the Articles twelve knights & Squires should be detained hostages to the King, and to be set at liberty when the Countenances above mentioned were fulfilled. These things concluded and subscribed with their names and seals, the 20. of December; vpon the second of January no succours appearing, the town of Falaise was accordingly delivered, but the Castell standing obstinate, the king was as diligent, till the defendants failing in their spirits, the first day of February demanded a Parley. Whereupon Henry confined making Clermont his brother his sole Commissioner. The Articles scored for the most part were as the former, whereto were added these which ensue.

(11) That vpon the 16. of the laid month of February, if the King in person, the Dolphin his sonne, or the Earle of Armagnac Constable of France, did not with force raise the siege, then Sir Olivier de Mauny Knight, gouernour of the said Castell, should render the same vnto King Henry. 2. That the said Gouernour and all other within the Castell should at the day assigned submit themselves to the King, and remaine his prisoners, trusting to his Maiesties toyall promise not to receiue offence either in life or goods: (Geoffrey Chabreaux only excepted) who was left simply to the Kings mercy. 3. That after the rendering of the said Castell, Sir Olivier de Mauny the Gouernour, should at his owne charges repaire all the breaches and ruines made in the walls during the siege, and leave it in the same sort as it was before the same was besieged. 4. That for the performance of these Articles, eight Gentlemen should remaine hostages to the King. 5. That when the Castell was prepared, Sir Olivier de Mauny, and all his Company should be set at liberty, and vntill then to remaine the Kings Prisoners, Geoffrey de Chabreaux also mentioned only excepted. These agreements concluded, the indenture subscribed, and King Henries seale of Armes thereto fixed, at the prefixed day according to these Articles the Castell of Falaise was rendered vnto him: which done, he diuided his Army into manie parts, vnder the severall conduits of the Dukes of Clermont, and Gloucester, and the Earle of Warwicke: who was diuers Calles by himselfe the while marching to besiege Rouen, where he set downe his siege, and began the assault in a furious manner: the defendants as obstinately bent to hold him out: so that to winne the Towne by force, Henry found it very difficult, aswell for the strength of Baillyardes and Ramparts as for the number of hands within it, to make resistance, and therefore to reduce them by famine was his only designe.

(12) For Burgoyne from King Charles had lent many worthy Capteynes with a thousand selected Souldiers to defend the City, and within it besides were fiftene thousand Citizens well trained and furnished: and the Towne stored with victuals for ten months continuance; notwithstanding K. Henry quartered about the Towne, and for his safety cast vp a Trench betwixt the walls and his men: the River Seine he blockt up with three Iron-Chaires, one of them layd two foote above water, another with the leuell, and the third two foote vnder the water, so forbidde all reliefe vnto the City by Boats.

(13) With the English, sixtene hundred Irish

Kernes were enrolled, from the Prior of Kilmainham, able men, but almost naked, their armes, were targets, darts, and woodes, their horses little and bare no saddle, yet very nimble, on which vpon every advantage they played with the French, in spoiling the Country, rifting the houses, and carrying away children, with their baggage, vpon their Cowes backs. Thus from Iune vnto December the siege had continued, and now victuals failing, and the Towne in distresse, the Normans sent some gentlemen, and as manie Burgeses, vnto King Charles, and the Burgoyne (then at Beaune) to signify their miseries: fifty thousand already famished with hunger, and twelve thousand stragglings put out of the Towne, but not sufficed to passe by the English, died by multitudes in the ditches, whose vnloued Carcases did infect the Towne with contagious diseases, so that without present reliefe they must be enforced to render.

(14) Ayde was promised, and earnestly expected, but in stead of supplies, the Bishop of Beaune accompanied with others, and the Cardinal of Pris sent from Pope Martin, were dispatched to King Henry, to entreat a peace; for the better accomplishing thereof, they brought with them the picture of the Lady Catherine, according to life, which King Henry well liked, yea and (Sir Serres saith) fell in loue with; but demanding a hundred thousand Crownes with the Duchies of Normandy, Aquitaine, Artois, and other Seignories for her dowry, nothing was concluded or done.

(15) And now the Normans helpeles of succour, and despairing of peace, resolved to make a braue fall vpon the Kings quarter: to performe which resolution, 10000. chosen men with their leaders issued out of the Towne, the vanguard (which was 2000.) being past and in fight, by misfortune the draw-bridge with ouer-weight of men brake, manie were drowned, slaine and hurt: neither was there any more passage that way, to releue their followers engaged in fight with the English; wherupon they made hast to the other Gates: but before they could come to give ayde, the vanguard was broken, and most of them slaine, and taken Prisoners. Vpon this disaster the souldiers within murmured against Guy de Bouteiller their General, murmuring that he had continued the breaking of the bridge.

(16) In these distresses King Charles returning towards Paris, sent the besieged word to make what shift they could, which vnspected message strooke a sad feare into the miserable defendants hearts, who weak in men and victuals, knew no way to succell, and thereupon in Counsell concluded to send vnto Henry, which presently they did. For whose entertainment, he caused two tents to be set vp at Port St. Hillarie. Their Commissioners were two gentlemen, two Clergie men, and two Burgeses of the Towne. Commissioners for the King were the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Earle of Warwicke: the demands of the Normans were many, but their answers were shant; that no conditions would be accepted, but simply yielding to the kings mercy; wherupon the conference brake vp, and these returned into the Towne, bred sundry distractions, some crying to yield, and other some crying to die like men, but Henry desirous to be Master of the Towne, and tearing it would be fired by themselves, if he was it by force, made the Archbishop of Canterbury his Instrument, whole vocation was fittest to call again the Commissioners, and againe fell inso treaty of Composition, which lastly was agreed, vpon these Articles as follow. 1. That the Burgeses should giue vnto Henry towards his expence in the siege, three hundred fifty six thousand Crownes of gold. 2. That Robert Linet vicar general to the Archbishop of Rouen, Iehan Tardieu who commanded the Canonies, and Alem Blanchart Capitaine of the Common people, should be left to his mercy without condition. 3. That all the people should sweare faith and loyalty to Henry and his Successors. 4. That

That the fouldest should bring all their Armes to a place assigned, and should depart out of the Towne unarmed with a Cudgell in their hands, first taking their Oath not to beare Armes against Henry, for a twelwe month next ensuing.

(17) This agreement was concluded the 16 of June Anno 1418. when as the hungry Citizens in multitudes came to the English Camp to buy victuals, which so abounded with Provisions, as a far more was sold for five pences of Paris money. Vpon the next day following, Henric triumphant made his entry into Rome; the Zealofulnes of the Towne, in their mirth and vestures, with their reliques, singing of Hymnes, conducted him to the Cathedral Church, where before the high Altar, vpon his knees, he gave thanks to God for the Conquest of this Towne, which had remained two hundred and fiftene yeeres in the possession of the French, even from the time when Philip King of France won it from King John of England. The day following, Alan Blanchet the Captaine of the common people was beheaded, Robert Linet, and Jehan Jourdan, put to their high ranfomes, the French Garrisons pillaged, unarmed, and put out of the Towne, but safely were conducted over Saint Georges-bridge to goe whether they would. Guy de Benthier, who was Captaine general of Rome, became King Henric's leigeman, vnto whom he gave all his lands, and a charge vnder the Duke of Gloucester. Immediately after the rendering of Rome, sundry other places of note yielded themselves, as Caudeter, Montfaucon, Digne, Feschem, Arques, Neufchâtel, Desmoult, En, Mouchaux, Verne, Monte, Carrey, B. Arce, Pateur-de-Mer, M. Alençon, Le Treuil, Tancarville, Alençon, Alençon, V. Alençon, Neufville, Bellacombre, Fontaines, Le Bourc, Preaux, Neufmarche, Leguier, Saint Germain, Sur Cussy, Baudemont, Bray, L. de-terre, Charles-M. d'Alail, Les Bauls Gailles, Cour, F. Fontaines, Le Bec, Creps, Rochelle, and diuers other places wherein Henry placed his Garrisons. France generally troubled, and trembling at the losse especially of Rome, Henric ready to pierce forward, and Charles declining through his infirmities encircling, the Duke of Burgoyne (who here all the way vnder that infirme King, and therefore much hated by the Dauphin, whose revenge he feared, much doubting Henric's rising fortunes, held it best to uphold his own greatness, by mediating a peace betwixt the two Kings. For which end he sent his Ambassadors to Henry, praying personal Conference; to which he assented and assigned the place, which was at Meaux, where in a field well trenched, and ramparted with strong Gates, two pailiuns were erected, the one for the Kings to repose themselves in, and the other for their counsell to consult in.

(18) Charles, Isabella, Burgoyne, and Catherine, the Count Saint Paul, with a thousand horse guarding them thither, came first. King Henry with his brothers of Clarence and Gloucester, attended vpon with a thousand horse, held the appointment; and now met, the two Kings embraced each others; Henry killed Isabella and Catherine, who indeed became a precious peace in his eye; Burgoyne a little bending his knee, did his reverence to Henry, who took him in his Armes; and the two nations though mortal enemies, demeaned themselves so civilly, as no cause of quarrell was offered on either side, much conference passed, but nothing concluded; Henric's demands seeming to the French to be so unreasonable. The treaty thus dissolved, and all ready to depart, King Henry not well pleased, spake thus vnto Burgoyne. "Cafes, I may not well dispise this refusal, but be ye affi-

"red that either I will have your Kings daughter, and all my demands for a life I will haue both you, and them put of France. You shall see your pleasure said the Duke, but before you shall think the King them, and me put of the Realm, you will be weary of the enterprise.

(19) The treaty thus broke, and danger nothing lesse, the Burgundians altogether French, and in heart no friend to the English, reconciled himselfe vnto the Dauphin, which deed was done after the cause of his owne death; and Henry dispensed with this combination, quickened his thoughts (full of reuenge) to prosecute the warre more sharply then heretofore; the first enterprise he made, was vpon Pontieu, vnto which Towne the last day of Iulie hee sent three thousand foote, which before the brake of day, and not discovered by the Centinels, let their Ladders to the Walls, mounted vpon, crying Saint George, and opening a Port let in their Companions. The Seigneur de L. Adam Marshall of France and Gouernour of the Towne, affrighted at the surprize, fled out at another Port towards Paris, after whose example about ten thousand Inhabitants did the like, so as the English without resistance were Masters of the Towne, where in great riches fell to the soldiers shares. When King Charles at Paris heard of the losse of Pontieu, in great feare with his wife, daughter, Burgoyne, and many noblemen, to be further from the fire to beere at hand, went vnto Troyes in Champagne, leaving Paris vnder the Gouernment of the Count Saint Paul, and Englebert de La Roche Chancellor of France, whilst Henry went forward with his intended enterprizes.

(20) For his brother of Clarence by three weekes siege won the Castell Guzer by composition, the Earle of Huntingdon sacked Preaux, burnt Breteuil, Clermont, and the Castell of S. denis, and Henry himselfe besieged the Castell of Guillel, and Rochepoin, two of the strongest holds in Normandy, which vpon compositions were surrendered, and further prevailed more then the French wished. For the Dauphin, the only man that stood for the publique defence of France, was miserably poore, and for want of pay could make no great shew of follo wers in the field, whose chiefe Counsellor was the Constable Armaignac an old craftie foxe, that had euer sided with Orleans against the Burgundians. And now fearing least his owne extreme should be lessened, or that Burgoyne should be the Arbitre to cross him in the wile Astrophell, or rather indeed thrust forward by decline to be the scourge and fall of France, hee counsilled the young Dauphin to seize vpon his mothers money, jewels and place, for his further supply to the publique use; (which immediately he did) to aduance the estate; but Queen Isabella impatient of their wrongs received, in a womanish spleene studies the reuenge, wholly neglecting the common cause, which gaue the English their footing in France, but the Dauphin to make good war he had done, leads the King in iulosity that the Queenes designs were dangerous, and altogether set for the alienation of the Crowne, which hee weak man, no sooner heard then believed, being euer ready to take her at the word and neuer ouergone in her looke at the heil.

(21) These sparks of sedition thus blowne in the Court, suspicions increasing, and maligners still working, Queene Isabella with her sister in law, the Dutchesse of B. were sent prisoners to B. and from thence to Rouen where they were kept with strict guard, three Gentlemen in Commission to take care of their ladies: till then her fauours had gone with Orleans, and with him had conuicted euer against Burgoyne, but now to quier her imprisonment, hee reconciled her selfe vnto him, and solicited his assistance for her deliurance; Burgoyne well perceiving how much it would aduance his part, to draw the Queene to be of his faction, brake vp his liege then laid before Carthel, and with certaine chiefe troopes repaired toward Troyes, from whence immediately he sent the Queene word of his coming.

Her keepers conceiuing their seconds were not farre off, as men dismayed, told the Queen of some fear, & that an enemie was neere at hand, whereunto shee answered, I am not ignorant who they are, and thereupon commanded to apprehend those her keepers; her liberitie thus got free became wholly for Burgoyne, and by his meanes was made the Regent of France, and her picture stamped vpon the Seale of that State.

(42) By birth shee was a Germane, and daughter to Stephen Duke of Bawer, of an imperious spirit, and vatreconcilable enmie, not oermuch beloued of her husband, and (as the nature of most women are) not oermuch fauouring his fauourites, whose small authority and hatred against her owne sonne Dauphin Charles fore bruited the Crowne, which her weak husband ware: his foregone infirmities and her new sprung Regency, were now as two fludges set open to let in the deluge of France, hers is to be spoken of in the intercourse of the Englishe; his many times hath borne, but not made knowne how it came: therefore a while in that subiect, before we passe forward in this place, let vs reade what others haue writ.

(43) This Charles the first, and sicke-brained King of France was the sonne of King Charles furnished the wife, who with alman his wile might haue demanded this question: who can tell whether his sonne shall be a wesman or a foole? for he flower of his youth and commendable dispositions of his middle age promised great hopes of a valiant, moderate and most happy Prince, only inclined to choller and reuenge, as by the occasion of his lunacy is easily seene, which chanced on this manner.

(44) Peter Craue a Courrier, his minion, and an inward fauorite of the Duke of Orleanes the Kings brother, blabbed out some secrecy of the said Dukes amorous passions vpon a wanton Lady, vnto his Dutchesse Valentine; who but lately married, and so soon deuoued of bed, took the wrong no lesse then it was, nor lested there (as who can let a woman to speake) to tell him his faults on both sides of his head, the Duke could not hide what hee too well knew, and therefore sought to satiate her with complements of kind words, but the Curtaine-sermons nightly enlarged vpon the same error, made him many times to lie awake with little deuotion (God woe) to heare, and often to rise when hee would faine haue slept, which caused him lastly to complaine to the King that Craue had, and would betray their oermuch trust. The cause no more, but yet too much against a Prince, Craue with all disgrace was discharged the Court, who not able to brooke liue an open indignity, assumed Clufne the Constable in a murthering manner, as the only man (as he thought): that wrought his disgrace, and elcaping Paris, fled into Brittaine whose Duke was his kinsman, and an enemy to the Constable.

(45) King Charles transported with choller of this double offence, minded to draw Craue by force out of Brittaine to iustifie himselfe, whom the Council had declared guilty of high Treason, and enemie to the Crowne of France, and resolued in person to enter into Brittaine forthwith the expedition for men and manner of proceeding made Charles to looke both meate and sleepe, so as the vexation of minde and distemperature of body, carried apparant shewes in his face: in so much that the Dukes of Berry and Burgoyne mistrusting the worth, counselled that his journey might be staid; his Physicians disswade him in regard of his health, the summer extreme hot, and his blood as then oer subiect to dangerous feuers. New deuises were wrought to stay him at home, giuing it forth that Craue was fled Brittaine, and in Arreign was imprisoned by the Queene. All this notwithstanding, needes would be forward, so forward is man when his fate will fo house it.

(46) He departed Meaux in Iulie: the yere very hot, his head covered with a great Cap of scarlet, his body wrapped in a thicke velvet linnen warme enough for winter, his mind distempered with choller, grieue, and despayre, and his body wearied with watching, distillature, and want of rest. Thus entering the Forrest of Meaux about noon-tide, a man bare-headed, and bare legged attired in a Coat of white russe, stepped sodainly forth from betwixt two trees, and caught hold of his bridle, laid his horse, saying, My ride no further but returne backe, for thou art betrayed. Charles whose spirits were otherwise dulled, and his blood greatly distempered, was amazed at the voice: which leene, his seruants ranne to this man, and with blowes forced him to leaue the reins of the horse: and so without any further search the man vanished away.

(47) The troopes of his nobles diuided because of the dult, King Charles was followed by the Pages of his Chamber, who oercharged with heat and distemperature, tooke no great paines to guide their horse, so that thronging together, he which bore the Kings Lance, let it fall vpon him, who had on his head the Kings helmet, and in the falling made a clattering noise. The King much musing vpon the words spoken, and now withall hearing this unexpected noise, was from a pensiue melancholly suddainly brucke into a raging Lunacy, snoppoling himselfe to be betrayed indeed, and transported with this frensie be drawes his sword, and made towards his Pages with a maine cry: his brother Orleanes not knowing the cause, hailed among them, whom Charles likewise pursued, and with the like rage ranne at his vncle of Burgoyne, thus spending himselfe and his horse out of breath, all incompassed the still raging man, tooke from him his sword, disrobed him for heate, and cheered him with flatterings and faire spoken words, his brother and vnckles saluted him, but hee knowes then not, lets mne, fighting and paining, and with troubled amatement moues both body and head, so that all signes of Phrensie appeared in this poore Prince, and the eminent misery that was to fall vpon France very apparant to the insinering Seaills: but now to proceed.

(48) John Duke of Burgoyne ill digesting the threats that King Henry had giuen, and joined in league with the Dauphin as we haue said: was notwithstanding suspected to be a great enemy to the State, and as the Giants are faine to heape mountaine vpon mountaine, for heere of assent to put Isipier out of his throne, so by sinister Counsellors Burgoyne was scould of some intended trauegence, as meaning to mount the Chaire where the Dauphin should sit: Charles therefore from Meaux sent Sarfant yonge a Towne in Brie, kintre for the Duke vnto Troyes in Champagne to conferre further vpon the effecting of their affected accord, as also to employ their united forces vpon the common enemie the Englishe, a third cause likewise was alleged, and that was to haue him his meanes for a reconciliation to his mother the Regent, whose wrath, besides him, no man could pacifie.

(49) The Duke mistrusting no snake in the grasse, thought all things as feras as they were faire in law, and accompanied with many noble-men, five hundred horse, and two hundred Archers, he repaired to Meaux, at whole Case the Dauphin had built 2. Barricadoes, & himselfe in armes stood there to receive the Duke, Burgoyne approached, knecled downe vpon one knee, and with an honorable reverence saluted him most humbly, the Dauphin neglecting all courtesies to himward, charged him with breach of promise, for that the ciuill warres and his garisons were not successe and withdrauue; the Dukes sword hanging too farre backe, and somewhat troehling his kneeling, he put his hand vpon the hilt, to put it more forward, whereat Robert de Laire standing by, sayd, doe you draw your sword against the Lord Dauphin? at which words Tanneguy de Chastell with a battle-axe stroke him on the face and cut off his Chin, and others with other wounds made an end of his life, before he could arise from his knee or get out his sword.

(50) Queene Isabel another cruell Mede and vnnatural mother, hauing a double offence done her, redoubled her wrath and continued her tragick passions against her sonne the young Dauphin, who not only incites Philip now the new Duke of Burgoyne to reuenge his murdered fathers death, but tormentes her poore husbands spiritus, in perswading him to disherite Charles their sonne, and to giue in marriage Lady Katherine vnto King Henry, who now had let his footte farre into France. Duke Philip for his part ready for reuenge, sent the Bishop of Arras with other his Ambassadors vnto Rouen to King Henry to entreat a peace, and againe not many daies after their returre sent backe the said Bishop, whole message was to plaining that Henry sent the Bishop of Rochester, the Earle of Warwicke and Gaine vnto Arras, who were as welcome vnto Duke Philip, so that betwixt Rouen and Arras messengers continually passed till a peace was concluded; which was proclaimed to continue from that day (then about the feast of the Epiphany) vnto mid-March ensuing, betwixt King Henrie, King Charles and Philip Duke of Burgoyne.

(51) King Henry thus farre gone in his affairs for that Crowne, sent his Ambassadors vnto the new made Pope Martin the first, such was the fate of Rouen Apostolical fathers in those faire Sun-shine and Golden daies, that the greatest Monarch was but a vassal to attend vpon their sturp & their Crownes lubest to be spurned off, with their feete. Henrie therefore minding to stop the violence of these narrow Seas, and to make the streame milde betwixt his two Realmes, had now none to let, but only him that was all in all, and bare an Oare in euery mans boat: and therefore from King Charles, Burgoyne, and himselfe, his Ambassadors solicited his fatherlie consent, to adme him his most Christian sonne of France, and to giue his holy blessing for the confirmation of the marriage, and peace concluded betwixt those two famous Princes. King Henrie, right to the French Crowne they plainly laid forth, what calamities France had felt in their resistance, Spaineourt, Normendy and Aquitaine (as they shewed him) were most lamentable wastefles, and the holde that the Lyon had got (at that day) of the Fleur de Luce, was not to be wrested out of his fast grasped pawes. But his dull eare was deafe here-vnto, answering that this peace was preiudiciall to the right of Charles the Dauphin, and therefore hee denied to confirme it.

(52) But with what quill these wines were vented from the leetled Lees for the Dauphin, vntil he it was the golden vice, (a powerfull key indeed to vnlocke the Popes silent lips), I know not; most true it is, the conditions went forward, and the place for the confirmation of coovenants was Troyes in Champaigne, where King Charles, and his Queene then lay, and whither Burgoyne, Gaine, the Lord Rasse, and others attended with five hundred horse, were sent Ambassadors from Henry. In their way they besieged (and after fiftene daies war) the Towne of Croissy that held for the Dauphin, demolished the Castell, razed the wals, and departed vpon composition. These coming to Troyes were honorably receiued, and loosingly concluded on a finall peace, where Lady Katherine was attended as the English Queene, and some left to guard her by King Henrie command. His Ambassadors returned, and affection enflamed, himselfe attended with the Dukes of Gla- ouce, and Gloucester his brethren, the Duke of Excester, the Earles of Warwicke, Huntingdon, Salisbury, Gaine and many other nobles, (his guard consisting of sixteene hundred Launces and Archers) departed from Rouen to Paris, to S. Denis, and from thence into France, where he was met nere vnto Troyes by the Duke of Burgoyne and many other French Lords, and with all Princelie attendance was conducted into the Towne. The ioy was great with which he was receiued, especially of the King, the Queene and Lady Katherine, whom he found in S. Peters Church expecting his coming, where forthwith he and the Lady was affianced, and falling offeones into conference of the conditions of amity, these were concluded vnto by the French and King Henry.

1. That K. Henry should take Lady Katherine to wife.
2. That Charles & Isabel should retain the name of King and Queene, and should hold all their dignities, reues, and possessions belonging to the Crowne of France, during their naturall liues.

3. That the Lady Katherine should haue her Dowry in England as Queens heretofore were wont to haue, that is to say, the summe of forty thousand scutres, that is, two to a noble.

4. That the same summe of forty thousand scutres yearly, shall bee confirmed vnto Queene Katherine by our lawes, according to our vsuall rights, at the time of our death.

5. That the said Lady Katherine so ouerlizing vs, from the time of our death, shall haue for her Dowry in the Kingdome of France, the summe of twenty thousand francs yearly, out of the lands, pieces, and Lordships that Blanche sometime wife to Philip Beaufield held and enioied.

6. That after the death of Charles our said father, the Crowne and Realme of France shall with all rights and appurtenances remaine vnto vs, & to our heires for euer more.

7. And for as much as our said father is infirme by reason of sicknesse, and may not enend in his owne person to dispose of the affaires of the Realme, therefore during the life of our said father the faculties and exercise of the government, and disposition of the publicke vtilitie of the Realme of France shall be, and abide to vs, so that thence forth we may gouerne the Realme, and admit to our Councell and assistance to the Councell of France such of the English Nobility as we thinke meete.

8. That also we of our owne power shall cause the Court of France to be kept and obserued in as full authority and in all manner of places, that now or in time coming, is, or shall be subiect to our said father.

9. Also that we to our power shall defend and helpe all, and cuary of the Peeres, Nobles, Cities, Townes, Cominalties and singular persons, now or in time to come, subiects to our father, in their rights, Customes, priuiledges, freedomes, franchises, belonging, or due vnto them in all manner of places, now or in time coming subiect to our father.

10. Also that we shall to our power trauell truly, & diligently, to see that Iustice be administered in the same Realme of France according to their lawes, Customes, and rights of the same Realme without personall acception; and that we shall keepe and hold the Subiects of the said Realme in tranquillity and peace to our power, and shall defend them against all manner of violence and oppression.

11. Also that we to our power shall provide that able and profitable persons shall execute the offices awell of Iustices and other offices belonging to the gouernance of the demaines of the Realme of France for the good and peaceable Iustice of the time, and for the administration that shall be committed vnto them.

12. Also that we of our power, so soone as it may commodiously be done, shall trauaile to put into obedience of our said father, all manner of Cities, Townes, Castles, places, Countreys and persons within friendship shall be betwixt the said Realmes and the Subjects of the same, and shall keepe themselves with their Counsailes, helpes, and common assistance against all men that enforce them to doe, or to imagine wrongs, harmes, displeasures, or greivances to them or either of them, and that they shall be contentiant in merchandizing freely and fairly together, paying the Customes due and accustomed, and that all the confederates and allies of our said father and the Realme of France, as also our confederates of the Realme of England shall in eight months space from the time of this accord of peace, as it is notified to them, declare by their letters, that they will draw to this accord, and will be comprehended vnder the treaties and accord of this peace, suauing nevertheless their obedience to either of the same Crownes, and to like manner of actions, rights, and reuenges, that belong to our said father and his Subjects, and to vs, and our Subjects against all manner of such Allies and Confederates.

33. Also that we for the things aforesaid, and every one of them shall giue our assent by our letters Patents, sealed with our seale vnto our said father, without all approbation, and confirmation of vs, and all other of our blood royall, and of the Cities and Townes to vs obedient, sealed with our great seale, shall make or cause to be made letters approbatory, and confirmed of the Peeres of his Realme, and of the Lords, Citizens, Burghesses of the same vnder his obedience, all which Articles we haue sworn to keepe, vpon the bolle Euangelists. Ycuen at Troyes the 30. of May, Anno 1420. And the same were proclaimed in London the 30. of June following, for the Copies of this treaty, the French King sent to every Town in France, as King Henry did likewise into England, there to be published by Proclamation. These Articles were concluded betwixt the two Kings, in the presence of Queene Isabel, the Duke of Burgundy, and the Kings Counsaile, the Prince of Orange, Seygneur Chastellain, Marshall of France, with many others the prime Nobility, both of England and France, both the Kings with the Queene, taking their solemne oath there, vpon the holy Euangelists, as did likewise the Duke of Burgundy, and the rest, Burgundy being the first man that laid his hand on the booke, and swore homage to King Henry, who thereupon was stiled and proclaimed Regent of France.

(55) In whose presence also vpon the third of Inne, (being the morrow after Trinity Sunday) the marriage of King Henry and Lady Katherine, with all pompous solemnity was celebrated, in Saint Peters Church at Troyes, the Bishop of that See, doing the Ceremonies. And after toyall feasts and Princely entertainments, before the dissolution of that toyall assembly, King Henry, insuing the French King and others his great Peeres to a sumptuous banquet, made a pithy and pleasing Oracion vnto them, thus testifying his Princely desire to aduance their weale, and demerit their loue.

(54) "As the chiefe matter whereunto my cares and endeours haue hitherto leuelled, hath bene, to vnite and concorporate these two Kingdomes of France and England into one, which now by Gods goodnes is most happily effected; so is it still, and ever shall be, both my desire and care, that vnto posterity we may leaue it settled in the same sort, and free from all emperchments, of factions, discords: that being as it is) the greatest, it may be alio the happiest Monarchie of Europe. For the cleere accomplishment of which worke, there rests now nothing, but the depresseing of the Dauphin, who is by your doome already, not only deprived of that dignity, but of succedion to the Crowne, and profecuted as a Traitor to the State; and of whom this we must be assured, that while he liues, France cannot but be in a perpetual combustion. For preventing whereof, I both need and intreat, both your Counsailes and aide, nothing doubting of your readines in either; for how can we expect any safety, or yon any goodnes at his hand, who, in his young yeeres, did so perfidiously murder the Duke of Burgundy his vnckle? I am now, you see, your Regent in present, and successeour to the Crowne in hope; Let it not therefore sticke in your hearts, that I am an Englishman borne, for you know I haue much French blood in my veins, which warms my affections as well to French as English, but looke on me as the lawfull heir to the Diademe, both by iust Title, and your owne consents, who therefore am, and ought to be, wholly yours; and your kindnes and iust dealing bind me so to be. Yours also am I now by fresh alliance, as sonne in Law to your King, vnto whom I will performe all offices of loue and honor, as to mine owne father; and yoo his Subjects shall I loue and cherish, as mine owne children, and will defend France and the French, so long, as you defend my right with your louing aide, and will deferre my loue with your loiall affection.

(55) These affaires thus accomplished at Troyes, the Kings, the Queenes, and the rest of the Peeres in great chaire rode vnto Paris, where all faire conueniencies were shewed, and great entertainment giuen to the English. But the Dauphin and his followers neither feared nor fainted, though the present courses pleased not their palat. Their first Counsaile therefore was how to preterfute themselves in so eminent danger so sit still and doe nothing, they knew it was but to increace and aduance the success of the English; and to rise without strength, was to fall into further misfortunes, having no meanes to hold warre with so potent an Enemy. In this distraction their voice was best heard, that spake most for the safety of the Dauphin (whose only life gaue breath vnto the after-hopes of France) and for the strengthening of those places which might be of most aduantage to themselves, and offence to the Enemy. This then past by decree in that Counsaile of warre, that the Dauphin should at no time hazard his person in field, and that a leuy of Souldiers should be had, to lie in Garrison in places conuenient; for France, which neuer stands still, they well thought might yet turne the rice for them, fortune being (said they) as subiect to fawne, as to frowne; in which resolution each man ranke to his charge, and all to withstand the doings of Henry.

French so in Paris Parliament of the three estates was assembled, wherein such as were guilty of the death of Burgundy, were indicted, the dishonoring of the Dauphin confirmed, and warres prepared against these Townes which held for him. Against Sens the two Kings with their Queene, Clarence, and Burgundy, marched; which after 12 daies was rendered vpon composition of life, though excepted as were guilty of the Duke of Burgundies death. Melun was the next, which by force was entered, where the body of the Duke of Burgundy, vnderneath buried by the Dauphin, was taken vp, and by his sonne Philip sent in great pompe to Düin in his Dutchy, and there honorably interred. The Towne being taken, the Castle held out: vnto whose Capitaine twenty Captaine Gentlemen were sent, whose liues from King Henries mouth (say the French) were sentenced to death, vnlesse they could perswade the Castellans to surrender; but those men (say our English) to mollifie that feruent doome) were all especiall friends of that Capitaine and such, as had giuen opprobrious words to the Kings Herald, being sent vnto them in the siege of Melun. Howsoever, in this extremity they solicited Guisay vpon their knees, vrging their owne deaths, and his great danger if he held out; hut Guisay, a true Frenchman, and friend to the Dauphin, withstood the assault, and thereupon these Gentle-men Petitioners were presently hanged in the sight of the defendants: so bloody is Mars to maintaine his owne Lawes, and so eager was Henry of his full Conquest of France, whose thrilling sword had heretofore bene somewhat overhust in blood, but neuer more (perhaps) then in this bloody act; which I with might be obliterated from the number of his other glorious actions. Yet at length was that Castle enforced to surrender vpon composition of life, excepting the guilties of Burgundies death.

(17) Then was the siege remoned to Melun, a Towne of great strength, and made more strong by the valours of her commanders, who were seigneur Barbasan an absolute souldier, Pierre de Bourbon a Prince of the blood, Preaux, and Bourgeois, whose Garrison was seven hundred Dauphinnes: and indeed no default in defence, could any wife be imputed, but the Canon opening a breach, the English and Burgundians made an entry into the Bulwarke, and ouer the River Seine built a bridge with Boates; so that from either quarter they had passage one to the other without impediments, and encamped themselves for their best advantage; vpon whom the enemy neuertheless made diuers sallies, with the losse of either parties. King Henry enforced his siege to the vtmost, and made a myne vnderneath the wals, which being perceiued, the defendants countermined against him; where the King (too forward) as the very last man entering his myne, and Barbasan likewise his within the Towne, met each other at point of sword, where they performed nobly the parts of priuate souldiers, (nobly indeed; if priuate souldiers they had been, but Princes should remember they are not such) till lastly they agreed to discover themselves, and first Barbasan made known his name, then King Henry did his, whereupon the French Lord suddenly getting backe, caused the Barriers to be closed, and Henry returned to his Campe.

(18) This enterprize failing, King Charles himselfe came into the Campe, to induce the defendants to render, as the presence of their naturall Lord; which neuertheless was little respected, for answer was made, that if their King were at liberty, and free from King Henries power, they would doe him the duty of naturall subjects, and yeeld him their charge as their Liege Lord; but being as he was, they desired to be excused, for to the mortall enemy of France they would not yeeld.

(19) Whiles King Henry lay at the siege of Melun, the Duke of Basie (who was Palatinate of Rhine Elector) came to King Henry having married his sister, and thence sent a defiance vnto the Dau-phs his kinsman by Queene Isbell his mother; the Prince of Orange likewise came thither vnto Henry, but because he required an Oath of him, as a subject of France, he went away displeased, saying, he was a free Prince, and ought neither obedience to England nor France. At which time the Parisians with more respect of their owne safety committed their City vnto K. Henries deuotion who depared his brother Clarence (though Count Saint Paul with his French displeased) Governour thereof, and put Garrisons into the Bastille of S. Anthoine, the Louvre, and the Hestill de Nesle. During this siege, mandatory letters were sent by King Charles into Picardy, to put all places that held for him in those quarters into Henries possession, and to take the Oath of their obedience vnto him as to the only heire, Successor, Regent, and Governour of France; the execution whereof was committed to the Count of Saint Paul, the Bishops of Beauuence and Arras, the Vicars of Amiens, the Lord of Venduill, the Governour of Lisle, Pierre J. Marigny Advocate of the Parliament, and George Oflend the Kings Secretary, beginning thus; Charles par le Grace de Dieu. &c.

(60) The distress of Melun, was wonderfull great as well vpon the siegers, as defendants; the one afflicted, and their troupees fore weakened with mortality, the other oppressed with famine, and other defects incident to a long indured siege. In this State eightene weekes were spent, and more had bene, but that the English were supplied with soldiers out of Picardy, whose colours displayed a farre off, put the Towne in hope of reliefe, as sent from the Dauphin, but vpon their neerer approach, Melun was rendered by these capitulations. 1. That the Towne and Castle should be deliuered to the King. 2. That as well the men of warre, as the Burgesies, should submit themselves to King Henry, to be dealt with as pleased the King. 3. That all such as were found guilty of the Duke of Burgundies murder should suffer death. 4. That all the rest of the souldiers should be recieued to mercy, but to be prisoners vntill they put in good caution for their true obedience in after times. 5. That the Nations of France should be sent home to their owne Countreys. 6. That all the moueables and Armes in the Towne should be carried into the Castle. 7. That all the Prisoners they had taken either before or during the siege, should be enlarged ranfomefree, and acquitted of their promises. 8. That for the performance of these Articles, 12. of the principall Capaines, and 6. of the wealthiest Burgesies should deliuer themselves in hostage. 9. That all the English, and Scots, should be deliuered to Henry and left at his disposition.

These things accorded, an English Garrison was put into Melun, commanded by Pierre Ferrel Preux de Bourbon, seigneur de Preaux, and valiant Barbasan, with fixe hundred Prisoners of quality, were sent with a strong guard vnto Paris. The guilties of Burgundies murder were all of them put to death, amongst whom were two Monks, and Bertrand de Chartreux a Gasconne, (a man in great fauour with King Henry) for that he at King Henries entry into Melun, had couated thence one Amour de Lau, who was proued guilty of Burgundies death. The Duke of Burgundy himselfe, as also Clarence earnestly labored with King Henry for Bertrands pardon, but the King, though much grieued, and protesting that he had rather haue lost 50000. Nobles, yet was refoled he should die for example to all such, as should dare to offend, vpon presumption of their nearnes and grace with their Princes.

(61) Melun being rendered, and these things thus disposed, the two Kings with their Queenes most honorable attended, returned to Paris, before whose entrance the Citizens and Students met them in most solemne manner, hauing beautified the City with flagges, streamers and rich hangings throughout the streets where they should passe. rode together vnder a rich Canopie, Henry vpon the left hand, next vnto whom followed the Dukes of Clarence and Bedford, and vpon their left hand the Duke of Burgundy clad all in blacke, the Princes and Nobles of either Nation mingled together in their degrees, the Clergy with processions, and their venerable reliques, going before them to Nafire dame Church; and the next day the two Queenes entered the City with as great a shew. King Henries Palace was prepared in the Loure, which was most rich and magnificent, and Charles his Court in the Hostel of Saint Paul, being both homely and meane; for (saith Miller) young Henry commanded all, and his brethren exercised supreme authority, whilst olde Charles stood as a Cypher, and the French Nobilitie had nothing to doe.

(62) During the two Kings abode here, a great Assembly was called as well of the Spirituality, as of the secular Nobilitie, in whose presence, in the great Hall of the Hostel, a State for Iustice was prepared, where the two Kings sitting, as supreme Iudges, vnder one Cloath of estate, the Court was furnished with Princes and Officers in most soleinne wile. Before whom, Nicolas Rellin advocate from the Duke of Burgundy, and the Dutchesse his mother, craved audience (and had it granted) vnto an inuictiue and long Oracion against Charles Frisconie Narbone, Tanegney, Barbasin and others, for the cruell murder of John Duke of Burgundy; and not only that the murderers might be accordingly executed, but withall, that a Church might be founded and furnished with sacred Ornaments for twelue Chaplines, sixe Chaplaines, and sixe Clerkes to pray for his soule for ever, every Channe to haue yearly two hundred pound Paris money, every Chapline one hundred, and every Clerke fifty, to be leised vpon the Lands of the Daulphin, and his associates in the murder: that the same foundation should be engrauen vpon the Porch thereof, and the like inscription set vp publicly in the Cities of Paris, Rouen, Grand, Dijon, Saint James of Compostelle, and Ierusalem. This motion was seconded by a Doctor of Divinity appointed by the Beiller of the Vniuersity, who concided with an humble request to the King and those Princes, that iustice might be done. Whereunto the Chancellor of France, in the behaue of King Charles, promised that no endeuour on his part should bee lacking; and thereupon caused his sonne to be solemnly called to the Marble-Table, to answer his accusation, by the name of Charles Duke of Touraine, and Daulphin de France, which done three severall times, and he not appearing, by arrest of the same Court of Parliament, he was banished the Realme, and indged unworthy to succeed in any of the Seignories as well present, as to come. But the Daulphin appealed from this sentence to God and his sword, and still was the same, though his fortunes were changeable. Monsieur de Barbasin was vehemently accused to haue his hand in the murder, and therefore King Henrie accordingly gave sentence on him to suffer to death; but he in open Court defended himselfe, nor to bee guilty of the crime, although he confessed to be a true traitor to the Daulphin. Notwithstanding, had he not appealed to the Officers of Armes, King Henrie judgement of death had gone against him: for the Law Military, as he there alleged, forbiddeth, that any man, having his brother in Armes within his danger, should afterwards put him to death for any cause or quarrell, and proued himselfe to be the Kings brother in Armes, for that he had in the Countermine coped in combat with the King. Thus by a quirk of Heraldry acquitted from death, he was neuertheless retained in prison the space of nine yeeres, and lastly at the winning of Castle Galliard from the English, was deliuered out of most strait imprisonment, to the great ioy of the French.

(63) This execution of Iustice on those Murderers, was a great, but not the only act of K. Henry at this great Parliament of three Estates of France in Paris. For therein also was the final accord betwixt the two Kings, openly acknowledged by the French King, as made by his free assent, and with aduise of all the Conncell of France; wherupon it was there also ratified by the generall Estates of France, and sworne vnto particularly vpon the holy Euangelists, by all their Nobles and Magistrates, spiritual and secular, who also set their seales to the Instruments thereof, which were sent into England to be kept in the Kings Exchequer at Westminster. King Henries glory thus afforded to the highest verticall in France, his Court was not only honored daily both with Courty and military shewes and pageants, but also was still frequented both with forraigne Ambassadors, and domestike Commissioners, whose directions depended only vpon his voluntery assent, himselfe redressing all things at his pleasure, placing and displacing Officers and Gouverneurs, causing also a new Coyne to be made, called a Solide, wherein were the Armes of France, and the Armes of England and France, quarterly stamped. King Charles the while in his Palace, was hnt for filthy sake visited, and but by some of his olde seruantes, his Suene was drawne to neere vnto the letting. The great affaires of France thus settled, (as well as that visited time would permit,) King Henry minding to Crowne his Queene in England, ordained his brother of Clarence, (a wise, valiant, and a great Captain) his Lieutenant generall of France, leaving also the Duke of Beiter with 500. men of warres to keep Paris; and so attended with great state, he came to Amiens and Calais, where taking to Sea, he arrived at Dover vpon the third of February, and was received of his Subjects as an Angell from heauen, or another victorious Caesar on Earth.

(64) All things in a readines for his faire Queens Coronation, vpon the foure and twentieth of the same month, with all toilitie the same was solemnized at Westminster, and the English rich diademe set on her head. The least was great, with all Princely seruices, and the state such as deserveth the report; for the Queene sitting at Table, at the right side of her Chaire, kneeled the Earle of March holding a Scepter in his hand; the Earle of Marshall kneeling on the left side, held another, and the Countesse of Kent sat vnder the Table at her right foot; vpon her right hand at Table sat the Bishops of Canterbury and Winchester, and vpon the left the King of Scots, the Dutchesse of Iork, and the Countesse of Huntington; the Nobles giuing their attendance, each man according to his office and place.

(65) Presently, after Egles, in the month of May, a Parliament was held at Westminster, whose chiefest intent was to haue means to continue the Kings Conquest in France, but such was the state of tholelanish times, that, to stop the current of this melting mint, some minding more the heapes of their money, than the spreading abroad of Englands faire Monarchy, exhibited their Bills vnto the three Estates in Parliament, and petitioned vnto the King, to commiserate the poverty of the commons, which (as they said) were beggered by their warres. For which cause, as it seemeth, no subsidy or ayde was demanded, but the King againe pawning his Crowne to his vncle Beaufort, the rich Cardinal, forty twenty thousand pound, before the said month was expired, with foure thousand horse and foure and twenty thousand foote returned into France to follow those warres.

(66) Neither was his halt more then needed; for John Earle of Bugehaman, and Archibald Douglas, two valiant leaders of seven hundred resolute Scots, repaired into France to ayde the Daulphin, and joining with the French in Amiens, meant to haue surprized the Duke of Clarence before he had beene aware; in which enterprise, foure straggling Scots, taken and brought to his presence, as he sat at dinner, revealed the intent and strength of the Enemy, whose approach was vnto neere at hand. ner came, but the Duke overhastily got to horse (saying, they are all ours) leaving his troops to follow him with almost celerity as they might. His suddaine and unlooked-for approach, caused the Scots to take into the Church of Bargie for their safety, where whilst they were making defence, the rest took the Alarme, and the Earle of Burgheban manned the Bridge, to whose ayde, Hugh Kennedy with an hundred horse presented himselfe.

(67) The Duke of Clarence seeing no possibility to free the passage with his slender troope of horse, alighted on foot, & gave forth with a furious charge, where the Earle of Burgheban came to blowes, being followed by two hundred horse, and either side fighting with equall courage and rancour. Clarence gave singular demonstration of his great valour, vntill, as he was remouing, one Iohn Swinton a Scot, wounded him in the face with his Lance, and threw him to the ground, being the first man of the English that there was slaine, where likewise died the Earle of Kyne, the Lords Gray and Roffe, besides other men of marke, and fifteene hundred common souldiers, the Earles of Huntington, and Summerset, with Thomas Beaufort his brother, were taken prisoners. The cause of this overthrow, is imputed to the Duke's hast in not staying for his Horsemen. Clarence that day upon his Crest wore a Circle set with precious stones, which being taken off his Helmet by a Scot, was sold to Iohn Stewart of Derby, for a thousand Angles. For this fortunate dayes successe, (wherein yet the Enemy also lost eleven hundred, and sundry of them men of principall note,) the Dauphin made the Earle of Burgheban Constable of France. This losse receiued the Earle of Salisbury, (who followed with the other forces, but came too late to the encounter,) thought to requite, and bringing forward his troups, the enemy gave ground, whereby yet he recovered the dead bodie of Clarence, and lent it to Rouen, from whence it was conveyed into England.

(68) After this victory the Dauphin besieged Alencon, which the Earle of Salisbury with his best forces sought to releue; but finding the enemy too strong, retired to the Abbey of Bequin whole retreat the French charged vpon him, and slew three hundred of his troups, but finding no means to possesse Alencon raised their siege & returned to Amiens.

(69) King Henry therefore vpon notice of his brother's death, was much perplexed, for besides the naturall affection of a brother, his widome, valour, and counsell in the warres was highly esteemed by him, and to speake truth, there were very few Princes of that age to be equall'd vnto him. Wherefore ordaining his other brother, Iohn Duke of Bedford his Lieutenant, and leaving his faire Queene most honorably attended, vpon the death of Jane he landed at Calis, hauing in his companie James King of Scotland, in hope either to draw the Scots vnto his service, or else to withdraw their aides from the Dauphin, by the sight of their owne King vnder his roiall standard. But the Scots, constantly French, being demanded why they would fight against their Soueraigne, answered directly that they might not acknowledge any duty vnto James, who as yet liued vnder the obedience of another. His designe thus fayling, his confidence was in his right and his sword.

(70) The morrow after his arrival he dispatched the Earle of Dorset, and the Lord Clifford with twelve hundred horse and foot vnto Paris, to releue the Duke of Exeter, who was straitned of victuals by the Dauphin, that harried the Countrey adioyning, taking Bouen, Calendon, and some other forties, and in his fortunate successes, and new conceited hope then marched to Chartres with seven thousand men at Armes, foure thousand Crosse-bowes, and fixe thousand Archers strong, where he began the siege, whom the Ballard of Thien bravely resisted, and sent to King Henry for aide.

(71) Henry, after a few daies stay in Calis, marched to Meung, and there lodged, quartering his Army in the villages about, where he found the Duke of Burgoyne somewhat impaired of health: three daies spent in conference, King Henry marched into Pontiers, and the Duke to Amboise vpon some, to facilitate his passage there to be made, whereof some doubt was held by reason of the Inhabitants disposition altogether valiant, and as ready to offend, as affect. Henry in his way took the Fort called La Ferté, commanded by the Ballard of Bellay, which vpon summons rendered, and being committed to the Custody of Burflouer Picard, was betrayed againe by him vnto the Dauphin: from hence departing, he passed the river at Achille, where he was roundly receiued, and richly presented, whence he marched to Brannou Gisors, and so to Beau de Passennes, where Charles and his Queene resisted, and receiued him with great honour, and lastly to Paris where he was receiued in triumph.

(72) But more mindings Conquest then the delicate pleasures of Court, after he had consulted vpon his affaires, and leaued French forces to adde to the English, he marched toward Meaux, intending (in reuenge of his brother's death) to fight with the Dauphin, who had now laue before Chartres the space of three weekes, and given it forth he would come into the field. But hearing of King Henric's coming, and that his Armie by the access of supplies, from Paris and Normandy was much increased, he brake vp his siege and departed: which newes related, Henry marched to Dreux and fate downe before it. The Inhabitants and Garrison sensible of the danger, praied parley, and accorded to render the Towne, if the Dauphin did not releue them by certaine day, which expired, the Towne was deliuered, and eight hundred of the Dauphin's souldiers permitted to depart vpon their Oathes, not to beare Armes against King Henry, nor his allies for the space of one yeere: then following the Dauphin (who fled still before him) in his march he took Baugency, Amboise, and other places of defence.

(73) Seeing his pursuit of the flying Dauphin to be fruitlesse, he diuered his Army vnto Lagny vpon the river of Marne, where he caused many engines and habiliments for the warre to be made; hauing a designe to besiege Meaux in Brie, and infect the Faulx bourgs, leading before him the Duke of Beaufort with foure thousand strong, to prevent the burning of Meaux, by the Inhabitants, and a few daies after followed himselfe. His first worke was to secure his Armie, by entrenching his Quarters, which done, and the Artillery mounted, he beganne to batter the wals, and to make his Mines, wherein neither his industry nor personall labour was spared, and within, the Ballard of Parum with many men of Marke, besides the Inhabitants, and a thousand trained souldiers, were as busie and resolute for the defence. Meane while Jacques de Harecourt, in service of the Dauphin, with seven hundred souldiers harried the parts about Flines, against whom, some English Garrison thereabout, assembling, slew three hundred of his retinue, himselfe hardly escaping by the swiftnesse of his horse.

(74) Whilst King Henry lay in his siege before Meaux, newes was brought him that his Queene at the Caille of Windsore was deliuered of a sonne, named also Henry, wherat he exceedingly reioiced, though, as some will haue it, he liked not well the place of her deliuey, hauing before commanded the contrary, and prophesying, that what Henry of Monmouth should get, Henry of Windsore would lose. At the same time likewise he heard that Anthonies in Normandy, was surprized by the Dauphin; and about three hundred English there in Garrison put to the sword, or taken Prisoners, to remedy which, King Henry lent part of his owne Armie vnto the Earle of Salisbury his Lieutenant of Normandy, who within few daies recovered Anthonies and reuenged the death of the surprized.

(75) But Henric sieg leffened through the fire in Normandy, and his mind bowed upon his affaires that way, fited opportunity to Saigneur de Offemont, vnto whome the befieged had many times made knowne their desires to haue him their Gouernour; on a night therefore (ladders made readie to put o-uer the walls to recue him) he secretly approached the place, but being discovered by the Centinels, and the alarm taken, he not able to recover the ladders, fell into the ditch, whence by reason of his heavy armour hee could not free himselfe, and in taking was wounded in the face: the King esteeming the taking of so braue and valiant a Capitaine, as a prize of much importance. The Defendants now hopelesse of succour, and finding themselves not able to hold out, carried all their goods from the towne into the * Castile, but the assailants discovering their actions, and perceiving their feare, gaue a fierce assault, and by force made way into the Towne with their swords: then Henry planting his Canons, began to batter the Castile, and shortly brought it to that extremity, that besides want of bread, most of their hand weapons were broken, and all of them in a manner dangerously wounded; yet desired they not to provoke the English with opprobrious words, which caused such heavy conditions to be laid on them, as the like had not bene of any surrender before.

(76) The place thus rendered vnto the King, hee presently sent eight hundred selected persons prisoners to Paris, Rouen, and England. Then order was taken for repairing of breaches, and a strong Garrison left in Meaux and the March. After which surrender, Cressy, the Castile of Pierrepont, Merlan, Offemont, and sundry others submitted themselves to Henry, whilst the true Dauphin set fire on theirs, before hee could attaine to their sieg.

(77) Queene Katherine in England daily hearing of the Kings mischance, desired greatly the sight of his person, and to that end prepared her voyage for France, vnder the conduct of Duke Iohn the Kings brother, then Regent of England, who deputed for the time of his absence, his brother Humphrey Duke of Gloucester, andooke shippes at Southampton. The winds prosperous, the 21. of May fled at Hartſen, and with full-encreasing troops of Noblemen, by enlie iourneyes came to Rouen, and thence to Bois de Vincennes, whither liet husband, her father and mother with great late came to meete her, of all whom shee was receined as some Angelical person, who together removed to Paris, where King Henry and Queene Katherine in the Louvre, vpon the festiual of Penetecost, faire in their royall robes, with their imperial Crownes on their heades, and kept their Court with great confluence of people, K. Henry assigning the affaires of the Provinces.

(78) But though Champaigne, Picardie, Brie, and Normandy with the Isle of France were in Henrics possession, yet was not all reduced to his quiet obedience, a great and strong part holding not ill for the Dauphin, who with twenty thousand strong besieged La Charay vpon Loire, andooke tie from whence hee marched to Cone vpon the same river, whose Defendants agreed, that if Burgundy did not raise the sieg by the sixteenth of August, they would surrender; which the said Duke accepted, and thereupon sent proffer of battell to the Dauphin, who was likewise as readie (and by his Herald gaue his faith) to trie his fortune in the field: The day assigned, and preparation made, the Duke of Burgundie to King Henry for his assistance; whose answer was, that himselfe and his forces would not faile to bee with him that day, and run the same fortunes with him in the field.

(79) But great Henrics stout mind was crossed with his now crazy body, his health being so empained with a burning feauer and fluxe, that he was disordered from the March to the command of the Army was committed to his brother Iohn Duke of Bedford, and the Earle of Warwick, who ioyning their forces for avoiding of contentions, through all their ranks intermingled the English, Burgundians, and Picardians together, and so the night before the designed day of battell, came to Cone and encamped neere to the Towne; yet vadaunted Henry, who neuer miscarried in any of his personall enterprises, taking his leave at Senlis of K. Charles, and the two Queene, in his horse-litter (with a guard for his person) marched (though weak) after them; but at Atelun finding his sicknesse to encrease, and himselfe (so he crst could endure all things) now vnable to endure travel, he returned to Bois de Vincennes.

(80) The English colours displayed in the Dauphins eye, and his power inferior in shew vnto them, how feewer hee had vaunted, he thought it not best to aduenture the field, and therefore dislodging from Cone, he marched to Barry, both to protract time, and to weary the enemy. Cone thus relieved, the Dukes marched to Tragen in Chen pagne, and set down their Army for the sieg; but before the cords of their reuts could be sufficiently made fast, the Duke of Bedford had heavy newes of Great Henrics encreased sicknesse, and danger of death: wherefore leaving the Duke of Burgundy with the Armie, hee posted to Bois de Vincennes, where finding the relation too true, hee greatly lamented his dying brothers estate: but the King much reioycing of his brothers coming, cheerefully comforted his mourning friends and Nobles, and made vnto them this graue and his last dying speech.

"nely and mercy, which shall crowne my memory with glory, and free mee from blame and slander, which in long reignes can hardly be avoided: but you haue mist cause to mourne at my vntimely death, and it cannot bee but a generall griefe to my people, that in such an Ocean of businesse yet depending, I shall leave you and them destitute of a Prince able to gouerne: but your sorrow ought to be so much the lesse, when you call to mind the frailty of worldly thinges, and that euenmore there will bee somewhat wanting which wee desire. My first request vnto you shall bee this, that with an unanimous affection to industrie, foresee and provide, that the counsell which I name may be followed. I further earnestly entreat you to loue my lasour Henry, to instruct him with your wisdomes, that by your counsell, care and loue, hee may be made able & worthy to wield to great an Empire. Comfort my deare wife, the most afflicted Creature liuing, extend your loues vnto her in the same proportion as I haue entreated you. Touching the publike I admonish and exhort you to brotherlie concord, and neuer to breake league with Philip Duke of Burgundy (and if you shall thinke it good, let my brother Humphrey Duke of Gloucester gouerne England, and not depart vpon any occasion whatsoever, vntill my sonne Henry be of yeeres to sway the estate; and my brother Iohn Duke of Bedford with the assistance of Philip Duke of Burgundy, to manage the Reialme of France. Concerning Charles (commonly called the Dauphin) either he must by your wordes be made to submit himselfe, or else you shall neuer be in quiet; and it were as good to render him the possession of what you haue: wherefore sleepe not, and while you haue meanes and opportunity be industrious. Lastly, I beseech, charge, and command you, (howsoever tyme or occasion may perswade, or lauite you to the contrary) that Normandy receiued by my industry, and your wordes, being the ancient inheri- tance of the Crowne of England, be not alienated for any cause whatsoeuer. Among other things then enjoined, he willed that the Duke of Orleans, the Emile of En, Guacourt, and Guichard de Sifay should not be ransomed, vntill yong Henry were of yeeres to gouerne.

(82) Thus said, and drawing neere to the period of his short but glorious life, he demanded of his Physicians how long (in their iudgement) he might be liued wherunto when one of the answered, Sir, thinke on your soule, for your time is not about a. houres: he made his confession, & his Chaplains afterward kneeling in prayer, when one of them out of the Psalms made mention of Ierusalem, the king no sooner heard the name, but with a loud voice he said; Lord thou knowest, that my purpose was to conquire Ierusalem from the Infidels, if it had pleased thee to haue giuen me life: & then in a right faith, adored hope, perfect charity and sound memory, hee rendered his soule to his Creator, after hee had reigned nine yeeres, six monethes, and fourteene dayes, leaving none like vnto him amongst all the Kings and Princes of Christendome, for whose cause his death was not onely bewailed of the English, whom hee gloriously had ruled, but also of the French, whom hee had victoriously conquered. This was the manner of this triumphant Monarchs end, which moues men infinitely to wonder at Helier Betsuin, who saith, he was stricken by God for sacrilege, and died miserable: Heliers friends haue occasion to wish, that his Readers should not make that miserable iudgement, the rule and measure of crediting or discrediting his other writings, yet lamentable his end was indeed, if he perished by poison, wherof there was a vehement suspicion, as Folquier Fergill hath asserted, and the carriage of the French affaires afterward makes it more then probable.

(83) His workes of pious affection were thrust in crediting the Monasteries of Beckham & Briger, were vnto his Manour of Richmond, as also his princely gifts vnto the workes and furniture of Westminster Church, besides the brotherhood of S. Giles without Creeple gate London. And (which had perspiced all the rest) hee intended (such was his loue to learning, and to the place where himselfe was a learner) to haue founded in the great Castle at Oxford, a magnificent Colledge for Diviners, and Students of the liberal Sciences, the pious and ordinations of which foundation hee had already drawne, and resolved to endow it with all the lands in England, belonging to Priors Aliens: but his vntimely death preuented both that, and many other noble workes. To leaue a domesticke testimony of his affection to Armes, hee first instructed Carlar principall King at Armes: besides other augmentations to the Order of Saint George. In a word, neuer liued English King with more true glory, nor euer diademy in a more vntensionable time, nor more lamented: for he was goodly in heart, slow in speech, sparing of words, resolute in deeds, prudent in Council, prudent in iudgement, modest in countenance, magnanimous in action, constant in undertaking, a great Admirer, devout to Godward, a renowned Soldier, fortunar in field, from whence hee returned without vnterric. These, with many others (I might almost say, all others) vertues are attributed to this most renowned amongst English Kings; the more to be admired to him in so short a reigne, and in those yeeres, hee being but of 36. yeeres, when he breathed forth his glorious soule.

(84) His bowels were interred in the Church of Saint Maure de Fosse, and his embalmed Corps was closed in Lead, and attended vpon by the Lords of England, France, Normandy, and Flanders, was brought vnto Paris (where in the Church of our Lady Solenne exequies were performed) and thence to Rouen, where it rested till all things were ready to set forward for England; though the Cities of Paris and Rouen shroue, and offered great summes of gold to haue Houers royall remains entered amongst them. His picture artificially was moulded of boyled hides, and countenance painted according to life, vpon whose head an imperiall Diademe of gold and precious stones was set, the body clothed with a purple robe, furred with ermine, in his right hand it held a scepter royall, and in the left a ball of golde in which manner it was carried in a Chariot of State, covered with red velvet, embroidered with gold, and oner it arch Canopie, borne by men of great place. Thus accompanied by lamer King of Scotland, many Princes, Lords and Knights of England and France, he was conuaied from Rouen to Abbeville, to Hesdin, to Montreuil Boleyn, & Calais, the Chariot all the way compailed about with men all in white garments, bearing burning Torches in their hands; next vnto whom followed his household seruants, all in blacke, and after them the Princes, Lords, and Estates in vestures of mourning adorned; then two miles distant from the corps followed the illustrious Queene, attended with princely moultiers, her tender and pierced heart more my mourning, then her outward sadde weedes should in any sort expresse.

(85) And thus by Sea and Land the dead King was brought vnto London, where through the streets the Chariot was drawne with foure hories, whose Caparisons were richly embroidered, and embroidered with the royall Armes, the first with Englands Armes alone, the second with the Armes of France and England in a field quartered, the third bare the Armes of France alone, and the fourth three crowns Or in a field Azure, the ancient Armes of King Arthur, now well becoming him who had victoriously vnted three Kingdomes in one. The body with all pompous celebrity was entered in the Church at Westminster (for so Houers had by his last will commanded) next beneath King Edward the Confessor, vpon whose Tomb be Queene Katherine caused a rotall picture to bee laid, courted all over with silver plate

CHAPTER XVI.

* Denary. l. vi. 15.

Henry the sixth began to reigne the last day of August, being the day of his father's death.
Anno 1422.

Ad God almighty (the giuer and transferer of Kingdomes) thought good that the English should haue reled in the Continent of Europe, and not haue bene shutt vpon within their Blands, hee would not so soone haue depriv'd them of their late incomparable Captaine and Sovereigne Henry the fifth. But it seemes that God having humbled the French Nation vnder Henries victorious hand, ment now again to restore them to his wonted fauour by taking away their terror & triumph, substituting his son (an infant) in his place, Henric of that name the 6. born at Windsor, who was crowned about the eight month of his age. The pretty hands which could not feed himselfe, were yet made capable to wield a scepter, and hee that was beholding to nurses for milke, did nevertheless distribute the substance of law and iustice to so great and warlike Nations. Counsell supplies the defect of age. At his fathers death hee had vnder, men of approved valour and discretion, to whom the principall care of all publike affaires by the fathers last provisions was committed. Henry Duke of Gloucester (the younger brother of two) had the government of England entrusted to his fidelity: the regency of France was assigned for Province to John Duke of Bedford, the eldest liuing vnckle of the King, as to a Prince of much magnanimity, prowess and felicity in conduct, with whom was assigned Philip Duke of Burgundie. The guard and custody of the royall Infante was assigned to Thomas Duke of Excester: the nurture and education to his mother, the Queene Dowager: vpon the two vnckles (as betwixt the two Poles of the English Empire) the whole globe of government moved: whatsoever is dooe by the kingly power is said to be dooe by the King. We shall behold notwithstanding in the tragical glass of this Henries raigne, how farr the imbecillity of the kingly per-fun may affect the body politicke with good or euill. If histories were ordayned to stirre affections, not to teach and instruct, as yet any Princes raigne since the Conquest did better defende to bee described with a tragical stile and words of horror & sorrow, although the beginning like the faire morning of a most tempestuous day promised nothing more then a continuance of passed felicitie.

(3) For the State of the English affaires was great and flourishing, England without tumult, the natural fierce humors of her people consuming or exercising themselves in France, and France her self for the nobler parts together with the grand City of Paris head of that Monarchie) was at their devotion. There wanted nothing which might aduance the worke begonne. Most noble and expert Leaders as those which had bin fashioned in the schoole of warre, under the best martiall master of that age, the late Henry, arms full of veteran solidiers, most of which were of skill sufficient to be commanders themselves: their friends firme, no defect nor breach (by which dissipation might enter to the overthrow of the English greatesse) as yet discoling themselves. Wisdome, pietie, riches, forwardnesse at home, courage and like forwardnesse abroad. It is a fruitfull speculation to consider how God carrieth his part in the workes of men, alwaies iustly, sometimes terribly, but neuer otherwise, then to bring all worldly greatnesse and glory into due contempt, and loathing, that the foole may be erected to her Creator, and aspire to a Crowne celestiall. The first disadvantage which hapned to the English cause (after the late Kings decaise) was the death of Charles the French King, who suruiued the other but "fiftie and three dayes. This we may worthily call the first (as it was a great, as well as the first) disadvantage, for the imbecilities of that Prince were a strength to the English. On the other side (God obseruing a talio et paritudo) the infancy of young Henry was an aduantage to Charles the Dauphin of France, now by them of his faction called King of France, as the English vsed in derision to entitle him King of Berry, because little else was left vnto him.

(3) In England (whose condition the order of nature wils vs inke to describe, because there was the seate of counsell, by which all the actions of the generall state were directed) a Parliament was assembled to establish the Crowne vpon the Infant, and to provide for the publike vses and necessities of State. Money* (always one of them) was liberally granted. It was a strange sight (and the first time that euer it was seene in England) which in the next yeere hapned, an Infant sitting in the mothers lap, before it could tell what English meant, to exercise the place of Soueraigne direction in open Parliament. Yet so it was, for the Queene to illumine that publike congregation of States with her Infantes presence, remembred from Windsor to London; through which Citie (her selfe totally seated with her young sonne vpon her lappe) passed in maiesticke manner to Westminster, and there tooke teate among all his Lords, whom (by the ordinary mouth of that high Court) hee saluted and spake to them at large concerning the premices; where, as hee vttered the mind of his place by anothers tongue, so hee elsewhere prosecuted all affaires by other mens hands and Organs.

(4) The Duke of Bedford (as the nature of his place exacted) to settle and presecure the State of France for his young Nephew the King, together with Philip Duke of Burgaigne, who as yet continued a frendfast friend to the English Soueraignety (knowing the Dauphin busie to recover France) strenghtned the confines of their gouernment with Garrisons, assembled their powers, and laboured to retaine the hearts of their owne party. The Duke of Bedford Regent of France, had "words to them to this effect in open assemble. That they should not violate their plight and sworne allegiance, neither by them-

selues endeavour nor endure, that byethers their Soueraign Lord young Henry should be defended of his inheritance, or that the hatreds and commites which now beganne to rise betweene the French and English names, should through the practices of most faithlesse men be renewed, and reinflamed: That they would remember how (by Gods speciall fauour and goodnesse) the two Kingdoms of France and England were vnted under one most faire and goodly Monarchie in an eternall league, and lately so established that no humane force could resist. That albeit they had sustained damage by the warre, yet the same would be recovered with aduantage, if they honoured and obeyed their lawfull Soueraigne Lord King Henry, and persecuted his enemies with extremity, according to bounden duty. This Oration found plausible admission in them: Henry is proclaimed King of England and of France, and such chieftes as were present did their homages, taking each to be true: The like Obligation and Sacrament of allegiance was put vpon all the French through the English Dominions in France.

(5) Charles (who as sonne and heire to the late King entituled himselfe King of France, by the name of Charles the seventh) being then about the seauen and twentieth yeere of his age, full of courage and new hopes, gathered what force he could: his chieftes Leales were made in Dauphynis and Italy, from whence (for money) he drew sundry troupes. But the best sinews of his Army moued in certain thousandes of the Scotish Nation, which serued vnder him. The first steppe which the Charlesians, or forces of Charles made into hostile action was vnfortunate, for coming to raise the siege which the English held about "Crepan they were put to flight, with the losse of about two thousand of their numbers. This was noble in Charles, and his Charlesians, that their minds sunke not at the bottom of such an euill Omen. It was faithfull Amplum of them, resolved to encounter aduerser fortune with courage of courage. The Regent on the other side was vigilant vpon all occasions: the power of his Regency extended it selfe without contradiction* through Vienne, Pontieu and Picardie from Paris to Rheims, Châlons and Troyes, up to the water of Leys and the Saue: A goodly scope of territory, and absolutely the best of France. That late losse & foile of the Charlesians was repaired shortly after by an overthrow in skirmish which they gave to the English party, from whom (with the slaughter of about nineteene hundred) they recovered a great booty, specially of Cattel which the English had gotten in the Countreies of Normandie and Main, but thus intercepted vpon their return into Normandie, Charles (which Paulus Amplum omitteth) doubteth that successe for "stealen vpon sein by him taken where all the English are put to the sword: but the possession was short, and the reuenge speedy: Thomas Montacute Earle of Salisbury (a man (saith Polidore) more like the old Romans then people of that age, so great was his vertue and cheualrie) hauing with him John of Luxembourg, Generall of the Burgundian horsemen, recouers the place, killing all the French which were found therein.

(6) At the Citie of "Amiens in Picardie the three great Dukes of Bedford (Regent of France) Burgaigne and Britaine meet to consult of the whole course & summe of affaires. There they renewed the League, adding, that each should be others friend, and that all of them should defend King Henry right with their best forces. For the better assurance of this profitable amity, the Regent (then a Bachelor) tooke to wife the Lady Anne, sister to Philip Duke of Burgaigne: while the Regent was absent from Paris vpon these iust occasions, the Parisians (who not long before had "sent Ambassadors into England, to acknowledge their obedience to King Henry) practised with Charles to deliuer their City. The Regent had notice of this dangerous treason, and with his presence retained them in duety. The chieftes Actors paid their liues for satisfaction of the trespass. In good time there arrived out of England ten thousand fresh Soldiers. Over them hee ordeined Capteines, the famous Earle of Salisbury, William Pale Earle of Suffolke, Robert Walsingham and others. Himselfe lead about with him for the generall service, eightene hundred horsemen, and eight thousand foote. With these field-forces the maiene of the English estate in France was hold together, though not without difficulty, and diuers adventures. In them he tooke from Charlesfandry strong Townes, and Fortresses as a Cretey, Bayle, Rial, Rale, Gromel, Bayle, Mermond, Milson, Frenel, Seintre, and many others.

(7) The Regents chiefe designe was to draw Charles to fight, hoping by his overthrow to conclude many daies workes in one. For this cause he drew into Normandy. Charles was then in Tourain, where he multeth his people. The Regent proposes in the meane time, and takes by siege a place of good importance, pretending to do dare the French out to a Battell. John Duke of Alençon is sent with an Army and instructions to fight if occasion served, but Charles himselfe was not suffered to hazard his person. Not farr from the Towne of Fernel, which the English had taken before the Duke of Alençon, and his Charles could succor it, the two Armies embattell themselves. The fight began with shot, which seeme not quick enough to dispatch the work, the battels came to hand-to-shocks, where for some houres, there was maintained a constant and dondbull battell with great furie on both sides. The English enured to the French warres, having borne the first heats of their enemies, (which are in that Nation most ragellful) by perseverance vicerly brake and put them to flight. The Regent himselfe with a battle-axe fought most fiercely, winning immortal honor in that bloody journey.

There were slaine of the enemies side: John Earle of Boughman Constable of France; Archebald Douglas Duke of Tourain and Lieutenant of France; Archebald his fume Earle of Argen, with many other of the Scots. Of the French there were slaine the Earle of Paradour, and sundry others. In all there died vpon that side certaine thousands. None writes of fewer then foure or five thousand, nor any of a booe siterage. The great number of the slaine, is not the measure of a victory, but the vice and effects which it draws. The Duke of Alençon himselfe was taken prisoner, with about two hundred others of speciall worth. The English paid for this noble victory, the bodies of about two thousand of their soldiers which lost life there, for it was fought vpon faire termes in the open fields, and carried by mere manhood. That which followeth till the siege of Orleans, Paul Amycus comprehendeth in some few lines. The fierce Conqueror begetteth Maids in Maids, and with Ordinance heestes downe part of the walls. It yields beceupon. The English Garrison left therein, after the taking not being sufficient to continue the Towne in due subiection, is compelled to flee to a Tower for their safety, the common which were admitted into it by the Burgers enjoying the rest. The Lord Talbot (the most noble Captaine of the English) presently arrives to the rescue, and puts the misfortuners to death. The English Emperre extends it selfe to the River of Lays. Charles they call in forme the King of Berry. Thus roundly he.

In nine Articles and capitulations drawne and concluded at the yielding of Amiens, this was one, as perhaps it was in every like occasion. That if any persons were found within the City, which had bene consenting to the murder of John Duke of Burgundy, father to Philip Duke of Burgundy, in full revenge whereof, he had heretofore adhered to the English that they should simply be at the Regents mercy.

(8) The chiefe things which passed in England, during these happy proceedings in France, were briefly these.

James Stewart and the young King of Scots, having beene casually taken vpon the Sea, in the reigne of King Henry the fourth, and after his fathers death not sufficiently tendered nor respected by the Scots, remained still a Prisoner. The rather therefore to hinder the Scots, (that was the hope) from aiding the French, it was now thought fit by the Council of England to enlarge him. Which was accordingly done vpon pledges. Not long after the which, he married the Lady Jane daughter to John Earle of Summerset, neere cousin to King Henry. Principall letters forward of this marriage (as by likelihood of his liberty also) to honour their family with a Kingly alliance, were the Earle of Summerset and the Bishop of Winchester, both of them Beauforts, who together with sundry other of the English Nobility, condanted the new married Couple to the Scottish Borders. Much of his ransome was abused, and his new kinsmen bestowed vpon him a store of plate, gold, and siluer. Among other gorgeous Ornaments fuit of hangings, in which the labors of Hercules were most curiously wrought. But this wife King (having had the benefit of excellent and Princely education in England) did not suffer any obligations contracted in the time of his durance, to preponderate with him the Generall state of Scotland, whole freedom did much depend vpon the fortune of France, whereby the maiene drift of his enlargers was not much advanced. The reason notwithstanding which lead this aduice was probable, and so much the more commendable, for that it was tempered with humanity. The fortune mischiefe thus howsoever intended, hereby to be auoided or qualified, Sir John Mortimer (a dangerous firebrand at home) being Prisoner in the Tower was arraigned for many unreasonable speeches vied to a yeoman, (struants to Sir Robert Scot), keeper of the Tower of London) to draw the said yeoman to let him escape: promising him great matters. The points of his speeches were as that follow charged vpon him in open Parliament.

1. That the said Mortimer meant to flee into Wales to the Earle of March, and with an armie of forty thousand men to enter England, and strike off the Princes head, and the Bishop of Winchester.

2. That the Earle of March ought by right to be King of England, and if the Earle would not, that then hee himselfe was next here.

3. That if he could not safely reach to the Marches, he would save to the Dauphin of France, and there serve with honor, which he was assured of.

For these ouertures of escape, and conspiracie the Knight was drawne hanged and headed: Of whose death no small scandal arose. Perhaps he that writes so doth meane that the whole was but a stratagem to rid him out of the party. Edmund Lord Mortimer Earle of March, the party whom the said knight mentioned, was feut not long after with many other Lords, and competent numbers of men, into Ireland, where he decreased without illbe, whose great patrimony defecated to Richard Plantagenet Earle of Cambridge, the fatall disturber of the Realme of England, vpon the pretence of Mortimers title to the Crowne.

(9) The amity with the Duke of Burgundy, which the English had hitherto found so suitable toward their Conquests, having otherwise received some few slight flaws was now in danger of vter breaking vpon this occasion. Henry Duke of Gloucester Protector of the Realme, following counsell unworthy of his person and place, contracted himselfe with the Lady Inequine of Bouris, sister of Holland, Zealand, Henault, and many other faire dominions in the Netherlands, notwithstanding that John Duke of Brabant, her former husband was then liuing, and that the suit of divorce commenced by Inequine depended still betwene them. The Duke of Burgundy held with Brabant. This bred bitter humor in the Duke of Gloucester, who being not vied to meet with any rubs or confrontments, and now when in person he came with an armie to take division of Henault in right of his supposed wife, finding himselfe hard let vmo, by the aids which Burgundy ministered to the Duke of Brabant, he challengeth Combat of the Duke of Burgundy, calling him traitour. It was accepted and the lie strongly thrust vpon Gloucester, who (leaving the light Lady at her Towne of Mantz in Henault) returned into England, doing nothing of that for which at that time he came. Mediation took vp the quarrell afterward betweene the Duke of Burgundy and him. Not long after the returne of the Duke of Gloucester into England, the first marriage which had beene made and consummated betweene the Duke of Brabant, and the said Lady Isabelle, was pronounced lawfull by Pope Martin the fifth. Hereupon the Duke of Gloucester (having lostened many looses afield of friends as treasure in punishment of that great sinne, in taking anothers wife) forthwith marries Eleanor, daughter to Richmond Lord Cobham of Sturmerburgh, whereby he made her amends for that vniuersall familiarity which had formerly passed betweene them.

Meanwhile the Court of England doth well see that the King was an infant, for it was full of dangerous emulations and sittings, the Duke of Gloucester (whose high office it was to tender the welfare of the King and State) laying sundry grievous accusations against the Cardinal Beaufort (sonne of John Duke of Lancaster) Bishop of Winchester and Lord Chancellor as being a person very dangerous vnto both.

(10) The news of these hume-contentions coming to the Duke of Bedford into France, easily drew him home, though the loss of that Realme could not well want his presence. For John Duke of Britaine, (notwithstanding his later enmity of league with the Regent as Amurath) jealous of the English greatness turned iociously to Charles, and with him, Arthur, Earle of Richmond his brother. This puts fresh spirit into the drooping Prince. Arthur is by Charles made Countable of his France, in place of the Scottish Earle, who was slain at the bloody Battell of Peruill. The Duke of Britaine ouerlives this revolt but a small time. Arthur to declare his forwardnes on the behalfe of Charles assembleth about twenty thousand men, and with them iociously be- siegeth St. Jean Towne of Normandy, vpon the frontier of Britaine, which Edmond Duke of Sommerfet, Governour of Normandy, had lately fortified and stafft with soldiers. The unexpected arrival of the French, did greatly at the first perplex the English, but vpon better aduise, they valiantly sallied out vpon them, both before and behinde, which stroke to great terror into the enemy, that with losse of their Artillery, and many of their people they forsooke the siege. To redeeme this dishonour, he turnes his fury vpon the Countrey of Angou, which in many parts he depopulates and spoiles. The Regent being resolu'd to returne into England, leaves behind him Beauchamp Earle of Warwick as lieutenant, who was lately arrived in France, having six thousand fresh soldiers in his company.

(11) The presence of the Duke of Bedford Regent of France, was to the State of England very necessary. For the widome and authority of so great a Prince, being eldest vnde to the King, and one whom many great deedes made famous, allayed the distemper which he found at his arrival. It was a worke worthy of his labour, and he also found it to be a worke indeed, and not easily effectuall. The differences were debated first at Saint Albans, then at Northampton, lastly in a Parliamente at Leicester, which continued there till toward the end of Iune. The Duke of Bedford himselfe, to moid the note of partiality, for that his brother of Gloucester was a party did not intermeddle otherwise then as in General words to perswade amity, but the whole cause was referred to arbiters of greatest Nobility and prudence: by whose endeavours all those differences and green-ces were equally thrust into one sacke, to be sealed vp for euer by oblivion, and without mention of amends on either side, the Duke and Bishop (the one having sworn by his Princehood, the other by his Priesthood, truly to obscure the sword,) shooke hands, and were fully for that time reconciled. After which holy and necessary worke of priuate atonements, ensued acts of publique and honor. For in the same Towne of Leicester the young King, not then five yeeres of age, was at the high feait of Pease-cy dubbed Knight by the Regent of France. Immediately whereupon the King honored Richard Earle of Cambridge, (who by the fatal error of the Countess was at this Parliamente created Duke of Tork, the same who was father to Edward the fourth) with the order of knighthood, and about forty more with him. This Richard Duke of Tork was hee, who brought vpon this Kingdom and nation most dolefull divisions to the vter extirpation of all the males of either house, that is to say, his owne, and that of Gloucester, whereof the young King was head. From Leicester the King was conueighed to Killingworth, and Thomas Duke of Excester dying, Beauchamp Earle of Warwick, was constituted Guardian and Tutor to the King.

(12) The Regent having thus worthily provided for the quiet estate of the King and Countrey returns to his charge in France. There went over at the same time a choise and great number of fresh men, vnder the conduct of that immortally renowned, the L. Talbot, whose victories (such Polidore) were so many, that his name was not only most dreadfull to the French, but most famous through the world, even at this present. That yet may know the man not to have beene studious of fine Phrases, vpon the one side of his sword-blade was engraven, Sunt Talboti, and vpon the other thus boisterous blunt sentence, Pro vincere iuvimus mori.

The Duke of Alencon (taken at the Castell of Peruill) was set at liberty vpon payment of two hundred thousand Scutes of gold. At Montargis about Orleans the English received an overthrow with the losse of about fiftene hundred of their numbers, and in Britaine the French sustained great damages by a Captaine of the Duke of Sommerfet. These were petty matters. They of Mantz in Maine had drawn in the French by night, who massacred the English. William Earle of Suffolk Captaine of the place sends to John Lord Talbot for succour. It came, and that so unexpectedly, that the French were alike distressed. All but soldiers were spared and many alib of them, though thrust into prisons. The Traitors which had caused so much mischief, had their deserts by death. From hence the Lord Talbot marched to other enterprises. The quality of our task calls vs to the maine.

(13) Thomas Lord Montacute Earle of Salisbury, being with the Regent at Paris, and considering what forces of men, and all provisions the English then enioied, brought himselfe of some action, which might answer the greatness of his owne name, and of the publike meanes. The siege of Orleans is by him propounded to the Councill. The credit of the Motioner was alone an argument of power to conuince the possibility. His desires were therefore furnished with all competent provisions. They of Orleans hearing what a forme was coming (for the name of this Earle was worthily terrible) with great diligence ordaine for their defence. The suburbs (unfavourable in bignesse to a good City) they leavd with the earth, that the enemy might not from thence annoy them. Men, victuals, munition and countesse intencious to fight for their liberty, and safetie abounded. The Earle of Sarum, the Lord Talbot, and a dreadfull poissance vnder most expert commandes present themselves before it. Orleans was and is an Episcopall See, a Parliament Towne, and Vniuersity, richly furnished vpon the river of Layr, whose bell glory it is, being the chiefe City which that renowned streame watereth. No enemies appearing abroad, he "approacheth close to the walles. Assaults "proning vain, he entrencheth about it, and to secure his Campe, casts vp ramparts and other works, one of which (by reason of the hugeness thereof) was called Landon, by the name of the chiefe City of England. The Fort which stood at the Bridge Foot beyond the Layr, hee leishth vpon and closeth them vp on euery side. Charles of France could minister no sufficient succor: God, when man helps failes interposeth his hand, which as all men daily feele, so is it most conspicuous in the deliuerance of Nations. The City is driuen to some miserie through the beginning want of all things; for the siege had now endured about 60. daies: "not without much bloudshed on both sides. The Earle of Salisbury impatient of such delay, purpoeth to giue a general assault. The better to consider vpon the coorte, hee stands in take view at a window harred with iron, which overlookt the City toward the East. Behold how God began to vncut the knot of those handes with which the English held France bound, a hailer of a great piece (which lay ready leueld at that window) discharged by the Gunners "for once a lad, strooke the grates, whose splinters so wounded the Earle, and one Sir Thomas Gurnace, that they both dyed of the incurable hurts within few dayes. Heare ow the common iudgement of Writers concerning this Earle losse: "Prisently after the death of this man the fortune of the war changed. "Now both mortal and immortal powers began to looke fauorably vpon the State of France: This to the "English was luctum malorum: for after this mischance they rather left then waime, so that by little and little they lost all their possession in France: and allets that I omitt that they got after got for one that they was, they lost three. So that Paladyr not without cause (after many other great praies) doth eliewhere call him the man in whom the safety of the English state consisted. The vertue therefore of a fortunate General is inestimable.

(14) Howbeit the siege did not determine with his life, William Earle of Suffolk, the Lord Talbot & the rest maintained the same all the winter. The wants of the Campe were relieved from Paris by a conuoy, vnder the guard of Sir Iohn Fastolf and fiftene hundred footsouldiers who arrived late in despite of all the attempts to distresse the, which the French made. The City would yeeld it selfe, but not to the English. The Duke of Burgundie they were content should haue the honour. A subtle stratagem, rather then an offer of yeilding, for there was likelihood in it to herke thereby the amity between the English and him. The Regent and his Counsell being sent vnto, thought it not reasonable (Acemius erroneously makes the late Earle of Salisbury the Author of this refusal) neither indeed was it, theirs haing bene the cost and labour. The Duke of Burgundie concludeth this repulse lowely, which married his talke of the English friendshippe coar after: yet the Regents answer was iust and honest. That the warre was made in King Henries name, and therefore Orleans ought to be King Henries. Among these difficulties lauged the French affaires. Charles of France vnderstanding the miserable straites of his deare City, & ignorant how to remedy to meete a mischance; there presented himselfe vnto him at Chinon a yong maid about eighteen yeres old, called Joan of Lorraine, "daughter to James of Arke dwelling in Damerny neere Foucault. "She shepheardesse vnder her father, whose flockes she tended, kide him not faint, and constantly affirms, that God had sent her to deliuer the Realme of France from the English yoke, and restore him to the fullnesse of his fortunes. Shee was not forthwith credited, but when the wise of both sorts, as well Clerkes as Souldiers had fitted her with manifold questions, the continued in her first speech so stedfastly, vntering nothing but that which was

"modest, chaste and holy, that honour and faith was giuen vnto her sayings. An old woman directed her. Joan armed her selfe like a man, and requires to haue that sword which hang in "S. Kathens church of Sierroin in Touraine. This demand increased their admiration of her, for such a sword was found among the old Donaries or Voieue tokens of that Church. Thus warlike arrayed the riders to Blais, where forces and felth vnto alay for the riefce of Orleans. Shee with the Admirall and Marshall of France enters late. This did greatly encourage the fainting French. Joan the maide of God, it they called her, (though "some haue written that it was a practise or impollute) is thus thus to de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, who succeeded Salisbury in the maine charge of that siege.

"(15) King of England do reason to the King of heauen for his blind repall; yeeld up to the Virgine the "keyes of all the good Cities which you haue forced. She "is come from heauen to reclaim the blind repall, and is "ready to make a peace, if you bee ready to doe reason: "yeeld therefore, and pay what you haue taken. King of "England: I am the chiefe of this war, wherefoer "I encounter your men in France, I will chafe them till "they or no. If they will obey, I will take them to mercy. The Virgine comes from heauen to driue you "out of France. If you will not obey, shee will cause "great a flure as the lake hath not bene the first time, and "yet in France. And heere certeinly that the King "of heauen will send to her and her good men of Arms, "more force then you can haue. Get in Gods name into "your Country: bee not obstinate, for you shall not "hold France of the King of Heauen, the sonne of S. "Marie, but Charles shall enjoy it, the King and "lawfull heire to whom God hath giuen it. Hee shall "enter Paris with a goodly craine: you William de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, Iohn Lord Talbot, Thomas L. "Scars Lieutenants to the Duke of Bedford, and you "Duke of Bedford turning your selfe Regent of the "Realme of France, spare innocent blood, and lease Orleans in liberty. If you doe not reason to them whom "you haue wronged, the French will doe the goodliest "exploit that ever was done in Chrestendom. Under "stand these newes of God, and of the Virgine. Yet Charles had at this time no whole Countries vnder his obedience, "but Langre and Dauphin against which both the Sauoyard and Burgundian prepared, but miscarried, the Prince of Orange the third confederate being discomfited.

(16) This letter was entertained by the English with laughter. Joan reported no better then a Bedlam or Enchanteresse. Though to some it may seem more honorable to our Nation, that they were not to be expelled by a humane power, but by a diuine, extraordinarily reucaling it selfe. De Serres describes this Paragon in their words. Shee had a modest countenance, sweete, ciuill, and replete, her discourse was temperate reasonable and retired, her actions cold, shewing great chastity without vanity, affectation, bolding, or coarsly lightnesse. Let vs not dissemble what wee finde written. By her encouragements and conduct the English had Orleans pluckt out of their hopes, after they had insisted the Duke of Alencon to enter with new force, and with much losse were driuen to raise the siege. Joan herselfe was wounded at one fallie in which shee led, being shot through the arme with an arrow. Iudge what the effectment of that hurt, when shee vied thre admirable and terrible words. This is a fauour, let vs goe on they cannot escape the hand of God. In all adventures she was one and formost. The English lost at this siege, the Earle of Salisbury, the Lord Adam, the Lord Pyrmyn, and many other. But doe nottrarily beleue Serres in saying, that of all forts were slaine in such Sallies, as the martiall Virgine made eight thousand. Our Writers say hee "sixe hundred. The Lord Talbot marched away with about nine thousand, whom Joan would not suffer the French to pursue. In memory of this admirable deliuerance, they of that City erected a monumonument, where Charles the fourth king of France and Joan the Marshall made were represented, kneeling in Armour, elevating their eyes and hands to heaven, in signe of thanks and acknowledgement.

(47) There was an interchangeable taking and recovering of Townes and places of importance vpon both sides. The Lord Talbot tooke Landul, and the Earle of Suffolke puts himself into Iergeme. Thither the Duke of Gloucestre with Isam and other great Captaynes come, which they force by assault. Sir Alexander Poole the Earles brother was slaine, with many others in the fight, the Earle himselfe remained prisoner. The Duke added some other places to this Conquest: Soone after his numbers are augmented by the repaire to him of Arthur Constable of France, the Earle of Yamouste, the Lord Dalbot and others, so that now their whole Army contained about twenty and three thousand men. With these they encounter the Lord Talbot (who had scarce the fifth part of their numbers) at a village called Patey, whom they charged so suddenly, that his Archers had no time to fortifie their battels (after their manner) with a Palizado, or empalement of stakes, so that the chiefe fight must be made vpon horsebacke. After three houres bloody resistance, the English were put to the worst: The Lord Scaler, the Lord Hungerford, Sir Thomas Ramphill, and euen the Lord Talbot himselfe (being first wounded in the backe) were taken. The footmen enforced to traile to their sword vnder the shelter of such horsemen as remained, retreated in order, and came to a place of safety. The English lost about a thousand, and the French about 600. This blow shooke the whole fabrick of the English greatness in France, at the very foundations, awaking multitudes (euen of those who before had vowed fealty to the English, and now had colour of diuine warrant for violating that vow) to ioyne with the victors for the recovery of common liberty. There followed the present result of sundry townes, neither was it long before Charles himselfe issues out in Armes, recouers the City of Auerra and Reims; where according to the Maides direction, hee was solemnly crowned King. Hitherto hee might be thought propheticall and fortunate. It should seeme now that the chiefe part of her employment was accomplished, yet the flourishing a while longer. The Duke of Bedford to buttresse the shrinking state of English affaires in France, and to encounter euill fortune in the face, vpon the vnsuspitious newes of Orleane rescued, and Talbot taking, musters his whole present forces which made about ten thousand English, besides certaine wings of Normans: with these hee marcheth out of Paris, and opposeth himselfe to the Current of Charles his new hopes who meant to attempt that City, some of whose Citizens held strict and secret correspondence with him. But vpon this affrontment hee suspended the execution of that design, hauing as then no hope to achieve it. The Regent returns to Paris, iohne the Palace disswaded Charles from fight.

(18) Places of special note as Campaigne and Beauvais yielded themselves voluntarily to Charles. The Regent having fettered the Edifice and Garrison of the Chieftie City, passed into Normandy, to provide for a safe retreat there, if perhaps the English (by the inevitable will of God) should be empowered to quail their other holds and dominions which bee began to suspect, for that he had intelligence of a secret purpose, which the French purposed to winne the Burgundians from King Heunrich six. While the Regent was absent upon this occasion, Charles goes the Towne of Saint Denis, (a neighbour to Paris) though hee held it not long by praefite. From thence hee sends the Duke of Alençon and Tenac to trie their friends and fortunes at Paris. They found not hoped successe, for the English gave them so rough an encounter, that Joan her life was 'wounded; and the rest with much laughter drinen to fall off. The Regent hearing of these attempts, engra-

(b)eth the Const-Townes of Normandy, to the care of Richard Duke of York, and Rena, the Capitall City of that Duchty; John Edmund Duke of Somerset; humble speedes to Paris, where he commends the soldiers and Citizens for that they had not imitated the diloyaltye of their Neighbours. New supplies came out of England. The next enterprise was to reduce Cambray to obedience. John of Luxembourg with Burgundians and some English beliegeth it. Here the glory of Joan unfortunately ended; for consuming to the refuse she entered indeed, but afterward falling forth her troupees were beaten, and her selfe (being betrayed, say her lanourers) taken prisoner by the said Burgundian Knight, who for the value of her ransom (ten thousand pounds Towers, and three hundred Crownes yearly rent) delivered her vnto the English. The siege was notwithstanding rayed; they sent her to Rena, where she, about nine or ten monthes after, was burnt to death. Clare was raised by Perfession, and it is not to be doubted, but that the magnanimity of the English would have spared her, had they not found it necessary to deface the opinion which the French conceit with faperitious had conceived of her. Our * Writers shew how the course of her life being legally examined by the Bishopp of Beauvais (in whole I doubtless she was taken) and thereupon for forerice, bloodshed, and vnnatural vs of manlike apperrell, and habiliments contrary to her sex, condemned to die, was notwithstanding vpon her folowme abusing of such her lewd practices, pardoned her life, till againe consisted of penurious relapsing, though acknowledging her selfe a Strumpet, and fawning to be with child, she desperately vnderwent that punishment which she sought to delay. The rumor of her end, and the ignominious cause thereof was somewhat incommodious to the affaires of Charles. It was thought that the coming of King Henry to Paris would be much more.

(19) Hee had already with great solemnity received the Crowne of England at Westminster, being about nine yeeres olde, a most faithfull and waken age for all impression rather of good or bad. The next yeere after his Coronation in England, hee sailth over into France there also to receive the diademe thereof. The Captivelshepe of England, was before his departure, afflicted by Potent for terme of life to Richerd Duke of Turke (which gauch him a more feeling of greaves and secretly whetted his ambitious appetite, upon this occasion. One John Vpton, of Essex being in Kent Notarie, accosed then Dow of the lame place Gentleman, 7 had been and his complices did imagine the Kings death at his Coronation. The combat was granted, and in Smithfield (the Duke of Turke exercising the office of high Constable) they fought in lists. In the end the Kings name was vield to part and forgoine them. It is a vice to suspect too farre. The Duke of Turke (a most subtle man) findes never in heart to haue beene a true subject to King Henry: yet no man faith, hee was any author in this. Henrie (the common wealth haping yielded to libral grants of money) in now ready to enter Paris. England remained vnder the government of the Duke of Gloucester.

(30) There is no doubt that the English there at their Kings presence, felt forth their greatness to the full then. The young King attended upon with new English Cardinals, Turke, and Winchester, and great Princes of his blood, Dukes, Earles, Barons, Prelates, and the flower of our nation, with many a good French and Burgundian, as Normans and others, excellentlie well appointed, makes a triumphant entry into the head City of that most noble Monarchy. There was no figure in the People but of joy and welcome; the flowers were many and magnificient. Upon the seventh day of December, he was solemnly Crowned King of France, by the * Cardinal of Winchester, his great vicie, in the Chief Church of Paris, called of our Lady. monds of the Assembly with a few speech, wherein he declared, King Henry his stepsons undoubted title to that Crown, and commended the same to their fidelities, adding ample promises of honour and enrichment. Such of the French Nobility as were present, did their homage. The people had good and gracious words given unto them, and certain quantities of money, Corn, and wine, in the nature of a donation, liberally distributed among them. Proclamations were made, that all Frenchmen who came in by a day there named, should be protected. The Kings Patents and grants touching French matters, passed under the seal and stile of Henry King of the Frenchmen and of England, which Seal (for variety) we have prefixed, as we found it annexed, * to a writing directed by the King to his Court of Requests in his Palace at Paris; but for English affairs he used another Seal, being in every point like unto that * of King Henry the fourth, and (as some think) the very same stamp, (which therefore we have here omitted,) as likewise some * Charters of his there are, whereunto he affixed the seal of his father. Charles of France elected not himselfe the lesse a King for all this, but pursued his affaire. His people took the City of Chartres by a surpris, the Bishop whereof (because a Burgundian) they also put to the sword with others. Neither were the English idle. John Duke of Norfolk, Thomas Earl of Arundel, Richard Beauchamp Earl of Warwick, the Earle of Suffolk, and others, made up this loss with advantage. Their actions are placed by some as done before the Coronation which is likely. The King having thus taken possession of France, not long after took his farewell thereof. His returne was by Rouen, and so over land to Calais from whence upon the eleventh day of February, hee arrived safe at Dover. His uncle the Duke of Gloucester was able to give an honest and good account of the Government during the kings absence. The suppression of an insurrection beginning at Abingdon in Oxfordshire was not the least service. A weaver (the Ballie of the Towne) was the vicious head, to which that corruption gathered, who had changed his own name, and called himselfe; Lache Sharpe of Wigmore land in Wales. The special colour of his attempt was * to have massacred Priests; whose heads (he said) hee would make as cheap as Sheepes heads; that is, two or three, or ten for a penny. But the mention of Wigmore lands, the ancient inheritance of Marquis, (then the possession of the fatal Duke of York, who afterward in the right of that name, challenged the Crowne of England from King Henry) insinuates somewhat further. The varlet forfeited his head and foure quarters for his attempt. It is to be wondered that the Council of Estate vnder King Henry, hearing that title so often glanced at, provided not better against the mischief. But the eyes and hearts of the wile are blinded, when God hath a purpose to refuse a scourge, or to hide the fire which shall afterward be used to consume a nation. Vaquett humors were as well abroad as at home. The souldiers of Calais discontented with their wages as to little began to be mutually troublesome. The Regent comes thither in person in Easter week, where he exerciseth necessary discipline severely. Foote, the most faulty lost their heads, one hundred and ten are castrated, and banisht from the Towne, as five score others had formerly bene. Why did we upon so petty accidents? The losse of the Kingdome of France is imminent. Let vs diligently note the degrees which God found out to deprive our Nation of that honor. In this journey of the Regent, King Henries interest was not advanced. The Regent (a widower) roade from thence to Torwin, where (without the Burgundians priuie) he married the Lady Isabet, aged about * seuentene yeeres * daughter to Peter of Luxembourg Earle of S. Paul no friend to the Burgundians. This was nothing prosperous to the English affaires. For Anne, the Regents former wife, sister to the Duke of Burgundy, being, while shee liued, a strong reason and assurance of amitie, weakened the flame by her death; and this second marriage, not pleasing the Burgundians, did yet more diminish it. These were bad degrees.

In the meane space, the accidents of warre between the English and French, were manifold and perplexed, now wee, now they feeling, or gaining, an opportunity served: which vncertainties brought forth their ordinary progenies, fearful outrages, and * sacrifice of all things needfull for the vie of man. It would be wearisome, and not much necessary, to recount the particular lesser actions, neither indeed is it easie; for who can readily tell the sieges, surprisles, skirmishes and the like, being so confusedly set down by Authors, wherein diners of both Nations wanne to themselves much honour, and served the vies of those times, and their owne. The vicermost effect of those great labours, was, that the English Regency fell not forthwith into nothing. Permanent leaders in those publike services were the Regent himselfe, their maine Pillar and Chiefe life, Thomas Earl of Arundel, Richard Earl of Warwick, Henry his Sonne, the Lord Willoughby, like these noble John Lord Talbot, (who was now at liberty, the Lord Scalot, besides Knights, Esquires, and other valiant Captaines a multitude.

(11) The fortune of Renate Duke of Barre, is not to be omitted for that afterward, our King vnluckely married into his house. He had to wife Isabel the daughter, and heire of Charles Duke of Lorraine, by whom hee had issue two sonnes, and two daughters, the youngest of which was Lady Margaret, whom King Henry afterward took to wife. Charles Duke of Lorraine dying, Renate thinks to succeed in that estate. Antony Earl of Pallemout, brother to Charles presumes hee hath a better right. The matter comes to be determined by blowes. Charles King of France was a steadfast supporter of Renates claime, in lieu of like offices performed by Renate to him in the times of most difficulty. The Regent and Philip Duke of Burgundy, stood for the Earle. Their aides prevailed so much, that Renates forces were beaten with losse of about * three thousand, from the siege of Pallemout, and himselfe with not fewer then two hundred others remained prisoner to the Duke of Burgundy, one of whose subjects commanded in chiefe at that enterprize. This * Renate was afterward entituled to the Crowne of Naples and Sicilia, by the testament of Isabel Queene of them. The King of France might seeme to have sustained a grievous losse by the entralment of this Duke: but the English gained nothing thereby; for his persuasions, and private offices on the behalfe of King Charles, did not a little prepare the Burgundians heart (which now was knit to the English but with feeble Arteries) to accept in time the holy impression of reconciliation. The French who liued vnder the Regency, or in danger of the English, made chioice of the Burgundians to protect them, which could not be embarrased to them, for that hee was yet King Henries pretended friend. Indeed this Some and visible state of affaires was full of honour, which Polixare Vergil describeth well enough. While the English and French gooth be content for Dominion, Sovereignty and life is safe, men goods in France were violently taken by the licence of warre. Churches spoiled, men every where murdered, or wounded, or other: put to death, or tortured; Matrons ravished, Maids forcibly dravne from out their parents armes to be deflowered, Townes daily taken, daily spoiled, daily defaced, the riches of the inhabitants carried whither the Conquerors thirde good, houses and villages round about set on fire: no kind of cruelty is left unpractised upon the miserable French, emitting many hundred kinds of other calamities, which all at once opposeth forth. Alde bereto that the Commonwealth being destitute of the helpe of Leues, (which for the most part are made in times of rage and passion) flatch up and downe: what any anchorage exchange as right or justice. Neither was England herself void of these mischiefs, who every day heard the moans of her valiant childrens funerals (some in perpetual flames and burnings, her general wealth continually chafed, and as wood, so that the evils seemed almost equal), and the whole Western world echoed the groanes and sighes of either Nations quarrels, being the common argument of speech and complaint throughout Christendome.

(22) The court certainly which the English held, did only faintly keepe alive the Generall State of the Regency, without giving period to the warre, either by finishing the Conquest, or settling that which was conquered. Some would have had large supplies of men, and treasure lested, that King Charles might no where have any rest: Of this opinion were Bedford^h himselfe, the Dukes of York and Somerset. This Counsell was not followed, but another, in these more frugal, which fed the evils, but redressed none. Present sparing doe oftentimes draw after them infinite waits, and no husbandrie proves so ill, as unseasonable Parsimony. In the mean time, the Earle of Arundel and the Lord Talbot, carry about victorious Armes, and terrifie Angles, Scots, and other places with their successes. In Normandy, new the life the common people drew together in huge multitudes. There were three-score thousand of them rebelliously knotted together in Frazin, Norman, and twenty thousand in Caen. Their purpose was (through dislike of the English Government, or practise of the French) to have reacht one hand to King Charles, and to have thrust King Henries officers out. What is a multitude without a guide? To stoppe their infolency and course which they held toward Caen, the Earle of Arundel, and Robert Lord Willoughby, with about thirteen hundred light horse, and fixe thousand Archers, march against them, by direction of the Dukes of York and Somerset, who had the chiefe Lieutenancies in Normandy. They divide their forces to vie them with the more advantage. The Earle stays in Ambush with two parts, the Lord Willoughby draves them into it with the third. A thousand of the Rebels were cut down before the soldiers hands could be stayed to spare the rest, who baskt (as it became them) throw away their weapons, and fell to the earth, crying mercy. The multitudes were suffered to returne, their ringleaders lost their lives. All that the world could collect by this popular infection was, that the Normans would be gladly rid of the English. Nothing else was done. This Earle of Arundel having done sundry noble deeds during the war in France, received his deatnes wound shortly after in a skirmish at Gerberoy in Picardie, where La Hire (a famous Capitaine among the enemies) had the day.

(23) The Regency yet held, and the miseries of France (being burnt up by the fiery reflections of two Counter-Sunnes) were nothing diminished: Who should give to them a Period? while the Duke of Burgundy continued English, it could not be. To prepare therefore a separation betweene them, such of the Nobility as went over to the Burgundian Duke told him, "That King Charles upon all occasions (when speech was admitted) spake of him honourably, and inwardly wished him well, and that he never heard any mention of the warre committed upon the Duke his father, (cause of the losses he had to France) but he heartily sighed, protesting he was neither party nor prize thereunto. These and the like mollifying sayes applied to the tumors of his revengefull affections, did worke strongly, the rather for that his minde heretofore possessed with the English amity, was now vacant in that part, the same (by the means of sundry jealousies and avarities) lying open to contrary impressions. There wanted but an outward honourable meanes to fashion him entirely to the French party. Let us heare " Serres in this point: The Deputies of the Generall Council preffe both French, English and Burgundians to end all quarrels by some good composition. The City of Arras is allowed of them all to treat in. From the " Pope and Councils of Pisa, there came the Cardinals of S. Cressy and Cyprus, with twelve Bishoppes. For the King of France, there was the Duke of Bourbon, the Earle of Richmond Constable of France, the Arch-bishoppe of Rheims, Chancellour of France, and many others, great, noble, wife and learned men, For the King of England, the two Cardinals of York and Winchester, the Earles of Suffolk ("John Holland Earle of Huntingdon) the Bishoppe of Saint David, John Rastliffe Keeper of the great Seale, the Lord Hungerford, Rafe the wife Officiall of Canterbury, and some Doctors of Divinity. For Philip Duke of Burgundy, the Duke of Guelders, the Earle of Nassau, the Bishoppe of Cambray, Count Verambourg, the Bishoppe of Leige; five other great Earles, besides the Deputies of many his best Townes, sufficient to heve, that though hee was in tide but a Duke, yet that his greatness was equall to a King. When it came to communication, the English being also in possession, urged further for themselves the right of descent, and the acts of Charles the sixth, father to this Charles, by which all the Crowne of France was settled upon Henry the fifth, and the issue of the Lady Katherine his wife, and therefore they propounded no other condition of peace, but that Henry their King might have all, and " Charles to hold of him. The French offered Normandy and Guien. There ended the hope of agreement betweene them, for neither party would accept. King Charles therefore resolving to maine the English faction upon any termes (how base soever) sends Duke Philip a blank, bids him therein to prescribe his owne conditions and demands: he did so: and his Conditions were so unreasonable, and so many, such a great volume full, (such a French man) as it is strange, so great a Monarch should scope so much to be subtil and wastall, but that necessity hath no Law. They joine hereupon most firmly, and the Duke (a man wholly transported by profuse) declares himselfe a publike enemy to all the enemies of King Charles, and friend to all his friends. This was the first parting stroke which severed the French Dominions from the English Souerainty: the event declared, that the English had done more wisely, if they had accepted Normandy and Guien; but as the case stood, then they could not in honour doe it, and Councils are not to be measured by events; for so the most foolish may sometimes passe for prudent. King Henry not only lost now hereby a most needfull friend, but was compelled to relie upon his single strengthes, as well against King Charles his naturall enemy, as against the Duke of Burgundy, who plainly seemed to have betrayed the cause. To set aglosse upon this fact, the Duke " dispatcheth Ambassadors into England to King Henry (who as " Ambassadors erroneously faith was present at this treaty of Arras) to make known the reasons of his peace with King Charles, and to persuade the King to entertaine the same. This Ambassage was so odious to the English, that they forbore not to call the Duke a deserting man, a turn-server, a perswaded person, and a Traitor.

(24) The popular hatred also was such against the Dukes Subjects, resident in London, that they were beate and slaine many of them, before the furie thereof could be stayed by Proclamation. The Ambassadors returne with honest admonitions to their Master, against which, his cares and senses were strongly moved; for King Charles had fixt about them as it were a Barricado of royalties, priviledges, honours, money, Cities, Townes and whole Provinces, which he confirmed to the Duke, only to withdraw him from vs. The whole Counties of " Aue, Verre, Ponthieu, Balaie, Artois, the towne of Abbeville, and other lands, the Cities and Townes in Picardy, upon the watter of Somme, Amiens, Corbie, Peron, S. * four hundred thousand Crowns were satisfied: Briefly, what not! the Charity of King Charles was so fervent to make the Duke of Burgundy a true Frenchman once again: hee paid to deare for it, that wee may thinke him worthy to obtaine his desire: yet was it worth his cost; for Eustasius faith most truly, that the cause of that indignation did release the French from a servaine government, as the first assuming thereof had made the English Lords over France. But, howsoever the high and iust displeasure, which this Prince took for the wicked murder of his father, (abundantly satisfied for by this treake) moved him first to embrace the English amity, hee afterward most sublely concerned the revenge (by way of taking amends) to the enlargement of his proper riches, power and amplitude. After his Ambassadors returned, hee sends backe all contracts to the Duke of Bedford at Paris, and renounceth the alliance of England with a watchword, that every one should looke to himselfe.

(25) Each man hercapout (saith Serres) thrusts his sword and scoures his Armes, to recover that by force which they could not obtaine by reason: Serres might better have said, rescuing. All things certainly favoured the French designs; for this was the generall estate of the English affaires. King Henry scarce out of his Child-hood; and when he came to mans age, not Man enough to manage so turbulent occurrents; the Princes of the blood weakly united in love, for the common good; the Protector vigilant over England, the Regent carefull for France, but both privately enuied; Richard Duke of Yorke (whose strengths daily increased, which in time he meant nothing lesse then to vie for the benefit of King Henry, ambitiously rekrwing himselfe for a deare day, most of the great warriors (saith) and in briefe a great instability (for want of a Soule, willing and fit to looke so sterner and dismall adventures in the face) through the whole body of the English forces; which though otherwise they might have lingered out the warre, and kept their footing, yet the death of the great Duke of Bedford Regent of France doubled the difficulty, or rather the impossibility. In taking this triumphant Peere away, God made it manifest, that he held the English unworthy and unfit to continue their Empire among the French any longer. This Prince not long after this revolt of Duke Philip, died at Paris, viceraine to some, whether through griefe of the evils he foresaw, or other malady. But the Analogy and colour of his whole former life, doth contradict their conceit, who thinke that such a grief should determine his daies, because it could not but proceed from a kind of feare and despair, an humor absolutely opposite to Magnanimity, wherein hee abounded. How mighty a Prince he was this his style sheweth: Regent of France; Duke of Bedford, Alanson, and Amiens, Earle of Maine, Richmond, and Kendale; and Constable of England. But (which excelleth his greatness) he was one of the best Patriots and Generals, that ever blossomed out of the roiall Refuge of England. His valour was not more terrible to the enemy, then his memory honorable. For (doubtless) whether with more glorie to him, then to the speaker) Lewys the eleventh being afterwards counselled by certaine enuious persons to demolish and deface his stately Tombe, whetein with him, "such one was buried all the Englishmens good fortune in France" which was created over his body in the Northside of the high Altar, in our Ladies Church at Rouen, vnder these indeed most Princely words.

(26) What honor shall it be to us, or you, to breake this monument, and to pull out of the ground the bones of him dead, whom in his life-time, neither my father, nor your Forefathers: with all their puissance, were once able to make sit one foot higher and I who by his strength, pollicie, and wit kept them all out of the principall dominions of the Realme of France, and out of this noble Dutchy of Normandy? wherefore I say to you, God save his Soule; and let his body new be in rest: which when he was alive, would have delighted the proudest of us all: And as for the Tombe, I assure you, it is not for us to see, or comment at his honor and all's defence.

(27) The Regent being now dead, the late peace made at Arras between King Charles and Philip Duke of Burgundy, presently disclosed, and put forth effects most dangerous to the English; for many Townes voluntarily yeeld, and multitudes of the French (who hitherto through feare contained themselves) starting away, all the English dominions were full of private conuencions, practices, and correspondences with the Enemy. Such English as then were in France, are not altogether sloathfull, but yet, through a fatal either feare or negligence at home, there was not speedy sufficiencie of resistance ministered.

(28) Richard Duke of Yorke, (whose services neuer did good to the English common-wealth) is created Regent of France, and Edward Duke of Summer-set (his perpetual rival, or perhaps an intelligent censor of his manners) conuinc his commands in Normandie. The Duke of Summer-set opposed the advancement of Yorke to that slippery dignity. He was no babe in so doing, but more fore-seeing then the Protector, and all the Council of England. Yet his opposition was vnreasonable, and fruitlesse, for the others carriage had woonne such a party about the King, (whom he meant by embracing to pull down) that notwithstanding the disadvantage of his illendited title, which was alone a great cause to haue made him earliastly incapable of so great trust and meane, he prevailed. But before he could arrive, Paris was lost. Robert Lord Willoughby was Governour there for the English, who had with him about two thousand, the faith of the Citizens was presumed vpon to make vp therell at a pinch, for a common resistance. On the contrary, they proceeding vpon what termes the English affaires stood in France, chiefly after the late Regents death, conspire against them. The treason was carried so cunningly by some of the principall Magistrats of the Towne, who capitulated for a general pardon, from King Charles (which was gladly yielded vnto,) that the mischief sooner tooke effect, then it could be discovered. Thomas Lord Beaumont began the losse with his misfortune; for Arthur Earle of Richmond, Constable of France, hearing about Paris, in hope to recover the same, the Lord Beaumont with certaine hundred of English, fell into his danger about Saint Denis, and were distressed. While as yet the terror of this discomfiture (not greiv in regard of the numbers slaine, but in regard of the Circumstances) was fresh, the French aduance their Banners vp to the City, where a gate was opened vnto them by their persuals. What should the English doe in this generall mischief? The townemen, lately vassals, turne enemies on a sodaine: women and children aslaie the English from their windowes with all sorts of mislill things. Many are beaten downe and massacred in the streets. The Lord Willoughby Governour of Paris, Lewys of Luxembourg Bishop of Tierman, Chancellour of France for the English, the Bishops of Lisieux and Meaux, with other, flie to S. Antomes gate and the Bastile, places which they had retained for defence till extreme necessity. Many more had been flaine in those places, but that the perfidious Citizens drew chaines thwart the streets, and empedded their retreat. Heare the tell in a Frenchmans words.

(29) All runne to the Bastile. The Tournels are presently seized, and all approaches vnto the Bastile are sone won. Such as were within it, at first made some show of defence, but all things were prepared to force them: they demand a Parlee, and agree to depart with their lues and baggage. They are conducted about the Towne beneath the Loure, to embark vpon the River of Seine, and so passe to Rouen. They could not well have passed through the City. The people herof advertised runne to the waller, and cry out with great floutes, * halting the English like Dogs, whom a little before they had feared, and honoured as their Masters. Who of the English reads these things without indignation? but, they are the perperall manners of the base multitude, & the fortune therein of the English, the same which followeth all like accidents. Some will thinke that the Lord Willingby, and his people might have done more nobly, to have taken vp their granes in the place which they pretended to make good against the French. Fortitude is neuer separated from Prudence. Succour was depaired. The Duke of Tork was not as yett armed, and in maintaining their strengthes against the whole City of Paris, and all the present French forces for the space of about ten dayes, they sufficiently cleared themselves both to point of honour and loyalty. Paris was thus lost in the worst time for an Army to march in. They did wisely to choosethis vnfavourable season, their market might have else bene marred; for the new Regent (not so much hindered from sooner coming by the Duke of *Somerse*s emulations, which some ascribe, as by the very quality of the winter weather) arrived afterward, accompanied with the Earles of Salisbury and Wessex, the Lord Falsamburgh, and other worthy perions, with an Army of eight thousand men. But this Regent did neuer good in France: Hee who so writes, might have also safely added, nor elsewhere. The English affaires were not as yet come to the very breake-neck point. They held (in the late conquered parts of France) Normandy entire, though not without much trouble: for the people againe rebel in Caen: but that mischief was destroyed with the greater and more merueille confusion of the Authours and Actors, then the former. About fise thousand of them were trampled to death by the iust fury of the English, vnder the leading of the Lord Seales, the Lord Hewand and others. They burnt all their dwellings, made booty of their goods, drave their whole numbers out of the Country. The Lord Seales not long after discomfited La Hire, and his Companie not farr from Rouen. The war was handled on all sides without full or complete armies. Skirmishes were the ordinarie formes of fighting. The French were schooled from setting their rest vpon a pitcht field. Thus hovered the affaires.

(30) Philip Duke of Burguigne had as yet in person giuen no proof against the English of his affection to King Charles. Now hee addresseth himselfe to an enterprise worthy of that expectation, the recovery of Calais. You would suspect that hee consiued still a friend to the English, in making choice of a scribe, wherein hee was most likely to waste his time in vaine, and yet make shew of much forwardnesse; but hee was reall, though the rather stirred thereto by the desire of priuate reuenge. The English, vpon his forsaking their alliance, had attempted to kindele the Gamoine, and other of the Flamish towncs (Subiects to the Duke) to rise in rebellion: but the opinion that K. Henries fortunes in France were desperately shooming, made their wits too daunt to take fire. The notice now withstanding of this attempt came to the Duke, which sharpened him to reuenge, whereof (as the former passages abundantly declare) hee was not ordinarly thirsty. He brings his Armie before Calais. Chiefe commanders there for King Henry were the L. Dudley who had charge of the Castell, and Sir John Ratcliffe of the Towne. The Dukes purpose was to haue cloyed the harbour by sinking shippes laden with stones, and such like choaking materials; but vpon the ebbe-water the Calisians deliuered the haven from that perill. The King of England advertised that his precious Fort and Towne of Calais was thus emperiled, Humfrey Duke of Gloucester the Protector comes in person with a very great Fleet (some write fise hundred saile) to the rescue, and in it a great puissance, with full purpose to giue battell, glad perhaps that hee might now reuenge old grudges. It is able to moue choler, to consider how Writers torture vs with the disscurities of reports; but the generall agreement is, that the Duke of Burguigne did raise his siege before he was fought with. Some say the very rumor of the *Protector*s approach drave him away, and that the Protector came the next day after the Burguadians flight. Others excuse him (probably enough) in saying that the Blowing grew vawieldie to his commandments, and would needs home.

(31) The Protector was master of the Dukes Camp, and spent eleuendayes in his Domitions, burning Pepping and Beil, and greatly diminished him about * Granville and Ralegnis, then fettereth hee the state of Calis, and * retournes with great honour to his charge into England. But the English were thought to haue created store of worke for this basle Duke at home, where many great tumults rose, in * one of which, his owne person was endangered at Bruges, Lisle-Adam the Captaine of his guard being there presently slain. Hence it came perhaps that a meane * was found by contracts made with Isabel the Dutchesse his third wife (a small witty woman a Portuguese) to hold a league with England, and yet no breach with France.

(32) These haue hitherto bene the actions of Men, let vs not neglect two great Ladies, because much concerning our historie depend on their courses. Queen Katherine, the widow of King Henrie the fifth, and mother by him of this sixth Henrie, about this time departed out of the world. This most noble Lady, when her husband the King was dead, being not of iudgement (by reason of her tender yeeres to vnderstand what became her grates, or hauing found perhaps that grates was no part of happinesse,) secretly marieth one Owen ap Ibedore or Tedre the most voble and most goodlie gentleman of all the Welsh nation, and endued with admirable vertues, whodrew his descent from holie Cadwalader last King of the Britaines. This husband had by her sundry children, two of which, Edmund and Gaffer doe beare a part in the royall history, and King Henry the sixth (their halfe brother) created the first of them Earle of Richmond, the other of Pembroke. This Edmund is he, who by Margaret the daughter of Isabel Duke of *Somerse*s, (grandchild to John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster) had Henry the 7. the most famous and prudent King of England.

(33) In that yeare in which this excellent Queen died, the young Dutchesse Doragor of Bedford (widow to the late Regent of France) married also (below her degree) a vigorous English Knight, one * Sir Richard Woodville, of which match yet Serres needed not to haue spoken so contemptibly, calling him an English aduenturer, of small account: since thereby (saith he) giuing cause to laugh at her: which censure miseth perhaps of the French leuen and preiudice, because the Lady was sister to the Earle of S. Paul, who would not make one in the peace of Arras, but held with the English.

(34) But let vs see the sequel. Out of this Matrimony also sprung Queenes; for her husband (afterward made Earle of Rivers) had sundry children by her, whereof Elizabeth being one, had the honour to marry Edward the fourth King of England, and hereby was both herselfe a Queene and a Progenitresse of those glorious Kinges and Queenes which followed after from her and this match sprang another Elizabeth, the renowned wife of King Henry the seauenth, as King Henry himselfe did of the former: both those marriages proved most fortunate to England: but another marriage which then threatened preter danger to King Henry, was that which Lamie the first King of Scots made with France, who gaue his daughter the Lady Margaret to Lewis the Dauphin for wife, and sent new supplies of men against the English: hee meant also to haue attempted some personall hostility, but that hee was most wickedly murdered by certaine bloody Traitors in Perth.

| | Perth, suborned thereunto by Walter Earle of Arkel, (his owne kinsman) in hope to attaine the Crowne, crowned indeed he was, but not (as his Withces & Sotterers had ambiguously insinuated) with the Crowne of that Realm, but with a Crowne of red-hot yron, which was clapt vpon his head, being one of the tortures wherewith he ended at once his wicked dayes and desires. (35) Let vs now cast our eye to the doings of our new Regent the Duke of York, that we may be wisedome, how farre by his endeauours, the affaires of King Henry were aduanced in France. The silence at this time is euery where very great, yet had he opportunitye to haue achieved somewhat. Two* thousand French horsemens were murthered, and roused vnder great disorder. Paris was fearfully punished with famine, and the attendants of famine, pestilentiall maladiet. The Countries about lay open: the Courtiers were discontented and diuided: Nothing is yet done by our Regent, which* some impute to Edmond Duke of Somersets opposition, who out of enuy and dislike hindred his dispatch. Wee must in the meane time find out them that did some hurt. The Duke of Somerset himselfe accompanied with the Lords Talbot and Faenbridge, with other Gallants, and a competent force of the English, besiege Harflou, which the Normans in the late rebellion tooke from them, and still maintained against them vnder French Captaines: King Charles sends some of his principall Commanders with foure thousand men to rescue the Towne; who did their best, but not able to effect any thing, Harflou was rendered to the Duke. (36) In November Richard Earle of Warwick came as Regent into France, being furrogated in that office to the Duke of York, who returned into England. Hee carried with him a thousand fresh Souldiers, and arrived at Harflou, from whence he repaired to Rouen, the chiefe seat (Paris being now lost) of the English Dominions in North France, as Bordeaux was in the South; whereto now the Earle of Huntingdon, with certaine troupes and companies of Souldiers, was sent as Sheriff. This new Regent husied himselfe in the generall affaires of his place. Vnder him the Duke of Burguins forces were driven from Cretoy. Abbeville freed from the danger of a Rapide, with which the Duke had peat that Towne in, and the English for twentie dayes space together poole their pleasure in spoiling the Country of Picardy about Amiens and Arras. These and some other actions hauing bene worthily carried during this Regents government, himselfe dyeth. The Duke of York againe succeeedes him. Our interest in France was retained, not so much by King Henries ministers and Armies, as by remission of King Charles, whom also Lewis the Dauphin (afterward King) did greatly trouble by rebellious decisions, and absentments of himselfe. The feare of the English reconciled the sonneto the father the sooner. K. Charles was now fallen into dislike with his people, hnt to redeeme his credite, hee attempts the recovery of Pontefry (a towne neere to Paris) which the Lord Clifford had not long before surprisid by stratageme and money (an ordinary meanes as then for the expugnation of places) and comes in person to the enterprize. There attended vpon him for that seruice about ten or twelue thousand men. The L. Clifford is within, and makes a braue defence. (37) The Duke of York lately landed in Normandie, as Regent, assemblith his maine strengthes, being about iuen or eight thousand; offers the French King battell. Hee keeps himselfe within his trenches. The Duke (according to the ancient hamor, and discipline of the English, who loue to sit all vpon a poole) desirous to fight, vnexpectedly passeth the riuer of Ouse, which ranne betwixt the two Campes. King Charles dislodged so fearefully, that the French doe not oser boldly excuse him of* flying. The Duke hauing had the spoile of the French | Kings Campe, refortifies Pontefry, and assaults a Rapide, where Charles had left three thousand Souldiers to maintaine the face of a siege. It was held better to pursue the King, who was gotten to Pontefry. There the Duke of York againe very nobly proouokes him to a field. It would not be; King Charles saw the hazards were not equall, and therefore endures his brauado. What could the Duke doe more? hee is of necessity to returne to the maine of his charge in Normandie, and doeth so. King Charles ran into such obloquie and contempt with his people by this dishonourable retreat, but chiefly with the Parisians; that if hee had not attempted again and preuailed against Pontefry, it might haue icopared his whole estate; for there was a faction which would haue made vse of his disgrace. Hee returnes in great fury to the siege, and finally enters the town, not without much bloodshed. Sorres saith, that five hundred English left their dead bodies at the breach. The King was one of the first that entered, choosing rather to be thought temerarious then timorous. This exploit established his opinion among the people. A fauetic of warre filled both sides, and the estate of England vnder King Henry, whole softnesse and lenitie gaue way to sundry dangerous Court-factions, needed quiet Commissioners meet at Calis: nothing is concluded but the enlargement of Charles Duke of Orleans for the summe of three hundred thousand Crownes. Hee had bene Prisoner in England about twentie and five yeeres, euer since the Battell of Agincourt, where hee was taken. The Duke of Burguins was a speciall Actor in his enlargement, with a purpose to secure his owne greatness by benefices: this high borne Prince for the murder of his father, being naturally the head and chiefe of that deadly sewde, which had most mortally ragged between the houses of Burguins and Orleans. Humfrey Duke of Gloucester prudently foreseeing the dangers like to ensue on Orleans his enlargement, stoutly opposed himselfe thereunto, and that vpon important reasons which* hee required to haue requited, that they might remaine on Record for a testimony and discharge of his duty in that behaife. 1 First, for that the French King wanted discretion and iudgement to order his affaires, which defects might bee supplied by the Duke, (being a man of experience and very subtile) if hee should bee let at liberty. 2 That the said Duke might procure an vnion of the factions (now hotely maintained in France among the Nobility) to the preiudice of the Crowne of England, and hazard of the losse of the Kings territories in France. 3 That the Dutchie of Normandie (hauing sustained a great charge in maintaining the warre) seeing the Duke of Orleans deliuered, and no royall Army on the English part to withstand the common enemy, was likely enough to revolt. 4 That if the Duke should be deliuered, it might be probably concluded, that he would sooner break his oath, which he should (being prisoner) make to the King of England, then the oath of his allegiance to the French King his Soueraigne Lord, of whom he holdeth his lands and dignity. 5 If the Articles concluded between his Maiesty and the French on the Dukes behaife, should not be performed, what remedy might his Maiesty haue or expect? 6 That considering his colen of Huntingdon was to leaue the Dutchie of Gueneue, and for that the alliance betwixt the said Duke, and the Earles of Armauch and Faix, and the Lord de la Barre, was to bee suspected as dangerous, it was very necessary that good prouision should be made for defence of that Country, being his Maiesties ancient inheritance. 7 That his Maiesty hath no alliance with any Christian Prince, but onely the King of Portingall being but of tender yeeres and farr off: And therefore it was not safe for his Maiesty to deliuer him, that | King Charles pursued by the Duke of York. Prisoners taken by King Charles. Charles Duke of Orleans taken in captivity by the English. | was likely to proue his Capitall enemy, and to seeke meanes to deprive him of those lands which his noble father had left him.

8. That if any of his Maiesties kinned, or other Lords on that side the Sea, should happen to be taken prisoners, the said Duke of Orleans might ransom 4 or 500000.

9. That it were fit to take aduise of the Lords, and other his Maiesties subiects in the Realme of France, and dutchy of Normandy, whether they thought it expedient that the said Duke should be deliuered or not. Otherwise the world might crie shame thereon, when men should call to minde the losse of his brethren of Clarence, and Bedford, and other noble Personages, in defending and keeping those Lands.

10. If he (the said Duke of Gloucester) should consent to the said Dukes deliuerance (the same being also quite contrary to the last will of his Maiesties Father) such inconueniences, as would ensue thereupon, should be imputed to him.

(11) Notwithstanding the weight of so many thousand Crownes overpayed all these important and ponderous reasons; and the warre rages on still in the body of France, but not with so sharpe teeth, nor so full engorgement as before. Townes and people are taken on both sides. The Countie of Amiens was spoiled by the English Lords, Winghamby and Talbot; The Regent and the Duke of Somerset, march into Angou, where they charged their carrriages with much spoile and returned. Then the Duke of Somerset seizes himselfe, and doth sundry exploits in and about Britaine. Disip in Normandy being besieged, was rescued by the Dauphin of France to our losse. The contemplation of these mutuall violences touched all Christendome: for the Turke, common enemy thereof, encreased. Ambassadors are sent from all parts, to determine their bloody differences. William de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, was chiefe for the English. A truce was hereupon taken for eighteen months, between King Henry and King Charles, and an hope of perpetuall amity, weakly grounded vpon a match, which the Earle of Suffolke contracted for King Henry, with Margarete the daughter of Reuante, Citizely King of Sicile, Naples, and Ierusalem, Duke of Angou and Lorraine, Prince of the blood. To effect this, the Earle consented that the English should abandon the possession of Angou, and that to her father. A strange purchase of a wife, who though she brought youth, beauty and hope of a perpetuall peace with France, (the more profitable opportunity whereof, the English had more brauely then happily neglected) yet was free otherwise without portion. The Earle notwithstanding (whose drift herein could not be without manifest ambition, to make himselfe one of the greatest of England, by this gratification of the French, with his Maisties charge and dishonour) is not abashed to expect publike thanks for this high service, and an whole lifetime for the charge of her transportation. Sundry Lords of Councell and the King himselfe thought him worthy, and according to his deuise and ouerture, the whole affaire was carried. Suffolke made Margarete be sent over with many honorable persons, both men and women, to conduct the faire and goodly (but most vnsortunate and fatally) Bride into England. * Polydore giues vs a visting Character of this Lady. Shee was prouident enough, very desirous of glory, abounding in discourse, counsell, gracious behaviour, and manly courage; but not free from womens humour, which he vsually vehement and apt to change. In England ye may easily suppose, that there was most roially entertained; Humphrey Duke of Gloucester, among others, meeting her with a traine of * five hundred horsemen in a livery, that worthy Poet Iohn Lydgate Monke of Bury, deuising the speeches for such gratulatory triumphs as were made at her entrance into London. The King being married lawfully enioyes her embracements, from which he was often afterward violently separated by the miseries of a most cruell warre, wherein shee had her piteous portion. Suffolke in the meane time hauing the most assured fauour of the Queene pursued his ambitious purposes. Shee in the meane time was solemnly Crowned Queene of England at Westminster vpon the * thirtieth of May.

(12) Would to God it stood now with the quality of this argument, to turne our eyes from the view of those actions which ensued; for here the mournfull tragedies of our poore Countrey began. But we cannot but open those olde and most execrable forces, that, in their example, all true English blood may the rather be tender ouer their bowels, beholding such effects as the diuell and all the furies of hell were (by Gods seuerer permission) Actors in. Fabian giues vs the causes and contents of those effects, in these graue and few words.

(40) "It appeareth that God was not pleased with that marriage: For after this day, the fortune of the world began to fall from the King, so that helth his friends in England, and his reuenues in France: For shortly after, all was ruled by the Queene and her Councill, to the great disgrace of the King and his Realme, and to the great miserie (it is Fabians word) and obloquie of the Queene, who (as since hath bene well proued) had many wrongs, and false report made of her. All which miserie fell for BREAKING OF THE PROMISE, made by the King vnto the Earle of Armerikes daughter, as most writers agree: Which misery in this Story shall fourde deale appear by the leading of Normandy, (as all things else, except Calais, which the English held in France) the dronion of the Lords within this Realme, the rebellion of the commons against their Prince and Soueraigne, and finally the King deposed, and the Queene with the Prince sent to the land, and left the rule thereof for euer. Then he: but all this fiere sort of the evils that were the brood and offspring of the following times. The Parliament in the meane time grauesides of money, that vpon expiation of the truce there might be present abilities to maintain warre. The Duke of Yorke is reuoked, and the Duke of Somerset (in an euill hour) is sent in his place, with such provisions as were reputed competent.

(41) Humphrey the renowned Duke of Gloucester, Lord Protector, felt the first stroke of the euill Aungell, which was sent to punish England, and to reuenge ouer her Nobles. This Duke was much mist of the Queene, and her faction, as the onely man who by his prodence, as also by the honor and authoritie of his birth and place, seemed to empeach that foueraigne command, which they pretended to settle in the Kings owne person, but meant indeed (as the manner is vnder soft Princes) to reigne themselves in anothers name. Many great Lords were drawne on (at the time of a Parliament then * holden at Saint Edmunds Bury,) to concur for his ruine, not perceiving, that thereby they pluckt vp the floodgate, at which the Duke of Yorke entered, ouerwhelming all of them in a deluge of blood. Whether they had any true or iust feare of Gloucester himselfe, least perhaps he should take reuenge vpon some particular persons among them, is doubtfull, though it be probable enough, that they had. Heere come things that forewent this Parliament. About five or sixe years before, * the Dutchesse of Gloucester Elizabeth, was conuited for witchcraft and sorcerie, and afterward ended of treason in the Guild-Hall in London, before the Earles of Huntingdon, Stafford, Suffolke, and Northumberland, and certaine Lords, as Fastolfe, and Hungerford, with others, and Iudges of both benches) of which crimes shee was appealed by one Balingrave an Astronomer, and Thomas Swinburne a Channon, which Swinburne was charged to haue said Maiesties ouer certaine instruments, by which the Astronomer should practise Necromancy against the life of the King. These being taken, accused her as accessorie rie, theehaung desired the helpe of their Art, to know what would befall her. Some part hereof shee confessed, for which shee was put to publike and solemne penance in London vpon three seuerall daies, with wonderfull shame to her person, and after shee was committed to perpetual prison vnder the ward of Sir Thomas Stanley in the Castle of Chelster, but from thence removed to Kewenorth. Her pride, falsehood, avarice, and lechery were causes of her confusion, faith Stew; who hath set forth that businesse very diligently, though not seeming to attribute much credit to that accusation of treason. The Duke of Gloster her vnhappy Lord and husband (whom shee by love-curses and enchantments was said to haue enueigled, vsing therein one Margerie Girdaine a witch of Ey in Suffolke, who was burnt in Smithfield) living with this reproach, might reasonably be thought not vnwilling to doe somewhat. Howsoever that was, his destruction borrowed countenance from that opinion. The Duke therefore being come to attend in this Parliament at Berie, was arrested of high treason by John Lord Beaumont high Constable of England, the Dukes of Buckingham and Somerset with others. Certaine of the Kings household were appointed to guard him. Not long after he was found dead. His body was shewed to the Lords and Commons, as if he had dyed of a palsy or an apoplemie. Of thirty and two of his seruants which were attached, Sir Roger Chamberlaine Knight, Richard Middleton, Thomas Herbert, Arthur Twisse, Eligiers, and Richard Nedham Gentleman, were condemned of high treason, and had this vnexemplat punishment. They were drawne from the Tower to Tilbury, hanged, let down quick, stript naked, marked with a knife to be quartered, and then a Charter of pardon shewed for their liues by the Marquisse of Suffolke. But the yeoman of the Crowne had their liuelihood, the executioner their cloathes. Their pardons were thus obtained by the careful diligence of Doctor Gilbert Walsingham, a famous preacher, parson of S. Andrews in Wiltshire. Thomas wilde Elquere, the Dukes servant also, being condemned and pardoned among other, had for a preamble in his letters patents words importing, "that hee had bene one among many other traitours against the King, with Hamfrey Duke of Gloster, who went about, and practised to deliuer Eleonore, late wife to the Duke, from out of prison, for which purpose hee had gathered a great power, and number of men to come to the Parliament at Berie, there to haue contriued the Kings destruction.

(42) Such was the end of this great Prince, who, notwithstanding this open shewing of his body, and these pretended crimes, was by the people of England thought to be double murdered, by detraction, and deadly practise. He was not only a true lover of learned men, but himselfe also a learned, and (saith our Author) a father of his Country. His maine opinion concerning the government of King Henrie French dominions, was as mainly opposed by the Cardinal of Winchester and others, who altogether perswaded Pease, to which the noble Duke (standing precisely vpon the honorand Maistie of the English name,) was an absolute enemy. From this troubled fountaine of diuident Councell many following blacke aduentures did flow. The Duke thus brought to his end, Gonsoum (saith Polydore) fearful of their owne offences, did of their owne accord forsake the Court, into whose roomes many succeeded, who for the more part looking how to rise in dignity made open an easie way for new fallowes. The Cardinal of Winchester (the other halfe-arch of the Kingdome) ouerlived not the Duke above fifteene or sixteene daies. The whole frame of government was thus drawne to repose it selfe vpon the Queene, and such fauorites, as the King by her commendation the rather liked.

(43) The Marquisse of Suffolke, prime man in grace, was created Duke, which made him a more conspicuous marke of enmie, then that any shadow of the King or Queene could shelter or protect. After the Cardinals death, the affaires in France (where Somerset was new Regent) were neither disordered, nor the government of the Country well aduised. But the King and Realme of England lay, much more then France, open to the inevitable deepe, and pernicious conspiracies of Richard Duke of Torke. Hee (by the error of King Henrie, and the euill starres of our Country) being of himselfe a great Prince, and growne stronger by affected popularitie, perswading the King to be a Ruler, and not to Raigne, began secretly to allure his friends of the Nobilitie, and prouly desired to them his title to the Crowne, as likewise hee did to certain Governours of Cities and Townes, which attempt was so politically and closely carried, that his prouision was readie, before his purpose was opened. The very state of things insuited this fallall conspiracy: a milder King then England was worthy of, a Council out of fauour with the people, manifold losses and dishonours abroad, a turbulent and ialous condition of things at home. Of all which and much more, the Duke of Torke, having King Henrie the fourth (the enemy of his house) for a pernicious example, made his precious vie, cherishing the popular avarices, without seeking to redresse any euils, but representing them worse then they were, thereby to ripen that breach of loialty in the hearts of men, which his ambition wrought vpon. His displacement from the Regency of France, did not a little (perhaps) offend him at first, because the Duke of Somerset got it over his head; but it will not be long, before Somerset shall carrie of that truth, and the declining fortune of England, will giue him occasion to reioice at the foile of his dreaded enemy. Let vs not be long in the rehearsal of the publike shame and damage of our nation.

(44) During the truce betwene England and France, one Sir Francis Sarrasin an Aragoune (Knight of the Garter) serving vnder the Regent, vniu'sallie surprized Flanders, a towne of Brittaine vpon the confines of Normandie. Restitution is demanded. The Duke of Somerset (a proud man (saith Servet) who thinking to doe better then the rest, did absolutely raise the English affaires) contrary to good discipline, cherishing his souldiers in their riots and disorders, neglected the iustice of nations in that point. The French make this their example, and surprize Port del Arch, and towne after towne, so many and so fast, that King Charles (who, that he might haue God on his side, and wrong on his enemies, contained himselfe with great modesty, till he saw all quiet restitution desperate,) reconnered Reas, Caen and all Normandie within a short space after.

(45) Thus Somerset, and the English, are compelled to quit Normandie not only inglorious, but also in England it selfe vncomfitted. The next maine parcell of the English inheritance, beyond our Ocean, was Galesaigne. King Charles and his people detious (against plaine right) to make all that theirs, whatsoever was comprehended within the French language, inuaded that Dutchie also, and within verie few yeeres altered the fortune of warre, and disloyalty of the people every where fauouring them) extorted the same out of the English mens possession, after it had continued theirs about two hundredth yeeres, and nine yeeres, to the immortal dishonour and damage of our nation. The Duke of Torke in the meane time, who thirsted for the Crowne of England, hath occasion mislired to impute more feasters into his spiriting wings. Ireland is intamable. Thither the Duke passed, and now only appeareth the disorder of that Nation, but as yet such fauour is showne them, as could neuer be separated from him, as his longer. Thus diligently the Plouer makes his mines into the quiet and felicity of his Country, silling his caule the quarrell of right and iustice, as pretending that the Crowne of England appertained to his name and familie.

(46) But the odor of this vile successe in France, comming into England, filled mens hearts and senses with great perturbation. The Queene and Suffolke suffer obloquie for these effects in the generall iudgement. The common wealth is not silent. A Parliament is called to be holden at Westminster, which from thence was assigned to be kept at Leicester. The place likes not; few appeare. It is brought backe to Westminster. There the whole body of publicke councill meetes. Many Articles are exhibited by the lower house against the Duke of Suffolke, wherein hee is charged with treason, murder, misprision and treason: who therupon is committed prisoner to the Tower: from thence, within fower or five weeks hee is discharged, which more augmented the generall indignation then his commitment had ministred facilitation. The perillous Duke of York warms himselfe at these blazes, and vnderhand cherishest them as opportunity will permit, having his cunning factors and instruments fitt for such occasions secretly spread ouer the Realme, to inflame the paysons of discontentment, and desire of change into the giddy multitude. When wee reade in our vulgar Chronicles, that about this time Adam Malins Bishoppe of Chichester, Keeper of the Kings Priny Seale (theough the procurement of Richard Duke of York) was by Stephen Laine at Portsmouth, and yet no cause of so foule and wicked a murder expelled, it cannot but offend any curious Reader, who would recieve facilitation rather by the realis of factions then by the enemies. His guiltinesse in the fact was so apparant, that K. Henry in his answer made yeere or two after to the Dukes dissembling, and deceitfull letter, confidently mentianeth the same, where thus hee speaketh. Such is it that long time among the people hath bene vpon you many strange language, and an especiall anone after your disorder and vnlawfull slaying of the Bishoppe of Chichester, diuers, and many of the contrary saymen and other, said (in their manner) words against our state, making menace to our owne person by your sayings, that you should be fettered with many thousand, and you should take vpon you that which you neither ought, nor as we doubt not will attempt, &c. What cause led the Duke to commit this so impious a deed, may easily now be coniectured, being none other but the common hatred hee bare to all such wise or valiant persons, as might in any sort vphold the most iust and gracious Henry; and his sincerity in the Bishoppe could not be but a dangerous crime in the Dukes ambitious eyes, which his enuie was euen then too intolerable; for when the Kings iustice when such a fact might hope of impunity? The Duke did effect it by his bloody complices as hee did many other most feditious and perfidious things, while hee was absent in Ireland. Thomas Thane notwithstanding calling himselfe Blow-beard being a Factor of Conestrie, and attempting to gather the people, mischievous in his treason, and for that was hanged and quartered: this was a preambule to the following tumults. The Duke of York whole and onely hopes were reposed in the generall perturbations of this Country.

(47) The Duke of Suffolke (a principal pillar of K. Henries safety) being let at liberty, attends the King and Queene in their Parliament at Leicester. Behold the humor of the Commons which were fowed with the prillient leauen of Yorks conspiracy. They cannot endure the sight of this Prince, because his readuancement seems done to despite of them. Calumniation and odious families are exhibited against him: hee must dwayne to make way for K. Henries most vnworthy ruine. The most vile part of this Parliamentall accusation was, that they should charge that for a crime vpon Suffolke which themselves had vniuersally in another former Parliament assented vnto and ratified. Which was the delivery of Anno and Malin vpon the marriage, concluded (for the good of England, if others had not inuetered or interrupted the successe by their temerity) with Renette, father of Queene Margaret. Neither did the enuy onely of the secret Turkys ouerlade this noble Gentleman, but the impotency of the Duke of Somersetts faction, whose rashnesse and vanity hauing lost all Normandy, would gladly find any others to shoulder, vpon which to cast the impuration, either in part or whole. In that former Parliament assembled immediately vpon Suffolkes returne from that treaty with Renette out of France, this was the summe of the whole proceedings. Suffolke (as hee was very eloquent) must knowe to both houen his counsels and seruices, and the effect of his Embasie, praying they might be approued, and enrolled for his discharge. Whereupon the next morning, Burley Speaker of the lower house, and the body thereof repaired to the Kings presence, then sitting among the Lords, and there humbly required, that the request of the Marquisse (afterward created Duke of Suffolke) might be granted: and the Lords made the like petition, kneeling on their knees. The King concided to their desires, and so the whole matter was recorded for his acquiail.

(48) What can be more caident (or who can enough admire the vanity of popular mutabilitie? The Duke the (principal) marke, though the Bishop of Salisbury, the Lord Sey, and others were also accus'd) vnable to stand the pull of so generall an opposition, must be banished. The King vnwillingly giues this sentence against the Duke, or rather against his owne life and safety: five yeeres are limited to his exile. Being vpon the sea, hee is taken by his enemies, who at Dover had broke off his head vpon the side of a Cocke-boar. This diuillish murder (for it was none other, the Kings authority being vsed therein) committed vpon so great a Prince, was the lesse pittied, for that hee was not among the people to haue been a priuy actor in the Noble Duke of Glosters death, who perished (saith a learned Author) by the fraud and practise of a woman (belike) Queene Margaret. The Bishop of Salisbury before said more impiously, and irregularly lost his life in the following tumults, being murdered (after hee had finished diuine seruice) by his owne Tcnants, who dragged him from the Altar to an hills-top, and there (while hee was making his last prayers) cleft his sacred head: The Lord Sey Treasurer of England fell likewise into the peoples fury, and had his head cut off by the commandement of that execrable rebell Jacke Cade, at the Standard in Chepe, as yett shall hereafter learne.

(49) This William Duke of Suffolke was indeed a great and worthy person, for whom his Father and three Brethren had valiantly perished for their lines for their Country in the warre of France, hee serued in them foure and thirty yeeres, in queneene of the which hee neuer returned home, hee was once taken prisoner, being then but a knight, and paid for his ransom twenty thousand pounds sterling, hee was fifteen yeeres priuy Counsellor, and thirty yeeres Knight of the Garter. Notwithstanding all which, the same Author truly addeth: That as for these causes hee was in highest grace with the King, so hee was the more disgraced or hated of the people, and for certaine very bright matters, and these most very apparant, but was drawn into basishment, and (as you haue already heard) was intercepted vpon the sea in his passage to France, and by his aduersaries killed. What honest heart doth not melt at the relation of these violent contempt of all religion, honour, reason and iustice? yet are they but the drops which doe sorgeo those many bloody flowes, which the cloud of Yorks faction raide vpon our miserable Nation. They who murdered this great triumphant Gentleman, were certaine persons who waied vpon the Seas in a Barke called the Nicholas of the Tower, which belonged to John a Holland Duke of Exeter, Constable of the Tower of London, whom Gods reuenging hand shall not leaue vnpunished.

(50) The Turkys hauing thus rid Suffolke out of the way, thought it now a fitt season to spring their partise. Herupon the Commons of Kent, (who haue seldome refrained in such turbulent times) while the Duke of York was as yet in Ireland, take Armes. One Jacks Cade is their Capitaine: hee had bene the seruant of a Suffis Knight, Sir Thomas Dagge; kills a woman with Child; abhorred the land; turns French; swearing service to them, and now retuning, is the instrument to hang out Mortimer name, like a flagge to draw a party, faising himselfe to bee a Colin to the Duke of York. A peitlent deuil, to found the affections of the multitude, and to proclaim the Title to the Crown, which the Duke (as heire of that family) afterward challenged, for who would not aske, what should moue him to vfe the name of Mortimer? This Cade whom some (by contrarie) call John Armentall (that is, John Marre-all) hauing drawn great numbers to follow him, encampes at Blacke-Heath by Greenwich; and in his writings calls himselfe the Capitaine of Kent. His pretences (as of all like diuolish actions) were the common good and such other. The King at the report of these flatter is stirred. The Capitaine of Kent demands.

Cade demands.

1 That Richard Duke of Yorke be called out of Ireland, and (with certaine others named for States and colour) be principally vsed in Council.

2 That as the Duke of Gloucester was falsely proclaimed a Traitor, so the Authors of his death might bee punished.

4 (For the third Article contained no demand, but onely scandalous matters to aggravate hatred against the dead Duke of Suffolke, and his lining adherents:) That all the exortions (so the Rebels phrased them) daily vsed among the common people, might be laid downe: that is to say, the greuous taxes, which is falsly vsed to the perpetuall destruction of the Kings true Commons of Kent. Also the Kings Bench, the which is too grieuous to the Shire of Kent, without prouision of our Sovereigne Lord, and his true Councell. And also in taking wheat and other graines, horse, mutton, and all other victuals, the which is importable to the said Commons, without the briefe prouision of our said Sovereigne Lord, and his true Councell, they may no longer beare it. And also vnto the Statute of Labourers, and the great exortions, the which is to say, the false Traitors, Sleg, Cromwe, Rye, and Robert Eys.

(51) Thus traucously to the Kings welfare, and scandalously to his most gentle gouernment, writes this arrogant Capitaine of Rebels. The King vpon view of these braues, begins to feeble the indignity and danger. An Armie is raised, Cade retires to Seauenoke in Kent. The King supposing hee had fled, sends after him * Sir Hamfray Stafford Knight, and other Gentlemen with some forces. Wee read none of these things without a suspition, that the King was alwayes betrayed by such hypocrites about him, as would not haue him prosper. Marke the event. At Seauenoke Cade abides, probably not without encouragement from secret Traitors, and after long fight slew Sir Hamfray with many others. Hee armed himselfe in the dead Knights a-billments with guilt spurs. The King and Queene hearing of this mishap, leaue the Tower of London to the custodie of the Lord Scaler, and of that renowned Esquire Matthew Gough; and London is selfe to the Lord Maiors fidelity, themselves departing to Kentworth. The headlong crewes of London fauour the Rebel, and giue entrance, Robert Harne Alderman, like an honest wile man, would haue had them resisted. This free necessary speech endangered his life; honourable in his memory for the hazard only, what should hee haue bene if hee had glorious loffe? but money buyes out his perill with the Tyrant, who fined him at "five hundred Markes. The time was very slippery and loose; for the Essex men also were encamped vpon Middle-end by London: All men are afraid of their owne estates; inch secret well-wishings attended vpon the Arch-Rebels pretences. The King before hee had left London was enforced (by such hollow friends as were about him) to commit the Lord Say Treasurer of England to the Tower, after that the valiant and loyal Sir Hamfray Stafford was slaine, and the newes of his valucky deafe were confirmed.

(52) Cade therefore being admitted into London vpon the second of Iuly with his forces, (where for a short while to delude the people with a shew of confidence, they abstained from robberies) strikes with his sword vpon London-bridge, laying: New is Mortimer Lord of this City. At night hee returns into Southwark: One * Robert Penning of Southwark Esquire was his sword-bearer and Caruer. It is needlesse to be particular in this Rebels behaviour: The next day hee returns, and the Lord Say is beheaded in Cheapside (as is before said) at Cades commaundement, and his body cut into quarters. The King being by the losse of so truly and grane a seruant, not a little weakened.

(53) The next tragedie was Cromwe an Esquire, and high Sheriffe of Kent (the Lord Sares sonne in law) who is drawn out of the Fleet (and to appeale the Essex Rebels) sacrificed by behanding without any triall at Atile-End. The City sturres not for all this. Malpas and Gorsie, two rich Citizens, at whose houses Cade had feuerall dined, being spoiled and robbed by him (left perhaps it might appeare, that hee durst commit treasons, had not also the heart to commit felonies) reach what others are to expect. The Maior, Thomas Chelton and the wiser wealthy ones, overruled by faction rill then, see their danger now, and secretly send to the Lord Scaler for aide. Matthew Gough at night is come among them as sent by him. The Kentishmen, hearing their entrie was barred, ranne furiously to armes. Cade endeavours to open his way by force; but in despite of all his power, the Citizens made good & defended London-bridge against him, though with the losse of many valiant and honest men; for the conflict endured all night till nine in the morning. Among such as were laine on the Kings side, were John Switen Alderman, Matthew Gough himselfe, and Robert Heydon Citizen. This Gough (an Esquire of Wales) was a man of excellent wit, murthered, and sent to his Country, and of great renown in the warre of France, where hee had serued with special commendations faithfully, for the space of about twenty yeeres. His delects at this time destroyed a Statue in the City, for whose safety hee spent his last blood. To giue a quicker end to these miseries, impunity is proclaimed for all offenders, and sent to them in the Kings name by the Archbishoppe of Canterbury, Lord Chancellor, vnder the great Seale of England: the rebels are feared with this assurance of their safeties, and every man retires in peace from following so peitlent an Impostor. A thousand Markes (when Cade afterward attempted new troubles) are promised to him, who kils or takes this counterfeite Mortimer. Alexander Eden, a Gentleman of Kent, had the happinesse to discover and kill him at Hatfield in that County: his wretched carcase was brought to London, where his false head was set sentinell vpon London-bridge, and his quarters were aduanced for terror in severall parts of Kent. There died also by the stroke of iustice twenty and sixe more, whereof eight were executed at Canterbury, and the rest elsewhere in Kent and Suffis. The multitude it selfe * came naked in their shirts to the King on Blacke-Heath humbly praying mercy which they obtained.

(54) The Kentish rebellion thus pacified, farre greater and farre more dangerous troubles ensued, as if * Fortis in humane bodies, which relapsing into sickness, are shaken so much the more terribly. These troubles had their fountaine and mediate Originall, from Richard Duke of Yorke, no degenerate sonne of that Richard, whom King Henry the fifth had created Earle of Cambridge, and enriched with much wealth, honoring him about others in regard of his blood and parentage that "no haunts nor benefits could change a treacherous disposition for (as you have heard before) he conspired to murder his benefactor King Henry the fifth, as the Duke of York his true progenie labored to depose this King Henrie his aduancer. The honors of the popular body, were, in the last commotion, not obscurely discovered. The Common weale had perhaps some few eunomies through the abuse of Magistrates and men in place, but yet such, as the malice was infinitely lesse pernicious then the remedy. Vpon this intelligence the Duke comes suddenly out of Ireland, and to begin his vspured censorship and disfigure, apprehends "John Sutton Lord Dudley, Reynald Abbot of Saint Peters, at Glasbury, and auerth, whom he imprisoneth within his Castle of Ludlow. Intolerable beginnings of more intolerable sequele. Edmund Duke of Sommerfet was the man, who (after Suffolkes death) most supported the Kings side by his vigilance, earnestness, and good Counsels, endeavoring by all means to clear the Realme from factions, and to preferre the King and state in quiet.

(55) Turke seeing this, doth find that Suffolke perished in vaine, if Sommerfet held like grace against whose person he had a particular pretence of quarrell, for that the City of Caen in Normandy, which was the Duke of Turkes charge, was rendered vp to the French by him, when the English affaires grew desperate in those parts; Sir David Hall Knight, being at that time Captaene there for his Lord and Master the Duke of Turke, and not allowing it, although the renowned Talbot himselfe was present at the render, and becamean hostage for performance of the Capitulations. Turke hereupon consults with his special friends, Richard Earle of Salisbury, and Richard his son, (who was afterward that most infamous & great fighting Earle of Warwicke,) Thomas Courtney Earle of Desmoneth, Edmund Brooke Lord Cobham, and others, how Turke might get the Crowne of England, and for that cause begin to raise or fret out the Duke of Sommerfet, who standing, they were to looke for strong opposition. In the end, they conclude to take armes, but yetto sweate the mention of the Duke of Turkes title, giving out to the world for the reason of their doings, that they meant all honour and obedience to King Henry, and only to remove a raine bad men from about his person who afflicted the people, and made a prey of the Common-wealth: which, to gaine the more credit, and to hild the good King, the fabule Duke declares by Proclamation; where in thus he speaketh that Ambitious Hypocrite. God knoweth from whom no thing is hid, I am, have bene and ever will be his true loyal man; Owe. And to the very people it is so, I offer my selfe to sweare that on the blessed Sacrament, and reuerent, the which I hope shall be my salvation, at the day of doome, Owe. In that it was the caill hap of the Duke of Sommerfet, that Normandy was lost during his Regencie, his enemies had the more commoditie to incommode him with the people, who forbore not at his returne to offer to him sundry dishonours and injuries, till vpon paine of death they were restrained, for breach of which Proclamation, one had his head cut off in 1528 Cheap London.

(56) The King (notwithstanding all his Cosens arts and dissimulations) seeing the hookethrough the bait, and the snake through the grasse, by the aduise of his trusty friends, chiefly of Edmund Duke of Sommerfet, thinks not fit to relye vpon his enemies good nature, but having a strong power, and store of honorable men to conduct them, he marcheth toward Wales against the Duke. The King did herein wisely, but not so much as the cause required. Turke hauing notice of the Kings approach turnes aside, and with all speed marcheth toward London. That City, (the vaine hope of all Rebellions,) would not haue it; Thereupon he slides with his people into Kent, the nest of his hopes, and at Brent-wealth neere Dersford (a towne about twelue miles from London) encampeth, meaning to fight. The publishers declaration (from Duke in his dedication).

The King next the Duke of York.

King is not flow, but leauing his march toward Wales, pitcheth vp his totall pavilion vpon Black-Heath, with a purpose to reach his coien of Turke more duty. Behold the fortune of England. God puts an excellent opportunity into the Kings hands of tearing vp the danger of his house by the rootes, for the Duke was farre inferior in numbers. Such therefore as secretly fauoured him, fearing his overthrow, were willing to aduise a reconciliation. Messengers goe betweene the holts. The Duke, in his wonted manner, pretends loue and particular mineries, as that the Kings seruants, Sir John Talbot at Wall Castle, Sir Thomas Stanley in Cheshire, and others in other places, were set to harrowe vpon him. That by "two of the Norrices, Baskely, Graff, Beauland other Gentlemen" he was forbidden to land at Brynmor, or to haue any refreshment affirming that he (the Duke of Turke) was against the Kings intent and as a Traitor. The King stoppes so much as to answer the letter, letting him to knowe: That the suspicion vnderstandly conceited of his behaviour, moved these effects: neuertheless, in regard of the humble obedience which was now prest, he, for the easing of the Dukes heart, doth declare, repaite, and admit him as a true, and faithful subject, and as his well-beloued Cosen. The Duke then aduanceth his practice one step further, and writes to the King, that Iustice might be done vpon all persons of what degree fouer, which were guilty, or noised to be guilty of treason: aiming at the Duke of Sommerfet, whom he doubted not to ouerhelme with sleights and calumnies, as hee and his had done the Duke of Suffolke.

(57) The King is contented (such weak or treacherous counsels he relied vpon) that Sommerfet (for his facilitation) should be commanded Prisoner to his owne home, and Turke (having first dissolved his armie) should come in person, and put himselfe into the Kings hand. When he was come, he exhibits a great complaint against the pride and auarice of the Duke of Sommerfet, and cunningly accusing none but him, he ferkes the good-will of all others. A conning drift as any, considering that hereby he deriued vpon his enemy all the enuie of the people, and left him single to withstand the efforts. Sommerfet (a Prince of great spirit and wit) not thinking it reasonable, as well in regard of his owne honour as the Common-wealths interest, to endure such indignity, presents himselfe to the King against his accuser, and resoluing not to be tender-mouthed in the so apparent perill of the King and Realme, whose quiet was vndermined, answers Turke face to face, and, in plaine termes accuseth him of highest treason, as hauing conspired to depose the King, and take vpon himselfe the Soueraignty: vehemently vrging: That "the Duke of Turke might be committed and arraigned, to the intent that by his deferred death, and the disablement of his Iones, could warre might be extinguisht, praying finally that God would not suffer the enemies of the King to escape the hand of iustice.

(58) This had in likelihood bene done, but that the publike faith seemed to stand engaged for the Dukes indemitie, he hauing come in vpon the Kings word, and also for that the hearts of men were not well affixed to the King, which by executing Turke would perhaps haue bene more vnfixed, because not looking into the depth of the Kings perill it would haue bene thought that he had bene deliuered to gratifie Sommerfet, and not to secure the Realme. There was hope likewise to recouer Aquitaine, for that Bourdeaux had offered to returne: Lastly, the Dukes sonne and heire, Edward Earle of March (afterward King) was reported to be ready with a great force of Willoughs to succour his father. Vpon these and other reasons, the Duke is no longer restrained, as vpon Sommerfets most weighty accommodations he had bene, and to assure the gentle and indulgent King, of his allegiance, he maketh his submission, and solemnly TAKES HIS OATH to be true, faithful and obedient subject. This was done vpon upon the tenth of March in the Church of S. Paul in London, the King himselfe, and most of the chiefe nobility being present, as the Dukes of Buckingham, Norfolk, & Sommerfet, nine Earles, the Viscounts, Beaumont and Melb, many great Barons: Of the Clergy, the Cardinall of Yorke the Archbishop of Cantuari, the Bishops of Winchester Elze and London.

(59) Let vs view the forme and words of this Caution upon which King Henric (measuring other mens hearts by his owne) was aduised to repose his life and Kingdome, which are these.

"I Richard, Duke of Yorke, confesse and beknowen that I am and ought to be humble subiect, and liege man to you my Soueraigne Lord, King Henry the sixth, and owe therefore, to heare you faith and truth, as to my Soueraigne large Lord, and shall doe all daies to my liues ends and shall not at any time will or assent that any thing be attempted or done against your most noble person, as but to hereafter I shall haue knowledge of any such thing imagined or purposed, I shall with all speed and diligence possible to me make, that your highnesse shall bene knowledge thereof, and, over that, doe all that shall possible be to me to the withstanding, and let thereof to the uttermost of my life: I shall not any thing take upon me against your reall estate or obedience that is due thereto, nor suffer any other man to doe as ferre forth as shall be in my power to let it. And also shall come at your commandment, wheresoever I shall be called by the same, in humble and obedient wise, but if I be letted by any sickness or impotencie of my person, or by such other cause as shall be thought by you my Soueraigne Lord reasonable, I shall neuer hereafter take upon me to gather any rout or to make any assembly of your people without your commandment, or licence, or in my lawfull defence, in interpretation or declaration of the which my lawfull defence I shall report me at all times to your highnesse, and if the case require to my Peers: nor any thing attempt against any of your Subiects, of what estate, degree or condition that they be. But whensoever I find my selfe wronged and aggrieved, I shall first humbly for remedie to your highnesse and proceed after the course of your lawes, and none otherwise, leaving in mine owne lawfull defence in manner abovesaid, and otherwise hane to your highnesse as an humble and true subiect ought to hane him to his Soueraigne Lord. All these things abovesaid I promise you truly to observe and keep by the holy Euangelists contained in the booke that I lay my hand here vpon, and by the holy Crosse I heretouch, and by the blessed Sacrament of our Lords body, that I shall now with his merite receive. Andauer I agree me, and will that if at any time hereafter, as by the grace of our Lord God I neuer shall, any thing attempt by way of state, or otherwise against your reall Maiestie and obedience, that I owe thereto, or any thing take upon me otherwise then it is aboue expressed, I from that time forth be enabled, held, and taken as an vnrue and openly forsworne man, and vnable to all manner of worship, estate or degree, be it such as I was occupie, or any other that might in any wise growe to me hereafter. And thus I haue here promised and sworn, proceeding of mine owne desire and free volent and of no constraint nor gaine Coaction. In witness of all which things a have written, I Richard Duke of Yorke aboue write subscribe with mine owne hand and seale.

This Oath he also took at Westminster and Countre at sundrie times. Who now can consider the effects of this so publike and solemne Oath, and doeth not reembre in enerie part? Let vs haften to their view, least God perhaps may quietly seeme to haue bene mockt to his face by a vaine ambitious man.

(60) To direct these home-breeding rancors and practices, by employing the wits and bodies of men in other more honest things, the Earle of Cardal (sonne = to Capite de Andrie who had vpon necessity submitted his Seignouries to Charles the French King, but referred his person out of that obedience) and the Lord L'Escarpe come secretly from Bordeaux and pray an Armie, for that Bordeaux and the Gascaigns would returne to the English, if they might be supported. An Armie is decreed for their redemption. John Lord Talbot the first Earle of Shrewsburie of his name as Generall in that enterprise, lands in Gascoigne, where he doth sundry exploits, and the fame of his former cheualerie flying before with terror, makes many places the rather to yeeld. Bordeaux her selfe secretly opens a gate vnto him, which the French Garrison perceiving fled out at a Postern, but many being overtaken were slaine by the Lord L'Escarpe and the English. New supplies and victuals arrive, whereof the Earle of Shrewsburies younger sonne, (the Picquet Lale by his wife,) was a principall conductor. Bordeaux thus thoroughly muned and fortified, the Earle is aduertised that the French lay at siege before Castillon, a place of importance vpon the river of Dordogne. Thither the Earle marcheth, and with too great a confidence charging the enemy vpon vnquell termes, was there slaine, together with his sonne the Picquet Lale and others. Bordeaux received such as fled. The English fortunes and hopes which began to quicken, made this vnhappie catastrophe in Talbot, to the infinite losse of our nation and griefe of the Gascoignes, who generally miliked the French and inclined to the English, hauing so honourable, and for so long a time governed those dominions. This was the end of that great Earle, after he had for the space of twenrie and foure yeeres serued his Prince and Countrey in the French warres, with highest commendation; a most noble and most valiant man, by whose vertue the English name did chiefly become terrible in France. Bordeaux it selfe, and all other places after this, were by siege brought againe vnder the French King, who prosecuted those affaires in person. From that time forward the English neuer obtained there any hold or further footing, the felicity of this attempt breaking all combinations of the Gascoignes. This Duchie of Aquitaine contained four Archbishops, four and twenty Bishops, fifteen Earldomes, two hundred and two Barons, and about a thousand Captainships and Bacheliers. The losse of so goodly an inheritance which had continued English for almost three hundred yeeres, the world may easily coniecture how lustily it was grieved and lamented for. In this false estate of the English, the Queene vpon the thirteenth day of October was deliuered of her first sonne who was named Edward, proving the child of sorrow and infelicity.

(61) It were to be wished we might now rather number the following evils of England, then describe them; for what can we learne out of such vnnatural and savage destructions, but matter of horror and detestation? but sith they must be handled (the law and necessity of our taske exacting it,) the sooner to be quit of so vnapleasing obiects, it will be best abruptly to thrust into the narration. The Duke of Yorke (wickedlie carelesse of an Oath so religiouslie and publiquely taken,) to make his way to the Crowne more ealie, hath now procured his chiefe and most fearefull enemy the Duke of Sommerfet to be feloniously attainted of high treason, (doubtfull whether by any authority but his owne) in the Queenes great Chamber, and sent to the Tower of London, vpon pretence that he had capitall matter to charge him with. Yorkes principall friends (vpon confidence of whom he dared so high things) were Richard Nevill Earle of Salisbury second sonne of Ralfe Nevill Earle of Wiltshirland, whose daughter the Duke of Yorke had married. This Richard was Earle of Salisbury in right of Alice his wife, sole heire to Thomas Montacute, the famous Earle, slaine at the siege of Orleans. The Dukes other maine hope was Richard Nevill (sonne of the former Richard Nevill,) who in right of his wife, the Lady Anne (sole sister, and heire of the whole blood to Henry Beauchamp, Duke of Warwick) was by this King Henry the sixth created Earle of Warwick in a most vnhappie houre both for the King & kingdome, being in his owne Ove a man of an vndanted mind, but flitting faith.

(63) The King in the meane space, while the Duke of Summerset was thus endangered, lay sicke; and Turke (as Regent) swayed and overwayed in Court; but when the king (perceiving malice and practise to be the chief bates of Turkes accusations) had recovered his health, and reclaimed the government, Summerset is set at liberty and made Captaine of Calles; Turke and his adherents repaire to open force: They leay their arme about the Marches of Wales, with which they repaire toward London, the maine object of Pretences. The King hearing of his enemies approach, is accompanied with Humfrey Duke of Buckenham, Edmond Duke of Summerset, Humfrey Earle of Stafford, Henry Percie, Earle of Northumberland, James Butler Earle of Wiltshire, and Ormond, Beaufort Earle of Dorset, Jasper Thedre Earle of Pembroke the Kings halfe-brother, Thomas Courtney Earle of Devonshire, the Lords Clifford, Sudley, Berners, Roffe and others, with them enters into Saint Albans in warlike manner, having certaine thousands of common souldiers. Thither also the Duke of Turke and his adherents came. This was toward the end of May: The Dukes request to the King was, that he would deliver such persons to be severely punished as he would name. The King (to let them know who he was) returns this confident answer: That hee and the rest were Traitors, and that rather then they should have any Lord from him who was with him at that time, hee himselfe would for their sake in the quarrell upon that day live and die.

(64) The Turks herupon assaile the Kings people within the Towne, and Warwicke breaking in through a Garden, a sharpe battell is begun. The losse fell lamentably upon King Henrie side, for besides the Duke of Summerset and there were slain the Earles of Northumberland and Stafford, the L. Clifford, with sundry worthy Knights and Esquiers, of which forty and eight were buried in Saint Albans, there being slain above five thousand of K. Henries party, and of the Turks about six hundred. The King himselfe was shot into the neck with an arrow, & other of his chief friends were like wise fore wounded and taken. The Earle of Wiltshire, and Thomas Thorpe, Lord chief Baron of the Exchequer, with others lined themselves by flight. The Duke of Turke, the Earles of Salisbury and Warwicke with the King, (whome they in these did vie most reverently, and as if they had meant nothing unto him but good) such) upon the morrow ride to London, where in Iuly immediately following, a Parliament is holden in King Henries name. The fore-runner whereof was a Comet, or blazing Starre, which appeared in the moneth of June, the beams wherof extended themselves into the south. The first popular act of this assembly, was to restore the memory of Humfrey Duke of Gloucester to honour, declaring him to have bene a true subject to the King and Realm.

(65) The next provisions which the Turks made, were for themselves and their owne security, willing and commanding that the Duke of Turke and his partakers should incur no blame by reason of the journey at Saint Albans: the whole fault wherof was laid upon the dead Duke of Summerset, the Lord Chief Baron, and one William Aspley Esquier, who (say they) kept from the King a pacificatory letter which the Duke of Turke had sent. It is a wonder and a shame to reade how officiously these violent Lords (meaning nothing lesse) behaved themselves to the King, of whose majesty they will needs seeme to be the onely Champions and coadjutors. The Duke of Turke in the same Parliament creates himselfe Protector of England, the Earle of Salisbury is made Lord Chancellour, and the Earle of Warwicke (his former) Captaine of Calles: they spared as yet to touch King Henrie life, because the people did wonderfully honour, reverence him for his singular holiness, and for that he had great friends left alive, and a name. In the meane space, that they might without trouble, and at their pleasure, converse or kill him, they by little and little displaced the ancient Counsellors, and substituted their affected favourites. Another Act of that absolute force and fraud, which they exercised in this dreadful perturbation of all things, was the drawing of John Holland Duke of Excester out of Saint Marie at Wylmshurst, conveying him to Pomfret Castle in the North.

(66) Henry Beauford Duke of Summerset, (sonne of the former) the Duke of Buckingham, (whose sonne and heire the Earle of Stafford was slain at S. Albans) and other the Kings friends, perceiving whereunto this faire shew tended, consult with the Queene at Greenwich concerning her husbands danger, and how to prevent it. Herupon the Duke of Turke is displaced from the Protectorship, a ridiculous title to be assumed, where the king was aged about five and thirtie, and had no other fault or vices, but that he was too good to live among them. The Earle of Salisbury was also deprived of his Lord Chancellorship.

(67) The King having thus recovered his dignity and authority, but not sufficient meanes to suppress his dangers, the French take courage at our intestine divisions, and landing at Stanwich with fifteen thousand men (part of their forces) they kill the Muir, Bailiff, and other Officers of that Towne, with sundrie Gentlemen of the Countrey, spoile all they could lay hand upon, and among all they rob two great vessels laden with merchandise, which lay there bound for London and departed. Another part of them, burnes Kenwy and certaine other townes in Devonshire. On the other side the Scots hostilely entered into Northumberland, but upon notice that the Duke of Turke approached with a power, they returned, having not as yet done any great harme.

(68) These indignities and losses might have vinted the disloyall affections of true English hearts, which was greatly desired by such as loved their Countrey: For which purpose the King, Queene, and their chief friends, being at Conventry, the Duke of Turke, the Earles of Salisbury and Warwicke are sent for by the Kings letters vnder his pitiaie Seale, to give their attendance, whither they come, but they (either warned of some plot contrived against them, or fearing it, or faining to feare) suddenly leave the Court, without leave, the Duke departing to Wiltshire in the Welsh marches, the Earle of Salisbury to his Castle of Atledham in the North-Countrey, and the Earle of Warwicke to Calles, whose bodies though thus divided, their minds continued most firmly fastionated. But the King (a pattern of Christian goodness) being tender over the generall estate of his Countrey, and wonderfully desirous to reconcile differences among his subjects, that they might the better withstand their imminent foreign enemies, returns to London there to consult how to effect his holy wishes. The great Lords are perswaded to meete there; which they did, but yet not without loss of followers, for the Duke brought with him four hundred men, the Earle of Salisbury five hundred, the Earle of Warwicke six hundred. The Dukes of Excester and Summerset eight hundred, the Earle of Northumberland, the Lords Egremont and Clifford fifteen hundred. This was the fashion of that swording age.

(69) In March the king and Queene with a very roiall company alight at Wylmshurst, to accomplish, if it were possible this charitable and necessary worke of amonement and reconciliation. Godfrey Boleyn was at that time Lord Mayor of London, (being the ancestor of two renowned and vertuous Queenes of England, Anne second wife to King Henry the eighth, and Elizabeth their daughter, through whose great vigilance and providence, the City stood so well guarded, that the Kings peace was doubtles kept, notwithstanding the great Lords of both the factions (Turks and Lancastrians,) were with so great troups of followers lodged within, and about the same: for during the whole time of their abode he had five thousand Citizens in Harnesse, himselfe riding daily about the City and suburbs, to see the publike quiet preferred: and for the night watch there were assigned to three Aldermen two thousand consist-men.

(69) During this watch, a great Councell was holden by the King and Lords, where at length by the diligent traualle, good exhortation, and prudent aduise of the Archbishoppe of Canterbury, and of other learned and godly Prelates, the parties offended were induced to a communication and afterward to a final accord: the points whereof, considering they held for some a while, (for as 'one saith truly, the dissimiled time day hang but by a small thread) were frivolous to dwell in their rehearsal. The King himselfe (a singular testimonie of the opinion which all parties had of his integrity) was whole arbitrator of their differences. Certain satisfactions were awarded to be made by the Duke of York, with the Earles of Warwicke and Salisbury, for the death of Edmund Duke of Sommerfet, and others slaine at S. Albans. And the same Duke of Sommerfet, the Earle of Northumberland, and Lord Clifford (slaine in that battell by the Turkists) are declared for true liegemen to the King at the day of their death, aswell as the Duke of York, the Earles of Warwicke and Salisbury. So both parties stand in safe and rest in curia. Many other articles and awards were made, to solder and glue together their alienated hearts and affections. The reioicement caused by this seeming peace (which on the behalf of the kings persons was undoubtedly sincere and true) was wonderfully great among all good Englishmen, who flocked to the publike celebration thereof. Upon our Ladies day in Lent, a solempne procession was made within the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul in London, where the King (adorned with Crowne and robes of maiestie) went in person, before whom went hand in hand the Duke of Sommerfet, and the Earle of Salisbury, the Duke of Excester and the Earle of Warwicke, and so of either faction one and one, and behind the King himselfe, came the Queene and Duke of York with great familiarity in all mens sights. Otcelling, & honour, & sinceritie, that your diuine verine should not have contained these spirits in the harmonie of sweet obedience; but if you could not, what alas should? England must be more severely scourged, thenthat so goodly a blessing of publike reconciliation should continue, whereby the proud tops of her nation (offensive to God and men) being taken off, the way might be opened to other names or races, which as yet were nothing thought on.

(70) There is no reason to doubt, but that the Duke of York (a man of desperate retirement in himselfe) secretly continued his purpose for the Crowne, notwithstanding all these his vermouthed pretences, and did only therefore not as then put for it, because he presumed the time was incommodious. Again the Queene (true head and life of the contrary part) aswell in regard of her selfe, her husband, and young sonne, may in likelihood be thought to haue laid downe any thing, rather then the wakefulness and lealouise, which former perils and the enemies present strength might worthily keepe alive in her. The thinne alies therefore, which covered these glowing coles, were thus againe first varnished and set to blaze.

(71) The King and manie of the Lords, still being at Westminster, there hapned (or perhaps 'was plotted) a fray betwene one of the Kings seruants and a follower of the Earle of Warwicke, who hurt the Kings seruant. Hereupon his fellows of all sorts (as Cookes with their spits &c.) in great disorder assaile the Earle himselfe, as he was coming from the Councell, and had there slaine him, but that the euill fate of England and his owne, reserved him to doe and suffer greater mischiefs. The Earle hardly gets to his Barge, and repositing all things vnare about the King, gets ouer to his place at Callice. The Turkist directly charge the Queene with this, as with a plot drawne for the Earles destruction. Not long after this, the young Duke of Sommerfet is sent Captaine to Callice. Warwicke will reigne no roome, notwithstanding the Kings command, alleging he was made by Parliament: Sommerfet is reiectid with danger to his person. Warwicke partly maintains himselfe, and such as flacke to him in that charge, with spoiles which he got at Sea; How lawfull it appeares not; though Warwicke is said to haue been Admirall by Patent, though now reuoked. The Ordinarie bookes haue, that he, with foureteene shalke of men of warre, sit upon three Caricks of Gene or Genoa, and two of Spain, greater then the Caricks: three of which Antreacht-fleets (which how they should be lawfull prize, we see not) he vanquished after two daies fight, with the losse of about an hundred men of his owne, and a thousand of theirs: The bootie was worth at meane rates ten thousand pounds; such also as followed the Duke of Sommerfet coming into his hands, he beheaded at Callice. These were strange darings in the Earle of Warwicke, whom yet the vnsittfull, and drunken multitude so highly praise: but what are these in regard of them which will presentlie follow?

(72) The Duke of York in the meane time, and Warwicke with his father, the Earle of Salisbury (the Triumuir of England) consult of their affaires: Salisbury is resolu'd with sword in hand to exposituere the danger and injury offered to his sonne at Westminster. The Queene (a Lady of incomparable magnanimity and foresight) confident in this, that new King Henry, or the Duke of York must perish, and that one Kingdome was not wide enough for both these Familiars, belittres her selfe to maintaine the possession of a Crowne, and to aduance to the same her owne flesh and blood Prince Edward, by ruining his house, whose whole building consisted of Lancastrian beneficence. She consults, she sends, she speaks, she giues, and strengthneth her selfe with friends on all sides, chiefly in Cheshire, causing her sonne to distribute silver (wannes (his badge or deuise) to all the Gentlemen of that County, and to many other through England. Salisbury lets forward from his Castell at Middleham with foure or five thousand men. James Touchet, Lord Audeley encounters him vnadvisedly vpon Thre-beats neere Muchellstone. The fight was long and bloody, but in the end K. Henries euill fortune gaue the better of the day to the Earle of Salisbury, where, besides the valiant Lord Audeley himselfe, were slaine not fewer then two thousand and foure hundred, but the chiefe losse fel vpon the Cheshire men, who were the Princes Lincnes.

(73) The Earle of Salisbury in this sort opened to himselfe a way to Ludlow, where the head of their combination, Richard Duke of York, busied himself to gather forces: being met, they conclude, that seeing the matter was now become deadly, they would deale in cloudes no longer, but fight it out to the extremity. Men are drawne out of all parts with large hopes & promises of sharing in their fortunes, and the Earle of Warwicke bringing with him from Calice (which he left with his friends) that valiant Captaine Andrew Trulap, and a band of rout and choise Souldiers, comes to the generall Rendreous of the Turkists, the Castell of Ludlow. The King in the meane space, (and not before it was need and time) hath assembled a great puissance of faithfull Subiects, and being attended with the Dukes of Sommerfet and Excester, and other of his chiefe friends marcheth against his enemies. His first worke was, to offer them generall pardon. It is refused, and called by them a passie of reule, or gloffe Buckler. The sword must decide the quarrell; whereupon the king commands his Standards to aduance: while he was in his March, "a letter fraught with the wonted ate in it among many other infinations these also:

*Most Christian King, right high and Mighty Prince, and our most dread Sovereign Lord, Gve, wee first vnto your good grace by the Prior of the Cathedral Church (of Worcester) and divers other Doctors, and among others by M.
William Lowwood doctor of Divinity, which manifested vnto us severally the blessed sacrament of the body of Iesus, whereupon wee and every of us deplored of our said truth and duty.*

(74) Thus these prophane and ambitious men play with God, who in the end will severely bee avenged on them for their impiety: but the letter made no overture of any course, vpon which they would yeeld to lay downe Armes, alledging, they would make their way to the King for redress of iustice, so that they were enforced to stand together for their own defence, against such great Cowards and Sumourers, as (say they) intended their destruction; meaning indeed such persons whose vigilancy and manhood might protect and guard him from their prauid and violence.
The King is now in fight, whom the Triumvirs Turke, Warwick and Salisbury being long-ly encreased before London,* meant to assault. Andrew Trellap (who had in the Kings pay done great service vpon the French) was acquainted with all their counsell, and finding himselfe extremely de-ceined, (for hee thought and so by the Earle of Warwick was made to believe, that the preservation of the King was intended, and not destruction) abandoned the Turks Campe at midnight, & with a chouse number of trusty men presents himselfe and seruices to the King, who graciously receiued him and his.
The truth of the Trimmurs plot, and bottoome of their conspiracies was thus made clearly knowne: The Turks vpon notice of Trellap act, despairing of success, at that present fled. The Duke of Turke with the Earle of Rutland his younger son into Ireland, the Earle of March his eldest sonne and heire, Warwick and Salisbury, with much difficultie escape to Calais, which place (as* one saith probably) if it euer had in time taken from his enemies they had without question bene forthwith recoverably rained.

(75) The multitude which stood vnder Turke found mercy, but their Tenantes were many of them executed, maimed, or generally raniacted. The town of London is still was spoiled to the bare walls, and Duchesse of Turke deprived of all her goods. What lesse could bee the effects against the friends of such aduersaries, vpon so publike an act and aduantage?
The point is followed more sharply vpon the great Offenders in the next Parliament which was holden at Conuenter: there Richard Duke of Turke, Edward Earle of March, Richard Earle of Warwick, Edmond Earle of Rutland, Richard Earle of Salisbury, Alce Counsellor of Salisbury (in whose right her husband was Earle) two or three Lords, 9. Knights, and certaine other, were openlie of high Treason at-tainted, and their whole estates confiscated.

(76) Calais, a most important place, being in the meane space violently possesed by Warwick, the Duke of Summerfet, the Lords Rosse and Audley, are sent with forces to take it; their successe was euill, for the Duke was glad to flee, his Souldiers were robbed by Warwick men of their harnesse, the Lord Audley is taken into the Towne, and the Lord Rosse hardly escaped. Letters are hereupon written into forraigne part, entreting* that no redress bee manifested to the Trainers who kept Calais against the King, and all men are at home forbidden to transport any victual or refreshment thither. Euidēt it is, that the Council of England rather wished that the Town and Castell had bene French againe, then as it was: neither therein erred they, for it could not bee so mischievous to the maine of their cause, as now it was. The Duke of Summerfet being in Gaines, a neighbour Castle, doth daily by his Souldiers skirmish with the Califians: Warwick meditates other things. Hee must speake with the Duke of Turke, at whose commandement all Ireland (where hee abode) seemed to be readie; but is advertised that the King had certaine shippes, which lay at Sandwich to transport supplies and laccours to the Duke of Summerfet. Hee meanes not to leaue such a perill behind him vnremoued,* having therefore eiped his time, hee with his people to shippes on in the night to Sandwich, which they accordingly did, tooke the Lord Rosse, and his son Anthony woodlode prisoners, and brought away all the shippes, except one called Gracie de Dies: one Sir Balmaine Fulford Knight, haueing (after thus) assumed to doe seruice vpon the Earle of Warwick, and to take him, retournes empty. Warwick sailes now to Ireland. The King makes the Duke of Everest Admirall, and gives him commission to apprehend the Earle of Warwick. The Duke with a great nauir puts forth to Sea from Sandwich. Behold the ill carriage of things. At Dorchester many of his Souldiers, pretending want of money and victuals, forsake him. Meane while the Earle of Warwick passeth by the Duke, not daring to assault him, nor hee willing to assault the Duke, for that hee was Admirall and of the Kings blood. Such was the act and cunning of the Turks to prevent recurrence vnto that, which most of all they thirsted to: fied: Five hundred fresh souldiers attend at Sandwich to bee shipt ouer to the Duke of Summerfet for safe-conducting him into England. Warwick men sodainely come vpon them, slew Summerfet their Captaine, and many other, and disarmed the rest. Such was the distracted estate of our poore Country at this time, through the pride and restless ambition of one or two unhappy men. But though nothing was more plaine then that the Duke of Turke fought the crown of England; yet nothing is truer, then that they as yet pretended nothing lesse for the veneration of King Henrie parity of life, would haue prevailed with the people greatly to their peridice.

(77) The King failing thus to obtaine the person of Warwick, or his Towne of Calais, the Turks send ouer certaine Articles into Ross, in which (as if they were the onely Patriots and best Subjects of the world) they complaine of certaine generall corruptions concerning incomes due to the Church, and the ill ministration of iustice, abuse of purveyors and takers, the Kings powerty by the corruption of his officers, and the like plausible stuffe: where they speake of the King, they sequester him from all exception, as being of so noble, so vertuous, so righteous, and so blessed disposition: (these are their words and the truth) as any Prince earthly. Where they speake of their enemies, (that is, the Kings principall friends and faith-full subjects) they name the Earle of Salisbury, the Earle of Wiltshire and the Lord Beaumont which must euer bee an honour to their memories, and put the blame (if it were blame-worthy) of such arraidors which were enacted against the Turks at Conuenter, vpon these three Lords specially. Where they speake of themselves and their intentions, they profess alacrity and loyalty to King Henry, and that they onlie meant to come vpon their guard to speake with him concerning the common-wealth, and their owne safeties, and that now they would attempt the same again, in the name of the Land, and not to suffer such mischiefs to raigne vpon them. The conclusion of their cunning and painted pretences hath these fained holy words: Requering you (the people) on Gods behalfe, and praying you in your owne, therein to assist us, doing alway the duty of Liege-men in our persons to our said Sovereign Lord, to his estate, prerogatiue and preeminence, and to the fury of his most noble person, whereunto wee haue curr bene, and will bee as true as any of his Subjects alme: so hereof we call God, our Lady Saint Marie, and all the Saints in heauen, to witness, and record. But of the thing it selfe (that is to Crowne the Duke of Turke) they make not the least mention: what wanted in these men to the height and depth of humane malice? They pre-great and many headed beast. The Lord Fauntleroy is sent to loane their affections, and to draw the purulent matter to an head: he finds great forwardness. The Earles of March, Warwick and Salisburie advertised of all things, land in Kent. But the people only were not deluded; for Thomas Bourchier Archbishoppe of Canterbury, and other grave men, beleaved they meant looths which that they might rather doe, the Earle of Warwick made open oath upon the Croffe of Canterbury that they had ever borne true faith and allegiance to King Henry. A strange humor in the English, that could neither brooke bad nor benigne Princes. The King had before their coming quit the City of London, as nor greatly troubling the affections which the people thereof bare toward such as the Yorkish faction had made odious about him, and appointed the Rendezon of his forces at Northampton where he abode. The enemy (shewing friend) advanceth thither. It is a shame to reade that some of the great Prelates would simply be drawne to countenance such an enterprise: but their intentions were different; they hoped to reconcile enemies, the Earles, to make York King. Meane while their complaisance about to take the Tower of London, within which there were for King Henry these loyal Nobles. The Lord Scaloe, Hungerford, Wesley, Level, Delaware, and Candale a Galloigne with sundry others.

(78) At Northampton things were carried thus: The King meaning there to abide his adversaries, when it was not thought meete to admit the Earle of Warwick to his presence, (which thing was courageously sued for to raise a ground of justification for battell) they prepare on both parts. The Earles of March and Warwick (with like or greater counting, then they had desired admission to the Kings speech) let cry through the field, that no man should lay hand upon the King, nor common people, but upon the Lords, Knights and Esquiers.

(79) The hoatts joyne. No stroke they gave but seemes to wound vs also. Let vs swiftly turne our eyes from vnnatural slaughters. The * L. Grey of Arundel began the discomfite of the Kings side, for hee (let the world judge with what commendation,) having the point, did quit his place and fled to the Earles. The Kings Arme is defeated, and vnterle broken. Many were slaine and drownd. Falsham and Greyston lay ten thousand: The chiefe of the Nobles who there lost their lues, were the Duke of Buckingham, John Earle of Sherrborne (a most hopefull young Gentleman, and in all points like his heroicke Ancestors) John Viscount Scamond, Thomas Lord Egremont, and among sundry other prime men, * Sir William Leger, who making halt to the fight, was vpon his first approach chopt downe with an axe. The Kings Ordinance could not play, there fell so great a raine.

(80) This worst battell was fought vpon the * ninth of Iuly. The King (as a man borne to all calamities and miseries, though he not therefore the lesse, but the more happy through that excellent fortitude of mind, with which hee invincibly sustained them) comes into his enemies hands; but the Queen and the Prince, and the remains of their scattered fortunes flee into the North, there to reinforce their powers, and to * Salisbury (as hee caused them to be proclaimed) the Kings Rebels and enemies. The Tower of London after this misfortune renders itselfe. The Lord Scaloe is wickedly murdered vpon the Thames by Wheremen, belonging to the Earle of Warwick, as hee intended to passe to * Salisbury at Weymouth. The Earles when they were possessed of the King, continued their admirable hypocrities (which God will terribly plague them for) thereby to leade the people on, and had to him these words.

(81) Most noble Prince, displesse you not, though it be pleas'd God of his grace to grant us the victory of our mortall enemies, who by their vicious malice have vntuly stirred and moved your Highnesse to exile us out of the land, and would have put vs to small shame, and confusion: wee come not to vanquish or grieve your said Highnesse, but to playe your noble person, desiring tenderly the high welfare and prosperity thereof, and of all your Realme, and to be your true Liegemen while our lives shall endure. Our foules are amazed at these acts, and men blinde to publish to the world things so vnworthy.

(82) The * Florentine Secretary was scarce borne at this time, but the Direlli was as great a Master then as afterward. The King and Edies in the meane time goe to London, where a Parliament was summoned in his name to be holden in October following. The Duke of York (advertis'd of his vntolerable speedes from Dublin, the chiefe City of Ireland, to bee at that Parliament, where we shall at last see the true face of his purpose, his owne selfe taking away the maske which hitherto concealed it.

(83) Seotland, by reason of late affinity with the house of Beaufort, whose chiefe and roppe was the Duke of Somerset, (descended from John Duke of Lancaster by the Lady Katherine) was a speciall backe, and second to King Henry in all his tempestuous adventures; but now that refuge was also hazarded: for King James the second, partly in fauour of King Henry, and partly as making vse of the troubles in England, laich siege to Richborough (Belated the best callety the same Caltie * Marshall being in the custody of King Henries enemies, where while himselfe (whose * skill and delight in shooting of Ordinance was great) coming down the trenches to see the * Lisa (a new great piece which had lately bene cast in Flanders) and the other Artillery discharged, one of them brake, and with a shauer thereof flew the king, and dangerously wounded the Earle of Angus. This vnhappy accident happed vpon a Sunday, the * third day of August. The Queen of Seotland neuertheless maintaineth the siege, and aswell obtains that place, as the Caltie of Warke, both which shee (in revenge) threw to the earth. James the third, a child of seven years old succceeded to his father, aswell to the cherishment of the distressed English, as to the Crowne.

(84) The Parliament being begunne, about the * eight of October at Weymouth in King Henries name, thither comes with flying speed, Richard Duke of York, who brake open the Kings lodging Chamber, and placed himselfe therein, insinering the King to provide elsewhere. Then makes hee his claime to the Crown of England, and publisheth it in open Parliament together with his pedigree. The whole house (such among them excepted as were priuie to the Dukes intention) was * greatly dismayed both for that hee did set himselfe in the Kings seate, and for this his vnexpected challenge: But the Duke though at first hee greatly meane to have depozed King Henry, and with speed to bee crowned himselfe at Abbatshide next, yet finding such amalefaction and silence, hee sends them his pedigree and his claime in writing, that they might the better consider, yielding (as it seemes) to be ordered therein, according to their generall agreement during the treaty whereof hee would not visite King Henry, alledging himselfe was perchelesse in England. The maine points of his Title were as followeth. King Edward the third had issue, Edward Prince of Wales, William of Hatfield, Emell Duke of Clarence, John of Gaunt D. of Lancaster, Edmond D. of York, Thomas D. of Gloucester, and William of Wyndesore. Edward Prince of Wales dyed, leaving his father, and left issue Richard the second King of England, who died without issue: as did also William King Edward the second.

(85) Edward the third Iune had issue Philip his daughter and heire, married to Edmond Mortimer Earle of March, who had issue Roger Earle of March, who had issue Edmond Earle of March, Roger, Anne, and Eleonor, which Edmond, Roger, and Eleonor died without issue. Anne the heire of that house married Richard Earle

be the King.

Earle of Cambridge, the sonne of Edmund Duke of Yorke, fifth sonneto King Edward the third, which Earle of Cambridge had Richard commonly (saith the Booke) called Duke of Yorke.

(86) John of Gaunt the fourth son and younger brother to Lionel, had issue Henry, who immediately after King Richards resignation, unlawfully (saith the Booke) entered upon the same, for that Edmund Earle of March, sonne of Roger Earle of March, and of Philip daughter and heire of the before said Lionel Duke of Clarence, elder brother to John Duke of Lancaster was then alive, and that after the said Henry, eldest sonne to John Duke of Lancaster, as his descendants have hitherto holden the Crowne of England, &c. usually, for that himselfe the said Richard Plantagenet Duke of Yorke was the lawfull heire, being the sonne of Richard Plantagenet Earle of Cambridge, and of Anne before said.

(87) This was the effect of the Duke of Yorks title, which for the points of the Pedegree was very true, though in barre thereof the friends of King Henry (without deoying any part of the premises, being all of them more evident then that they could be honestly denied) had not a little to say for him: for they could among other things alledge, that Richard the second resigned up his Crowne and Regality at large; and that none else making claime but Henry Duke of Lancaster, hee was thereunto by the consent of all the three Estates admitted; that Richard Earle of Cambridge was for high Treason attainted and executed, and his issue made incapable of any inheritance; that this Richard his sonne now challenging the Crowne of England, being refused by the meere clemency and goodwill of this King Henry the first, had voluntarily acknowledged him for his lawfull Soveraigne, and sworn the same, and that the said Richard was finally for treason attainted, and adjudged uninheritable: they could hereunto have added sundry Acts of Parliament, made to establish the right of the Lancastrian line, the succession of three Kings, all Henries, that is to say the fourth, fifth and sixth; the petitive addresses of the first of those Kings, the noble vicilleries of the second, and the body life of the third; which three Kings were contained of raigne about threetye yeeres, in which number this was the nine and thirtieth of King Henry the sixth, who was descended of the male line, and the Duke of Yorke was of a female of which female line none had ever been in possession of the Crowne. Great and weighty points, (if any) and the rather to be considered, for that King Henries person being (in very truth) Prisoner, no act of his to establish Yorks title could hold in law or conscience, and the lesse, for that hee had a wife, and by her a sonne, who was at liberty, and ready with Armes to free his father, or hazzard to destroy the whole English name. But they who on Yorkes behalf abstractively disposed these highest questions, knew a rule of law, which saith, Tura legemini mulo iure civili derimo possund, and the Lancastrians were not without their speculation and remote considerations, to countenance the particulars of their cause. Thus we see that in Monarchies (though the noblest forme of Regiment) where lineall succession is the rule of inheritance, these sometimes fall out as great and as indeterminable difficulties, as where Election designeth the Successor; whereof the French tragedies which our Nation made among them, and now these in England, are without all exception, the most fearful instances. For France had heretofore her time of afflition, but now (O deare England) it was thine.

(88) While this weighty controversie was debated, a Crowne which hung for garnishment in the middle of the roome, where the Knights and Barges of the Parliament met to consult, and the crown which for like cause stood upon the highest Tower of Dover Castle, fell suddenly down, which were vulgarly construed to portend I hat the raigne of R. Henrie was at an end, and that the Crowne should be transferred from one royall line to another. But the Queene, her sonne Prince Edward, and her fall friends in the North (the seate of their hopes) being nothing discouraged at their late ill fortunes, prepare all the forces they cau to recouer K. Henrie and the Kingdome; which thing whiles they are pursuing, the conclusion of the Parliament concerning the crown, was, That Henry the sixth should raigne, and her King during his life, the remainder thereof in Richard Duke of Yorke, and the lawfull heires of his body in general taylor, King Henries heires to be excluded. The Duke in the meane time is proclaimed heire apparent, and called Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, Earle of Chester, and Protector of England. The agreement was engrossed, sealed and sworn vnto. The Queene will have nothing to doe in this bargain, being so dangerous and preiudicious to herselfe, her husband, and her sonne; and therefore when the King (at the Duke of Yorks instigation) sent for her to repair vnto him, she relying vpon the Dukes of Somerset and Excester, and other the Kings friends, vicerly refuseth: Henry continueth king. The Armes therefore, which the takers for his deliniance, haue the more iustice. The Duke of Yorke missing the prey hee expected, leaves the king with the Duke of Norfolk, and the Earle of Warwick at London; himselfe with the Earles of Salisbury and Rutland, and certaine forces, stretch forward to Wakefield to pursue the Queene and her sonne, lending direction to the Earle of March that hee should follow with all his power. The Castell of Sandall standeth pleasantly vpon a small hill, in view of the faire town of Wakefield; there the Duke of Yorke (comming thither vpon Christmas Eue) reposeth himselfe, and expecteth the encraile of his numbers. The Queene aduertised, thinks it wisdom to fight before the Duke grow too strong, and thereupon marcheth forward, hauing an Army of eightene thousand men, led by the Dukes of Somerset and Excester, the Earles of Devonshire and Wiltshire, the Lords Nevill, Clifford, &c. and in effect all the Northern Nobility. The host (or so much thereof as they thought necessary to shew) presents it selfe before Sandall, to prouoke and dare the Duke to battell. His blood impatient of these braves, & ignorant perhaps that the enemy had so great a multitude, will needs fight, though the Earle of Salisbury, and Sir David Hall (an ancient fruent of his, and a great Souldier) gane him aduise to stay, till his sonne (the Earle of March) approached with such Wellmen and Marchers, as hee had in great numbers assembled. But God would forbear him no longer, but like a seuerer Master meanes to take a present account: at which he found whether all the kingdomes of the earth are worth the least sinne, much lesse a willfull perurie.

(89) The Queene therefore addeth stratageme, and writ to her force, to the intent hee might not escape her hands; whereupon the Earle of Wiltshire vpon one side of the hill, and the Lord Clifford vpon the other, lie in ambush to thrust between him and the Castell; the Dukes of Somerset and Excester, stand embattled in the open field. Their policy had the wished successe; for the Duke being not fully five thousand strong, issueth out of the Castle downe the hill. The battels which stood in front, ioyne furiously, when suddenly the Duke of Yorke sees himselfe inclosed, and although hee expresse great manhood, yet within one halfe houre, his whole Armie was discomfited, himselfe and diuers his deare friends beaten downe and slaine. There lay dead about him the Lord Harington, Sir Thomas Newill sonne to the Earle of Salisbury, Sir David Hall, with sundry Knights and others about two thousand, & two hundred, among which were the heires of many Southern gentlemen of great account, whose blood was shortly after reuenged. Let vs not linger vpon the particular accidents of this battell, but consider what it wrought for King Henries advancement; yet these few things are not to be vnmembred. The Earle of Rutland (a younger sonne to the the Duke of Tork being about twelve yeeres old, was also slaine by the Lord Clifford, (who overtooke him flying) in part of reuenge for that the * Earles father had slaine his. A deed which worthily blemished the Author; but who can promise any thing temperate of himselfe in the heat of martiall fure? chiefly, where it was reuolued, not to leaue any branch of Tork line standing, for so doth *oue make the Lord Clifford to speake.

(90) That mercilesse proposition was common (as the euent will shew) to either faction. The Duke of Torkes head, crowned with paper, is presented to the Queene. Cruell irony is seldom fortunate. Caesar wept ouer Pompey head, but the Queene (ignorant how manifest causes of teares were reuerend for her owne share) makes her selfe merrie with that gaily and bloody spectacle. The Earle of Salisburie, after wounds received, being in this battell taken prisoner, is conueighed to Penfrith Castle, from whence the common people (who loued him not) *violently baled him, and cut off his head; which perhaps was not done without the good liking of others. The Dukes head, together with his, were fixed on poles and let vpon a gate of Tork, and with them (if Grafton say true) the heads of all the other prisoners which had bene conducted to Penfrith.

(91) This battell (called of Wakefield) was fought vpon the last day of December; of whose weathers complexion if their courages had participated, mischance might haue made her stop here, which now is in her fieriest course.

(92) For the Earle of March, sonne, and heire to this late valiant Duke of Tork, hearing of this tragick aduenture, giues not ouer: but, hauing gathered an armie of about twenty thousand to march against the Queene, he findes employment neerer hand: being certified, that Isabel Theder Earle of Pembroke (half brother to King Henric) and James Butler Earle of Ormond and Wiltshire, had with them a great force of Welsh and Irish to take him. The youthfull and valiant Earle of March, whose amiable presence and carriage made him gracious with the people, (and the rather for that he had the generall good word of *women,) meanes to try his fortune against the said Earles. He suddenly therefore turnes backe from Shrewsbury, and at a place called Mertimers Crosse neere Ludlow, where the camie abode, he fers vpon them; it was Candlemas day in the morning, at which time there appeared (as some write) three Summes, which lodicely ioined in one. This luckie prognosticon, and ominous Meteor exceedingly fired the Earle of March, and was (some say) the reason, why he vsed for his Baile, or roall device, the Sunne in his full brightness. The Battell maintaine their fight with great fure; but, in the end, the Earle of March obtains the victorie, killing of his enemies three thousand, and eight hundred men; the Earles find themselves by flight. The sonne of honour and fortune did thus begin to shine through Cleuds of blood and miserie, vpon Edward, whom shortly we are to behold King of England. There were taken * Sir Owen Thedre (father to Isabel Earle of Pembroke), who was beheaded by Edwards commandement, as also Sir Iohn Skeldener knight with his two sonnes, and other.

(93) The Queene on the other side (hauing ordered her affairs in the North, seized the citie there of, and refreshed her people,) within a while after drawes neere with her Northern armie to S. Albans. There came before them an euill fame of their behaviour to London, whose wealth lookt pale knowing it selfe in danger; for the Northern armie, (in which were Scots, Welsh, and Irish as well as English;) made bold by the way with what they liked, making small distinction of sacred or profane, after they were once past the riuer of Trent, Captaine Andrew Trollop being their Coronell. King Henry himselfe in person, with the Dukes of York and Suffolk, the Earles of Warwicke and Arundel, the Lord Banville, & other, with a great puissance encampe at S. Albans, to giue the Queene battell, and stop her farther passage toward London. But the Lords of her faction being ready to attempt on her behalf, asside the Kings forces within the Town, and after some sharpe affions, break through, and driue their aduersaries out with much bloodshed, till they fell vpon a squadron or battalion of the Kings, wherein there were about foure or five thousand men, which made good their ground for a while with great courage, but in the end the Queenes side clearely wanne the day. There perished in this conflict about two thousand.

This hapned vpon Shrewsbury, the fouteenth of February. The King, Queene and Prince meet ioyfully, where he knights his sonne, (being eight yeeres old,) and thirte others. The Lord Banville and Sir Thomas * Kiriel of Kent being taken in the fight, were beheaded, but all the other great men escape. The common people of London doe notwithstanding stand wholly for the beautifull Earle of March, and stand the more confidently, because they had sure intelligence, that he had vanquished the Earle of Pembroke in the Marches of Wales, and that the Earle of Warwicke, escaping from S. Albans, had met with the Earle of March neere Cosford, and that both with ioint forces were marching toward London. These newes made the King and Queene retire into the North, and leaue their Citie and the Southern Countreys to their Enemy, till they might recover a fairer opportunitie or more sufficiencies. Edward vpon notice of the Kings departure, entrench London, and games period to Henrics regne, which is accounted to take end after he had successfully ruled this Land the space of thirte eight yeeres, sixe months, and foure daies.

His Wife.

(94) Margaret the wife of King Henric, was the daughter of Reymur King of Ierusalem, Sicilie, and Aragon, Duke of Andegauis, Lorraine, Barre, and Calabria, Earle of Provence, Comtat, and Coutz. Shee by promise was espoused vnto King Henric, at the Citie Tours in Touren in the Church of Saint Martin, William de-la-Paule being Procurator to the King in the presence of the French king and his Queene, which king was uncle to the Brides Father, and the Queene Aunt vnto her mother. Shee with great pompe was conveyed to Southampton, and thence to the Abbey of Tutfield, where the yeere of grace 1445, and twentie two of April, shee was solemnly married to King Henry; and honorably attended by the greatest Estates of the Land, was crowned at Westminster the thirtieth of May following. Shee was exceedingly beautified in face, and of goodly feature, of a great wit and deepe policie, but of stomacke fure above her sexe, as in the managing of those troublesome times did too well appear. Shee was his wife twentie sixe yeeres, and twentie nine daies; and (after her husbands depoullion from his regall throne) her forces being vanquished at the battell of Trenthorpe, in a poore religious house, whether shee had fled for the safety of her life, was taken prisoner, and so carried Captiue to London, where she remained in darance, till Duke Beim her father did purchase her liberty with great summes of money, vnto whom shee returned, and lastly died in her native Countrey.

His Issue.

(95) Edward the only Child of King Henric and Queene Margaret his wife was borne at Westminster the thirteenth day of October, the yeere of Christ 1433. and the 31. of his fathers Raigne, and the next yeere following vpon the sixteenth of March, by authoritie of Parliament, was created Prince

CHAPTER XVII.

Edward, borne at Raen in Normandy, and bearing the title of March in England, hauing wunne the battell at Marston Crofte (though the Lords his Confederates had lost that of Saine Albans) from London hastied towards

London, & on his way was seconded by Richard Neuill, the stout Earle of Warwicke, to the great encrease of his number and power, which so terrified Queene Margarete, now ready to possesse the South, that with her husband and sonne, in a perplexed feare, she returned againe into the North; vpon which advantage Edward now Duke of Yorke, presently played. For London was resolued whether Prince to obey (the one very powerfull, and the other in possession) dayly consulted for their safest estate; when on the sudden Edward with Warwicke entered their gates, whose warlike viages so daunted the aduersie affected, that they beganne with the first to make him way to the throne, & the Noblemen likewise made him offers of their seruice, to establish his claime, neither were the Clergy to learne the obseruance of time, or to sway with the man vpon whom the world limited. All these set in Council to confer of the state, Duke Edward made knowne his title to the Crowne, and in well set termes declared, how the body of the whole Parliamēt formerly had thereunto consented, and Henry himselfe subscribed with his owne hand, whose title, though now carried through three descents; yet what right Lancaster had, they all knew, and how insufficient this last man was for rule, France to their dishonour did witnesse, where all was lost through his neglect, whose simplicity ever minded more his priuare deuout, then the poeet managing of a So-

(2) These things wrd (and moſt of them true) their voices were current, that Edward was the vi-duubred King, whereunto the Londoners the ſouner yeilded, for that his dreaded Northerne Army was then encamped in Saint Iohns field: neither was any reſtoration made (as before) of Henries unnatural life, but hee is now abſolutely neglected as unworthy of his Crowne, how acceptable ſouer he had ruined till then, whoſe following miſeries were not ſo much lamented, as his conſtant patience was admir'd in vndergoing the ſame. Edward thus mounted, before his foot had well touch'd the firſt ſteppe, was vpon Sunday the ſecond of March, among his Northerne Soldiers proclaimed King; William L.
Fauconbridge Earle of Kent declaring his claime, and diſabling K. Henry of title or Government, whoſe weake head (as hee alledge'd) had ouer long ble-miſh'd the Engliſh Crowne.

(3) Vpon the next day, with all pompe hee was conueied to Wykeſminſter, and ſet vpon the Kings ſeat in the Hall, where holding the ſcepter of Saint Edward in his hand, the voice of the people was againe demanded, and againe granted; ſuch was the hap of vnfortunate Henry, and condition of the multitude euer to diſlike the preſent, and to aſſect the new; but no interim left to diſſwade or attempt, the next day his title and title was againe proclaimed by the name of King Edward the fourth, being the fourth of March and about the 20. year of his age.

(4) Theſe ſudden alterations made the richer ſort ſomewhat fearefull, eſpecially, thoſe whoſe heart ſtood firm for K. Henry, (who was now in the North new muſttering of men) and among thoſe, London afforded many, as King Edward ſcalouſly ſuſpect-ed, whereof one Walter a ſubſtantiall Citizen and Grocer was a ſufficient prooſe, who for wordes ſpoken concerning his owne ſonne, that hee would make him heire of the Crowne (meaning his houſe hauing that Signe) was the eighth day of this Kings raigne apprehended, and beheaded in Smithfield. And albeit his words intended no treaſon, (the Grocer not once dreaming to touch King Edwards title) yet the time being when the Crowne lay at ſtake, the tenure of the Law made them his death. This rough beginning moued many to doubt, that they had wronged themſelues in wronging King Henry, which opinion was more confirmed in that hee re-tain'd "a great ſumme of money borrowed of the Scaplers-Merchantes, and diſturbed in his affairs, whoſe reſtitution hee utterly denyed with an aultere commandement to ſurceſſe the demand. But hearing how Henry was beloued in the North, & what followers were gathered to recover him the Crowne, vpon the twelfth of March with a complete Armie hee ſets forth of London, accompanied with his brethren, and many other Nobles: with whom marching towards Pauſey, hee there appoints the Lord Fitzwater to keepe the paſſage of Ferribry, omitting no directions of a worthy commander.

(5) King Henry for his part though nothing ſo warlike, yet thought it beſt policy to employ ſuch leaders as deſired reuenge againſt the houſe of Turke, ſuch were the Duke of Sommerſet, the Earle of Northumberland, and the Lord Clifford, whoſe fathers had been ſlaine in the firſt battell of S. Albans, which laſt, though in degree the leaſt man, yet fought to raide his fame with the firſt, and therefore to leaue no attempt vnſuſſayed, hee ſo ſuddenly charged vpon the Troupe appointed for Ferribry, that the L.
Fitzwater vnarmed (only with a pollix in his hand) came haſtily to the Brigg, thinking a fray had been among his owne Soldiers, where, with the Baſtard of Salisbury, hee and many of his newe were ſlaine by the enemye.

(6) The brute of which guſt blowne into Robert Wormicker eare, hee mounted his Coarſer, and poſting to Edward, poſſing, blowing, and almoſt out of breath, ſaid, Sir I pray God haue mercy on their ſoules which in the beginning of your enterpriſe haue loſt their lives: I ſee no ſuſpect on the world, but in God, in whom I commit the vengeance. And ſo alighting, forthwith ſlew his horſe with his ſword ſaying, Let him ſlee; that ſlee will, I will tarry with how that will tarry with me: which hee confirmed by kiſſing the croſſe of his ſword, the vſual complement of coeneanes made by martiall men. The valiant Lord Fauconbridge fearing leſt this beginning would giue an edge to the ſequell, got ouer the riuer at Caſtleford, three miles from the bridge, meaning to incloſe the takers vpon their backs, which Clifford perceiuing, ſought to auoide, and whether for haſte, heere, or paine, put off the gorget hee wore; when ſuddenly an arrow without an head, ſhot from the Bow of ſome laide in ambuſh, pierced through his throat, and ſtucke in his necke, which ſet a period vnto his life.

(7) The next day more fatall for Englands blood, was celebrated with ſpeeres in ſtead of palmes, viſu-ally borne on * that Saboth of Lent, in whole dawning, the Lord Fauconbridge, who commanded the forward (the Duke of York being ſicke) rooke the field on a plaine, betwixt the townes of Towm and Saxton, where King Edward ioyning his whole forces (being forty eight thouſand, and ſix hundred ſixty perſons, as King Henry were alſo threeſcore thouſand) cauſed proclamation to bee made, that hee who feared to fight, might forthwith depart; but if any Soldier abiding, ſhould ſeek to ſlee or turn backe, hee ſhould bee ſlaine by his next fellow, and the ſlayer to receive a great reward, beſides the ſipend of a double pay.

(8) Both Armies ready to ioyne, a ſmall ſleet of ſnow hapned to fall, which with the wind was carried into the face of the Lancaſtrian hoſt, whereby their fight was much empached, which advantage Fauconbridge ſoone eſpying, forthwith commanded his Archers to ſhoot each man a flight, and then to ſtand without further proſſer. The Northerne men feeling the arrows, but not ſeeing the Archers, made haſte to acquire them with the like, and ſhot their whole ſheques of arrowes without intermiſſion, but ſhort of the marke by threeſcore yards at the leaſt; which ſtorme being paſt, and all their ſtoreperi, the worthy Fauconbridge advanced forward, and within reach of his Archers ſore galled the enemye, making a double advantage of what they had done: for their owne quiers being full, when the others were empty, they gathered vp & ſhot theirs, againſt their owne ſhooters, yet left ſome of them ſlacking to gull the legges of their purſuers: by which ſoely ſtratagem, as was conſtantly ſuſpected, the battell and day was loſt and wonne.

(9) The fight was bloody and continued tenne houres, for all being Engliſh, acquire themſelues Engliſh-like, no taking of priſoners, nor looking for raſhonne, but all to retaine, and to get honour that day; wherein died the Lords Beaumont, Neuill, Willoughby, Wells, Seales, Cray, Daer, Fitchagh, Briketham, and Clifford, (who died the day before) the two baſtards of Exceſter, Knights, Eſquiers & Gentlemen a great number, and in all (on both parts) thirty five thouſand ninety and one; ſo that not only the field lay ſtained with Engliſh blood, but the riuers ran red for a great diſtance, ſo markable is this battell of Englands civill wars.

(10) Henry, who neuer was victor whereſoeuer hee came, hearing this loſſe which ſeemed irrecouerable, with his Queene and ſonne halted into Sp-land, where, of Towm the young King hee was royaly entertained, with comfort of aſſiſtance to recouer his eſtate, in regard whereof he ſurrendered the ſtrong towne Towm into the Scots hand, and concluded a marriage betwixt Prince Edward his ſonne, and Lady Margaret the ſiſter of the laid King. Theſe things thus effected, milde Henry conceiued ſome new budding hopes, and Queene Margaret his wife,

King Edward crowned.

(11) Victorious Edward, after those his prosperous successes in the North, in triumph returned to London, and the eight & twentieth of June with great solemnity was Crowned at Westminster, where in St. Peters Church, the next day it was againe most solemnly set on his head, and the third day so Crowned he came to Saint Pauls in London, and therein was created with great applause of the People. In November following a Parliament began, wherein King Henrie, Queen Margaret, and Prince Edward their issue, were deherited of their right to the Crowne; the Dukes of Excester and Sommerfet, and the Earle of Devonshire, with an hundred and forty more, were attained also and deherited; so fortune dallied in setting the dice of her favours, or frownes.

A.D. 1462.
Queen Margaret returned into Scotland.

(12) Queene Margaret floured with men, but in want of money, with her French powers made into Scotland; whole coming was most welcome to the two Kings there, and thence, with great shew of courtier, hoisted her flagges for England, but having touched the bay of Tyneside (whether vpon better aduise, or feared with their owne shadowes,) shee with her French put backe to the Sea, where such a fore tempest tooke them, as had not Queen Margaret in a small Carrell got vnto Berwick, shee had not liued to vexe the new King, nor seen the vnfurunate losse of her husband, her son, and Realme, nor the miserable calamities of her owne old age; her French by Bayard oule were beate into Italy land, many flaine, and foure hundred of them put to their ranlomes.

(13) This fainting French enterprize, though it dulled the edge of some spirits, yet did it nothing daunt the courage of the Queene, her better hopes being fixed vpon the States valour, so, cleaving Prince Edward for lazie in Berwick,) with her husband and Scots there cured Northumberland, took the Castle of Bamburgh, and so passed forward vnto the Bishopricke, their forces daily increasing through the confluence of such English, as fauoured King Henrie.

(14) King Edward hearing these stirres in the North, made his preparation both by Sea and Land, and with his brethren and Nobles came to York, from whence he first took Lord Montague, with a power of men, as somewhat mistrusting the loialties of the Northumbrians, who passing forward, vpon Hegeley Mount was suddenly encountered by the Lords Hungerford and Ross, with whom was Sir Ralph Perre, a most valiant Knight; but Montague, accompanied with such as would neither looke backe, nor stand gazing on, abode the encounter, and at the first pulh put backe the two Lords, and finally slew the said Perre, who no waies would depart out of the field; but in dying said, I haue saved the horse in my brest, meaning his oath made to King Henrie.

And therefore learning by espials, that Henries host lay incamped vpon a plaine called Lewes, nere vnto Heston by the Water Demell he halted thither, and so valiantly assailed their Camp, as after great slaughter, in chase were taken Lord Henrie Duke of Sommerfet, the Lords, Ross, Malins, and Hungerford, all which were beheaded, and Sir Ralph Grey, who first solemnly disgraced, his guilt (parres cut from his body, by the Maffer Cooke, his sword broken ouer his head, his Conceit armour rent, another reuered put on by the King at Armes, was so led to his execution. King Henrie himselfe got away (as Sten said) into Lancashire, where, with some few he liued full hardly in Caves, and vnkowne, more than a yere, but (with Grey) hee fled into Scotland which is more likele.

(16) Edward thus cleared of the Cloud threatening home, thought best ere others did light, to provide for himselfe, and therefore he raised Bulwarks, built new Fortresses in places of danger, put forth his espials vpon the Marches of Scotland, and commanded that none should keepe Henrie or Margaret in secret, whose light he feared, would draw the affections of many, which otherwise stood in case of obedience. But ouer-borne Henrie (whether pallid at feare, or enforced by destiny in dignified apparel) pall into England, where he was loone apprehended by one Canley; but Sten said by Thomas Talbot in Cleburn and besides Bangerly Hipping James in Lancashire, being betrayed in Waddington Hall as hee sat at dinner, and thence brought to London with his legs bound to the stirrups, arched by Warwick, his gault spurs taken off, and committed Prisoner to the Tower of London.

(17) The Lyon thus pent, his pawes cut or pared, and Queen Margaret in quiet with her father Reiner, King Edward now fraies let his minde vpon Government for the good of his Realme. In his Court of Kings Bench he vied to sit in person certaine daies together, to see how his lawes proceeded with Iustice; ordained penal Seauers against excoisive pride in Apparell, especially against long picked shoes then usually worne, which grew to such an extreme, that the pikes in the Toes were turned upward and with filter chaines, or filke lores tied to the knee. But among many good prouisions, one proued very bad, as the sequell shewes; for concluding a league with King Henrie of Castile, and John King of Aragon, he granted a licence to transport certaine numbers of Catefoeld Sheepe, which are liue grow ne to such an exceeding increas, as the Clothes made of their woolles is a great hindrance to our Marchanes, which aduerture in the Lewant Seas.

(18) His next care was to finde a fit Regent, both for the hope of issue to succed him for alliance and power to assist (if need were) against Henries claimer. Filt therefore minding to lead into Scotland, so desire in marriage the Ladie Margaret (sister to king Leues the third) thereby to frustrate Henrie further hope; was made to beleue that the said Ladie was, by reason of sicknesse, not capable of conception, which altogether declined his affection from that way. Next, as some say, a motion was made for Lady Elizabeth sister and heire apparant vnto Henrie King of Castile, as a match most conuenient, considering King Edward had thereunto a Claim, whose great Grand-mother was one of the heires of Castile, being the daughter of Don Petyr the King, besides which high match, and combination of Alliances, a hope was conceived that the Duchies of Guien and Aquitaine, might be recovered by the assistance of these English, without great charge or cruell to the English. But the tender spring of the one, and the luby growth of the other, would not be grafted into one stocke to beare fruit, the little aboute fixe, and hee about twenty three, farr vnfit to abstaime till they could giue him content.

(19) A third Princesse was assaid, against whom could be no exceptions, for birth, beautie, yeeres, or alliance, which was Lady Beue, daughter of Lewis Duke of Sauny, and sister to Carlet the French Queene, at that time residing in the French Court. This double firing was thought most fit for king Edwards bow; for the Duke more temerous, might strengthen him abroad, and the French neuer home would be made a good neighbour, hating the night-bird still singing in his eare: especially to call a rubbe to king Henries way, whose hopes lay most vpon Lewis, for that Reuer of Amies, being himselfe King of Naples, Sicill and Ierusalem, had more honour by that verball title, then rents or reuenues to maintain his estate, or any subiection acknowledged by them; so as if king Lewis were Edwards, Amies was not to be feared feared. This match being most approved in counsell, none was held more fit to solicit the business then Lord Richard Neul the great Earl of Warwick, a man esteemed for power a Demy-King, and for magnificence and hospitality matchlesse: in whose house at London (as some have verified) sixe ozen were spent every day, and most Tasteries in the City full of his meat.

(20) Warwick in great state arrived at Tours, & his message knowne, was accordingly entertained in the French Court, where he wrought the Queen her selfe to be the chief Agent, who drew on her sister Jane, with recommending the state and stile of a magnificent Queene (a sound very tunable in a Ladies care,) and her husband Lewis, with assurance of a potent and wise Alliance, a pleasing theame to soft natured Princes, as the French King was. And indeed to all here undertooke all good contentments; so as on that side all things were cleare, and Warwick dismissed with Courteous French complements; the Earle Damp-marvis was to passe into England for the final confirmation.

(21) But whilst Warwick had bene industri-ously wooing in France, King Edwards affection in England was working another way; for being on banking in the Forrest of Hyewood beside Stony-Stratford, hee there found other game, that made game in his eye, which was the Lady Elizabeth Gray attending the Dutchesse of Bedford her mother, who then sojourned at his Mannour of Grafton, whither hee repaired for his recreation. She had bene attendant vpon Queene Margaret the wife of King Henry the sixth, and had bene married vnto John Gray Esquier, knighted, and slaine at the battell of S. Albans vpon King Henries part, who now was a suter vnto the King, for something taken away in the extremity of that time, to hee restored to him the maintenance of her estate. But howsoever her suit pierced his eare, her sweetly composed feature strangely affected his heart more formally then was, and loudly in countenance, then either tall or exceedingly faire, yet both sufficient to meete in one person, of an excellent witte, a sober demeanour, a modest looke, a feminine smile, and her speech vntersed in such a natural eloquence as her answers eare set on edge King Edwards desires, which howsoever distastfull to the appetite of his wanton bed, (affirming with blisshes, that as she accounted her selfe most unworthy of the name of his Queen, so shee held her selfe of more worth, & her chaste honour dearer then to bee his Concubine) yet held they him in chaste till shee had taken him in the faires of her love.

(22) Their many meetings and lowres complements, made the old Dutchesse of Turke (the Kings mother) much to suspect it would bee a match; to hinder which, with a parents authority the entered discourse, alledging it honourable, safe, and of much profite to linke with some great Princesse in forraigne lands, both for the increase of possessions abroad, and (as the case stood) to bee assisted at home: that Warwick had gone so farr in his suite in France, as if in himselfe now were the stay, he feared their displeasures would not bee staied. To marry his Subject shee held it vnprincely, especially one without reuencues, alliance, or riches, no other thing moving, but a wanton doting on the person; and although that in Lady Elizabeth nothing was to be misliked, yet was there nothing so excellent, but the same was incorporated in farr greater Ladies, more meet as shee thought of a Queenslike estate. A virgine (quoth she) is most fitt for a sacred Prince his bride, whose head is annointed with holy Oyle, and whose Maistie is outwardly more sublimethen the Levitical Priests: yet were they forbidden to make widdowes their wives, lest the holy callings should bee defiled with the stain of Bigamie.

(23) When his Mother had said, and expected his answer, the King who had taken counsell of his owne desires, and knew himselfe to bee out of his mothers rule, partly in earnest, and partly in plea-sance, made her this reply: That marriage being a spirituall type, ought rather to be conioyned where God had framed the parties to conioine (as this of his was) then in regard of any temporal respect whatsoever. That his choice was pleasing to himselfe, and would be to his Subjects he certainly knew, whose amity before all other Nations hee most preferred and desired; neither could hee give them better occasion of love then in this, that being their Soveraigne, hee diddane not to marry into their Tribes, and so likewise for his life, there could not any Prince be better beloved then he that was their naturall Prince, so borne of both parents. That if forraigne alliances were so needfull, hee had many of his kin, to contract them, and that with content of all parties: but for himselfe, to marry for possessions, or to please others with displeasing his own affections, hee saw it no wisdom, having already sufficient of the one; and the other offend'd, even sweet pleasure would seeme some pain; especially, the choice that is made by another mans eye. That there are many comparable to her, said hee, I make no question, and am the more glad, let them have them that like them, I will not repine, neither I hope will any abridge mee of that which I allow to others: (the Proverbe is) (Mother) that marriage goes by Desire, but to be wised against a mans own liking is an earthly Purgatory. And therefore my Cousin Warwick I am sure, neither loveth me so little, to grudge at that I love, nor is so vnreasonable to looke that I should in choice of a wife, rather be ruled by his eye, then by mine owne: as though I were a Ward, that were bound to marry by the appointment of a Gardian: I would not bee a King with that condition, to forebear mine owne libertie, in choice of mine owne marriage. As for possibility of more inheritance by new affinity in forraigne land, it proves often the occasion of more trouble then profite; and wee have already tie by that meanes, to so much as sufficeth to get, and keep well in one mans day. That she is a widdow, and hath already children, by Gods blessed Lady I am a Pa-reidour, yet have I some too, and so each of vs hath a proofe, that neither of vs is like to bee barren. And therefore (Madam) I pray you bee content, I trust in God, shee shall bring a young Prince that shall play on your lappe to your great pleasure, and your selfe shall blisse the wombe that bare such a babe: and as for your objection of Bigamy, let the Bishop hardly lay it in my way, when I come to take Orders: for I vnderstand it is forbidden a Priest, but I neuer wist, that it was forbidden a Prince.

(24) The Dutchesse seeing the King so set on his owne choice, that she could not pull him backe, rooke it in such disdain, that vnder pretext of her duty to Godward, she desired to frustrate the match, and rather gave furtherance that Lady Elizabeth Lancey should bee his Queene, whom not long before hee had with wanton dalliances enticed to his bed: for which act, vnder pretence of a contract with her, whose husband hee was before God, (as they alledged) his mother openly objected against this his intended marriage, in the discharge (forsooth) of her owne conscience, which was the cause of such an obstacle, as either the Bishops darst not, or the Kings proceed to the solemnization of this wedding, till the same were clearly purged, and the truth openly testified: whereupon Dame Elizabeth Lancey was sent for; which Lady albeit shee was by the Kings mother, and others to ascerne the same, yet when shee was solemnly sworne to speake truth, she confessed that they were never affianced in deede, howbeit shee affirmed his Gravissimus loosing words vnto her, as the verily hoped he would have married her, and that if it had not bene for such kind words, shee would never have shewed such kindnesse vnto him.

(21) She was honourably defended, especially by the surer side, whose mother was Jaqueline daughter to Peter of Luxembourg, Earle of S. Paul, and Duchesse to John Duke of Bedford Regent of France; after whose death she married Sir Richard Woodville knight, and among others have unto him this Elizabeth, England's faire Queene, who being privately married at the Manour of Grafton, was afterwards crowned Queen at Westminster with all due celebrations, upon the sixte and twentieth of May, Anno, 1465. Her father then by this new made sonne in law, and Sovereigne Lord, was created Lord Rivers, and made high Constable of England, her brother Lord Anthony, married to the sole heire of the Lord Scaler, and her sonne Thomas Grey borne to her first husband, was created Marquisse Dorset, and married to the heire of the Lord Bonville.

(26) But when Warwick had knowledge the wanton King had got a new wife, and his courting of Lady Bona, to bee but a ball to make Edward play; hee stormed not a little, whose credite hee rooke to be crackt in the French Court, and himselfe rather thought to have dallied in this motion, then to deale by commission from his King, for which cause hee conceived so inward an indignation, that his affection was withdrawn from King Edward, and rheueforth came upon Henry retained in prison, to which end he temporized with the prelar king, applauded the Queene, and bare countenance in Court with no discontented there: The King as wary as Warwick was, cast an eye of dislike, or of any suspicion, gave him countenance in Court, and in familiar conference heard him before others; yet left the item of his greatness should overtop his crown and his brethren the spreading branches shadow his designe, heeooke the Chancellorshippe from George Nevill, the one of them, then Bishoppe of Exeter, afterward Archbishops of York, and from the other John Nevill Baron Montacute, the Earle-dome of Northumberland, bestowing the same (at the suite of the Northumbrian, set on by himselfe) upon Henry Percy, whose father was slain at Towton, and himselfe at that present fled into Scotland for safety. Whereupon Montacute was removed, and to avoid suspicion was created Marquisse, a greater name, but farre lesse in power. And to have a stake in store howsoever the dice chanced to turne, hee sought to joine friendship with forraigne Princes, having offended France for the refusing of his Queene's sister: so hee sought, and obtained the amity of Henry King of Castile, & of John King of Arragon, andooke a truce with his neighbour the Scottish King for fifteen years following.

(27) But these confederates for the more part too farre to be called for by whille, fortune beyond expectation left him another enen at his elbow, which was Philip Duke of Burgundy, Prince of Flanders, Brabant, and Zealand, whose onely sonne legitimate, (Charles Earle of Charolais a widower, and without any sonne) hee sought to conioine to King Edward's faire sister, not so much for any love hee bare to the house of York, himselfe being a Lancastrian by his mothers side, as to buye against Lewis King of France, whom hee had lately overcome in a battell at Montleberry, and as then stood upon his defence, as hee was sure King Edward did. This motion King Edward and his Councill well liked, only Warwick with stood it, in favour of the French: but the Lady Margaret sent over according to her estate, and Warwick left fuming with a discontented mind, after some complements of mirth with his brethren the Archbishops and Montacute at his Towne of Warwick, beat forth into warlike consultations for the deposing of Edward, and restoration of Henry, whose wrongs (as he alledged) did crie for right at their hands. The Bishoppe lightly consented to side for King Henry, but the Marquisse would hardly bee drawn from King Edward, which Warwick perceiving, laid his line twiggis yet another way.

(28) For being a man of a deepe trench and witte, hee well saw that George Duke of Clarence the Kings second brother, bare not the best liking to the sway of the times: him therefore hee sought to allure to his fist, which once manded, Edward should loose the best Falcon for his game; him therefore by Promises hee meant first to ptooe and according to their digest, purposed to proceed. So falling in familiar converse with Clarence, beganne to complain of some unkindnes in the King, both in breach of some promises, and stinne of his honour in the French Court. The Duke as discontented as Warwick, interrupted his tale before it was told, why my Lord (quoth Clarence) doe you looke that a Leopard should have no spots in his skaine, or a Camelion no colours, but one, in faith you are deceived, and looke but your labour to wash the natural Blackamore: for will you have him kind that is by nature unkind, and to be respected of him, that respects not his owne hound: or thinke you (a Colen and Allie) to be raised by him, that seeth (if not seetheth) his owne bretherens faul. For the heire of the Lord Scaler (you see) hee hath married to his wifes brother, the heire of the Lord Bonville and Harington to his wifes sonne, and affianced the heire of the Lord Hungerford to the Lord Hastings, marriages indeede more meete for his two brethren and kinne, then for such new foundlings as hee hath bestowen them upon. But my George I sweare, if my brother of Gloucester would joine with mee, wee would make him know that wee are all three one stinns sonne, and of one and the same mother.

(29) Earle Warwick having that which hee greedily sought after, seconded the resolution with his owne assistance, imparting now boldly what confederates hee had made, and to joine more faithfully in this his designe, hee proffered Clarence his eldest daughter Lady Isabel in marriage, faire and well qualified with the one halfe of his wifes inheritance, she being sole heire unto Henry Beauchampe Earle of Warwick her brother, and nothing inferior to any of those whom Edward had bestowed upon others, which no looner was spoken, but was as presently embraced, and the plots conferred how to proceed, which was concluded, forthwith to saile unto Calles (whereof the Earle was Captaine, and where the virgine Lady lay) as well to confirme the contract betwixt them, as to be absent while the commotion should beginne, as the faller from suspicion and the surer to strike when the Ball came to hand, so fir which, the Archbishops and Montacute were appointed for the North.

(30) The occasion pickt to make Malecontents, was the abol of Charity unto an hospital dedicated to Saint Lazarus in the City of York, whose renewen stood most upon come yearly received from Farmers in the Country, as an oblation of their first graize. This the factious made their onely ground vnder a holy pretext (forsooth) that the poore were defrauded, and the Master and Priests onely fed & waxen fat. To redresse which one Robert Haldern entered in action, and with silence roused strong enterprised for York, in which City the Lord Marquisse Montacute was President for King Edward, who with a small number, but well chosen, lifted out against the enemy, put them backe, and strooke off the head of their Captaine before the gates of York: but whether hee did it in policie to grow more in trust with the King, or else of duty of oblige, not moulded thoroughly to the commotion, is vacertain. But certaine it is, the Rebels were nothing daunted at Halderns death, but rather made resolute to continue what they had begunne.

(31) To which end they choose them two Chieftaines, of greater account, and eminent calling, which were Henry sonne and heire to the Lord Fitz-hugh, and Sir Horie Newill, sonne and heire to the Lord Lutmer, the one of them being Nephew, & the other Cousin-germaine vnto the Earle of Warwick, the bot young, and not altogether experienced in Armes, choole for their Tutor Sir John Conyers a Knight of offch courage, skill and valour, as to the North-parts few were his like: who meaning to strike at the head, determined to march forthwith to London proclaiming in his way, that Edward was neither a iust Prince vnto God, nor a profitable King vnto the Common-wele.

(32) King Edward hearing of these Northern proceedings, and that his brother and Warwick were preparing against him, sent for the Lord Herbert whom he had created Earle of Pembroke, to be his General in the North (who partly to defende the Kings liberality in aduancing him to such honour, and partly in emulation he bore toward Warwick, being the sole obstacle (as he tooke it) why he obtained not the wardship of the Lord Bonils daughter and heire for his eldest sonne) did not a little reioice of that his imployment. And therefore accompanied with Sir Richard Herbert his brother and eightene thousand well furnished Welshmen, marched towards the enemy, and after him was sent Humfrey Lord Stafford with fixe thousand Archers to second him in his warres. These Lords meeting together, had notice by espials that the Northerns made forwards towards Northampton to intercept whom, the Lord Stafford lately made Earle of Deuonshire was imployed and Sir Richard Herbert, who with two thousand horse laid themselves covertly by the side of a wood, and suddenly fell vpon the reerward, the rest hauing passed: but the Northerns were nimble turned about, and bad the Welshmen such welcome as few of them returned to tell of their entertainment.

(33) The King vnderstanding of this hard beginning, mustred his subiects on euene side, intending to cope with the Northerns himselfe. And Earle Warwick as forward to forward his fortunes, gathered his friends, with purpose to encounter with Pembroke and his Host. But before any supplies came to either of both; it chanced the Armes to meete at vnwares, vpon a faire plaine called Danet more neere to the Towne Hedgnot, three miles from Barbarie and prefindly fell to a bickering, wherein Sir Horie Newill Knight, sonne of the Lord Lutmer, vpon a lusty courage, venturing how far too farre was taken prisoner, and notwithstanding he yielded himselfe to his Takers, was cruelly slaine, which vnmartiall act redressed not long vnrepaid with the losse of most of the Welsh the next day. For the field withdrawne the Lord Stafford repaired to Barbarie and there tooke his lodging, where his affections were much enamoured vpon a faire damsell in the Inne. But the Earle of Pembroke coming to the same Towne, tooke into the same Inne, and commanded the Lord Stafford to provide him elsewhere, contrary to their agreements made before, whereas Stafford was displaced, and departing thence with his whole Band, left the Earle naked of meo in the Towne, and disabled the field of the Archers, whereby the day was lost vpon the kings part, for which he shortly lost his owne head.

(34) The Northerns enflamed for the death of young Newill, the next morning most valiantly fell vpon the Welshmen, and by the force of Archers, draue them from their ground of aduantage, which Pembroke winning, supplied with his owne promise, and Richard his brother with his Pollaxe twice made way through the battell of the Northerns, without anie mortall or deadly wound: so that by their valours it was verily fopped the field had beene woone, had not Iohn Clappan an EQUIRE and firmant to Warwick displaced his Lords Co'ours with his white beere, and from an eminent place cried a Warwick a Warwick, whereas the Welsh were so terrified, as they turned and fled, leauing their Generall and his brother alone in the field, who valiantly fighting were incompailed and taken with the death of fusthouland of their men. The Earle with his brother Sir Richard Herbert were brought to Ranbery, where with ten other Gentlemen they lost their heads, Conyers and Clappan being their Iudges.

(35) This second victory thus got, and the Northerns now belied, vnder the leading of Richard of Riddisdale, halted to the Kings mannor of Grafston, where the Earle Ranert father to the Queene then lay, whom with his sonne Iohn, they suddenly surprized, and in Northampton stracke off their heads without any iudgement. The deaths of these Lords the King greatly lamented; and sought to reuenge: first therefore writing his Commuitions for the apprehension of Lord Humfrey Stafford of South-wick (who by diligent search was found at Great-march and beheaded at Tridgewater, as he worthily deierued) next he prepared a mighty Armie, and with the same marched to ward Warwick, his company increasing euer as he went.

(36) King Edward let downe his tents at Walsay foure miles from Warwick where the Duke and the Earle of Warwick host lay ready for Battell, but by the mediation of friends a peace was insured, and letters written from eicher parties, expressing the griefs and wrongs sustained, with proferts of redresse, in amending all, and in shew so fare it proceeded, as the King conceiuing certaine hope of peace, rested secure, not learing any soole-play, which polique Warwick (by his spall perceiving) thought it not wisdom: to looke the aduantage, and strertup on to the dead of the night with a selected Company he entred the Kings Camp, killing them that kept the watch, tooke the king in his bed, and brought him his prisoner to his Castle of Warwick, and thence by easie Iourneys in the night had him conueyed to Stiddeham Castle in Yorkshire not farre from Richmond, where vnder the custody of his brother George Newill Archbishop of Yorke hee was retained.

(37) His vlage was Princely, and according to his estate, which he often acknowledged to the Archbishop with all kind thanks, and complements of wordes, whereby he wrought himselfe into such trust and fauour, as he had the Forreits to hunt in, and the parkes for his pleasure, whose pales are well knowne, vnsufficient wals to pen the lyon, as appeared by this King, who being abroad and on hunting, Sir William Stanley, with Sir Thomas Burgh brought him fresh horse, and such a crew of followers that his keepers more feared their owne lues, then were forward to force him backe againe to prison, and so let the game goe without further chafe. King Edward thus escaped, Warwick like a wild man furiously ragged, but seeing no remedy made vfe of necessity, and gaue forth that himselfe lo could it, haing power to make Kings and to vnmake them againe.

(38) The King forthwith repaired to Yorke, where with great honour hee was iouslly received, and abode certaine daies, which made him well hope of a further supply of friends and men. but faying thereof, and fearing the Archbishops persiute with a small traine he posted to Lancaster, where he found the Lord Hastings his Chamberlaine well accompanied for his Cosuey: his spirits then reioiced, and traine daily increasing, with speedie Iourneys hee came vnto London: where all his studies and consultations were, how to be reuenged vpon these dissolial Lords, his brother, and Earle Warwick, and thye againe fretting at the Archbishops follie sought to make stronger their factions against the King.

A commotion in Lincolneshire.

(39) The stout Earle of Gloucester must have vent, otherwise the Duke must needs breake, caused new barres to be raised in Lincolneshire, vnder the leading of Sir Robert Ffytch, an expert souldier, and sonne of the Lord Ffytch, who with thirte thousand Commons, disturbed the Countrey, and in euerie place proclaimed King Henrie; setting downe his battell not farre from Stamford, meaning to abide the encounter of his oppositors, which when the King heard of, he sent for the Lord Ffytch his father, commanding him to write to his sonne to forswear the warrs, and to marching toward Stamford tooke Ffytch in his companie, with a good hope that the sonne would not beare armes against his own father in field, but how fower he had writ, or the King conceived, Sir Robert went on in his former deliquies, which so fore moored Edward, that he beheaded Lord Ffytch with Sir Thomas Dymoke that had married his daughter, although he had given them promise of safety and life.

The Lord with and Sir Thomas Dymoke beheaded.

(40) Young Ffytch then hearing of his fathers death, sought the revenge vpon this vtruly Prince, and not staying for Ffytch who was in preparing to come, set manfully vpon the King and his power, where betwixt them was performed a most bloody fight, till at last Sir Robert was taken, with Sir Thomas Deland and others, whereas the Lincolneshire men were so terrified, that calling off their Coates, they all ranne away, in regard whereof this battell to this day is called, the battell of Leisest field, wherein were slaine ten thousand men at the least, after which victory the King commanded Ffytch with many other of none to be put to death as the chiefe causes of these dangerous Commotions.

(41) This vniuicely conflict and vnfortunate onethrow, made Clarence, and Ffytch, at their wits end, who vnprovided to field against Edward, gave way to necessity, and from Durhamshire embarked themselves and wives for France, both to intigrate King Lewis no friend vnto Edward, and to secure themselves in Calis (whereof Ffytch was captain) till fortune had changed the hand of her play. These crossing the Seas call Anchor before the Towne of Calis, and gave notice they were ready to land, but the Lord Fauvel a Gascon, whom Ffytch had substituted his depuie, discharged diuers peeces of Ordinance against them, and sent word that they should not come there: meane while the Duchesse of Clarence fell in trammel, and was there on Shippe-board deliuered of a faire soune, which Child the Earle depuie would scarcely suffer to be baptized in the Towne, nor without great entreaty permit two flagons of wine to be conveyed aboard to the Ladies lying in the haven. For which his good friend King Edward by his letters Patentes made Fauvel chiefe Captaine of Calis, and discharged the Earle as a Traitor or Rebelle against him.

standing his marriage, thought now a fit time to require the discountreie; and therefore sent many thanks vnto Fauvel, with promise of a thousand Crowns pension by yeere, if he stood firme for his wives brother King Edward, himselfe laying the Coast to impeach his arraige. But how Monsieur Fauvel stood affected, whatsoever then he made, Countess the French Kings Historian doth tell, who sent Warwick word the danger he stood in, of the said Duke, and of Durand the Kings Admirall, so as to land, would be his final confusion: His Counsell therefore was that he should make iourne to France, vnto whose King he should be most welcome; and as for the town of Calis, he willed him to take no thought, but promised to make him a good reckoning thereof, when time should best serue. Whereupon the Earle waied anchor for Normandy, and in his way tooke many rich Ships of the Duke of Burgundie subjects, which nettled him not a little, but yet found no dole to rub out the smart.

(43) King Lewis hearing of the marriage of Warwick, and knowing his troubles to arise for his Ambassage to Rome, and faith vnto France, first certifie Princes to conduct him to the Cabbell of Amboise, where a supply was made against all necessities, and himselfe and traine most honourably entertained, whereas the Duke of Burgundie long repined, and sent Lewis word that he disliked his doings with threats of vengeance, if he aided him against his wives brother. This, notwithstanding the French King gave all comforts to these fugitives, and prepared his assistance for their restoration, and the raising againe of godly King Henrie.

(44) Regent Margeret having fled England and iourourning in France with her Father Beauchamp in King in name, but scarcely able to beare the State of an Earle) saw owne the Iron hat, and ready to be stricke, therefore with her sonne Prince Edward, John Earle of Oxford, and Taffer Earle of Pembroke (who lastlie had escaped out of prison in England) came vnto Amboise, where by means of the French King a combination of Alliance was confirmed betwixt the Prince of Wales, young Edward, and Anne the second daughter to the Earle of Warwick, then present with her mother and sister in France. King Edward driven into a dunpe.

(45) Edward in England hearing what Queen Margeret, his brother Clarence, and Beauchamp in the French Court had done, was stricke into a sodaine dumpe, being as doubtfull of friends, as fearefull of foes, and therefore such as were allied to the Lancastrians, or fauourits of the down-fall K. Henrie, he began somewhat roughly to deale with; many therefore that were guilty daily tooke Sanctuarie, or yielded themselves to his mercie, among whom John Marques Montacute brother to Warwick was one, who with fairest words of promises, was received into fauor, and vpon whose example many others came in, which notwithstanding meant to stand out if occasion should serue. But no busier was Edward to keepe the Crowne on his head, then these Lords in France were resolute to strike it off: in midde of whose consultations behold how it happened.

(46) There came from England to Calis a damsell belonging (as she said) to the Duchesse of Clarence, who signified vnto Monsieur Fauvel that shee came from King Edward with a declaration of peace, which hee fearing to impart the conditions to other, had made her the instrument, the better to passe without any suspight, and hee glad to heare for the Earles sake (whom hee enieously affected) gave her his safe conduct vnto the Duke of Clarence then at Amboise; where having priuate access vnto him, shee told, that it was neither natural nor honourable for him to take part against the house of York; that that the house of Lancaster was not only by the whole Court of Parliament debarred to be the indubitate Heire of the Kingdome, but that K. Henry himselfe had discharged his Issue from claime, as it standeth (saide he) upon Record to be seene, contrary to which, as he might well perceive this marriage of Prince Edward with the Earles daughter, did openly aime and intend to the utter extinct of the house of York, whereof himselfe was one, and in neere possibillity of the Crowne, Edwards Issue young, and not many, and the King very wanton, a fine commonly punished with want of posterity, which if it so happened, then hee, or his were the next. These reasones wayed, so oter-wayed the Dukes further deligence, that hee promised thereafter a more brotherlike affection, as (saide hee) Edward should find, with which good newes hee returned into England, Warwick utterly ignorant what was said or done.

(47) All now in a readinesse for the returne, ships, money and men supplied by the French King, the Admirall of France was sent to secure them from the Duke of Burgundies Fleet, which with an extraordinary number and power lay in the mouth of Seyne to fight with Warwicke when he should loose out of Harboure: but fee how the heavens favoured, and frowned upon the parties, for the night before they should hoist saile, such a stormy tempest rooke the Dukes Fleete, lying more remote from the Lee, that they were scattered asunder, some into Zeeland, some into Denmarke, and many of them drowned. But the Seas calmed, and the wind serving faire, the English set saile and landed at Dartmouth, whence they had shipped into France almost six months before.

(48) King Edward relying upon Burgundy abroad, and thinking all friends who favoured at home, gave himselfe daily to follow the hound and the hawk, and nightly to his court pleasures in dancings and dalliances with damisels, little minding their approach that meant to marre his mirth; for Warwicke now landed, proclaimed King Henry, commanding all from sixteen to sixty, upon a great penalty to take Armes against Edward Duke of York, the most viribull usurper of Henries eightfull Crowne, and vcredible it was, to see the confluence of them which came armed to him, who ere-while applauded & approved none but King Edward. Thus making towards London, his company daily encreased, which the youthfull King seemed little to regard, but verily supposing hee had now Warwicke in his trapp, wrote to Burgundy to secure the sea, lest he should escape againe into France, and to his Lords of England, to attend him in his wars; but very many neglected his command, and few or none made their repaire. Which when Edward perceived hee was stricke into a great feare, and with his brother of Glocester, the L. Hastings his Chamberlaine, and the Lord Scaler the Queenes brother, hee halsted towards Nottingham thre to determine what was to be done.

(49) In the meane while the boldard Faulconbridge in the west, and the Earle of Pembroke in Wales, every where proclaimed King Henry, and to forward the matter, D. Goldard preaching at Pauls Crosse declared by reading of Billes, and divers other proofes, that King Henry was the vndoubted and true heire unto the English Crowne. Neither is the L. Monmouth now the man that he was, who having mustered six thousand in the name of King Edward, and brought them forward almost to Nottingham, on the sodaine drew backe his forces, alleading that Edward was vngracefull, & regardless of his friends as himselfe said, himselfe was the example, who having served him in many bloody battels, was rewarded with a verbal word Marqueße, without any maintenance at all, no not so much as Pyes poor need: & therefore hee had iust cause never to draw his sword in his quarrell any more, and them that did, hee affired them should receive the like tward in the end.

(50) These with the like dissallures, disuolged among the rude multitude, it was a world to see the face of this new World, for in every threecore Bonfires were made, in every Church bells rung, Diries were sung at every meeting, and every man cried K. Henry, King Henry, whole Engle likewise redoubled, & Warwicke, a Warwicke, and indeed all so applauded the passing now on foot, as King Edward hearing the rumor, thought it not safe any longer to stay, & therefore with thoe truly Lords and some others, hee fled from his host besides Nottingham, passing the Waltes towards Lyons with greater difficulties then was befitting a Prince to adventure; and thus without any order taken for his Realme, in two Halkes of Holland, and one English flappe deliberate of all necessary provisions, set layle toward Burgundy and in the way was encountered by the Easterlings, Englands great Enemies, having much adoe to cleare himselfe from their forcible.

(51) In these times of misery the Queene (whose marriage was the only cause of all these furies) upon the first of October had stolne out of the Tower, and taken Sanctuary at Westminster, where like a woman forsaken shee solitarily remained, and on the fourth of November following was delivered of a sonne, which without all pompe more like a private mans child then a Prince, was there also baptized by the name of Edward, who after his fathers death, a while was King of England, as shall be said; other Sanctuaries were full of King Edwards friends, that praised devoutly for his prosperous health, and well hoped the world would againe turne, as thoe they did. One King thus fled, and the other in prison, the Kentish, whose conditions are motable at the change of Princes, came to seekre prey in London, where they knew it was to be had: Ratcliffe, S. Katherine, and Southwark they robbed, and within the City did some hurt besides, yea and surely more had done, had not Earle Warwicke in good time come to the rescue which encreased his name, that was great enough before.

(52) Earle Warwicke accompanied with his brothe the Archbishops of York, the Prior of Saint Johns, the Duke of Clarence, the Earle of Shrewsburie, Bailard Faulconbridge, Lord Stanley, and other Gentlemen, some for love, some for feare, & some to gaze at this wauering world, upon the first of October entered the Tower of London, where in King Henry had beene retained prisoner almost the space of nine yeeres, and there againe elected him for their lawfull King, and forthwith conuined him robed in a long blew velvet gown through London vnto the Bishops pallace, where a pompous Court was kept untill the thirteenth of the same month, upon which day hee went in procession crowned to the Cathedral Church of S. Paul, the Earle of Warwicke bearing his traine, and the Earle of Oxford the sword, the people on every side crying, God save K. Henry.

(53) Thus farre proceeded, and Henry reestablished, a Parliament was begonne at Westminster the six & twentieth of November following, wherein King Edward was declared a Traitor to his country, an usurper of the Crowne, and all his goods confiscated; the like indgement passed against all his partakers wherein also it was enacted, that all such persons as had taken Armes in his quarrell, should bee severely punished, among whom, John Tiptoft Earle of Warwicke, and King Edwards Lieutenant in Ireland was attained, who being found hid in the toppe of a tree, in the Forrest of Wylsbryde, not farre from Huntington was brought to London, and upon Tower-hill beheaded. Moreover, all Statutes made by King Edward were clearly revoked, abrogated, and made frustrate: the Crowns of England and France entayled to King Henry, and the Heyres-male lawfully begot of his body, and for the went of such heires unto George Duke of Clarence, and his heire males lawfully produced, and the said Duke to be the next heire to his father Richard Duke of York, disabling his elder brother Edward, by the virtue of his Ateindot, & Isabel Earle of Pembroke, John Earle of Oxford with other attainted by the usurper Edward, to be restored in blood, dignities, and ancient possessions; and finally, Earle Warwick the good common-wealths man, made Governor of the Realm in these turbulent times, unto whom was allocated George Duke of Clarence his great Earle's sonne in Law, and Warwick brother Montacute upon his submission obtained his pardon, which was the callier gotten for his service at Nottingham.

(14) Queen Margaret appointed to follow into England, if fortune did favour these great Lords success, now hearing of the faire Sun-shine, wherein her husband King Henry was set, amidst the stormie winter blasts which the season afforded, with Prince Edward her sonne, he sailed from France, towards that wished and temperate climat, where the spring of new Regality beganne to bud forth, but was met with such tempests and storming seas, as they were forced to retaine and deferre their journey untill another time, to her great griefe and fore discoment. In like perplexity was the Burgundian Duke, who neither durst give Edward his outward assistance (the French and Warwick being so mighty opposites) nor leave him in distress, lest the sparkes of discontent should flie from the eyes of his faire wife, and therefore to know whether Flavelle the Governor of Calais stood resolute for him according to Covenants, he secretly wrote Philip Comens the hony-mouth Historian, to drop some of his sweet eloquence into his gold-shirring eare.

(15) Comens comming to Calais, and observing the sequence for which he was sent, saw every man wear the Earle of Warwick's badge, for no heart could bee gallant that was not adorned with his rugged steele, nor no dore frequented that was not painted with his white Croise. In somuch that Flavelle himselfe had a Jewell in his haire, wherein was a white rugged steele, embroidered with gold, and others his followers like wrought in filke, gold, and siluer; and to stamp the print deeper, a liking report was brought to the towne, that Warwick had prepared foure thousand valiant men to warre upon the frontiers of Burgundy. But Comens in conference so wrought with the Councell, and they againe with Earle Warwick as he was contented to leave off the enterprise, Duke Charles promising to side with K. Henry.

(16) King Edward hearing what his brother of Burgundy had done, and being dayly solicited from his friends in England, thought it no policy long to delay, lest Henry should take growth to a bigger steame; and therefore repairing to his brother in the towne of Saint Paul, required his aide, as the onely man on whom he relied, as well for the bond of alliance in the marriage of his sister, as also in regard of the orders which they both were, the King that of his which was the golden Fleece; and the Duke the Garter and Robe of Saint George. In the Court of Burgundy at that time lay Edward Duke of Somerset, colen-germaine cennosed unto Duke Charles, a great enemy against the house of York, and now set himselfe to thwart King Edward's suite, allcading, that it was more honourable for the Duke of Burgundy to side with the Lancastrians, from whom he was descended by his Grandmother the daughter of John of Gaunt: as also in the vpreightnes of King Henry's title, held good in her brother, and his Grandfather, and in her Nephew his father without all exceptions.

(17) The Duke perplexed betweene these great supplicants did then, as many doe now, speake much and meane nothing lesse, or else say little, & meane to doe much. To Somerset for Henry hee outwardly promised all helpe and assistance, but never gave the least, and to Edward no comfortable words of supply, and yet underneath he hired him Shippes, furnished him with munition, and lent him fifty thousand Florentines in money. And now the season serving for warre, K. Edward with two thousand strong besides his Mariners made over for England, attempting to take land in Norfolke, but those coasts guarded, hee waisted more Northward, and entering Humber, landed at Rauncivill in Yorkshire, when laying aside all claim to the Crowne, and pretending nothing but his Dutchie of York, he shewed the rude multitude the letters, and seale of the Earle of Northumberland, which as he affirmed, & made them beleve was sent for his safe conduct to enjoy the same, and in every place where he came proclaimed King Henry himselfe, wearing an Ethric feather, which was Prince Edward's Lincry, and passing to York in no other then a Subiect, his oath first taken to be true to King Henry, entered the City, which presently hee surprized and assumed to himselfe.

(18) Earle Warwick now hearing that Edward was landed before hee had marched very faine in the main, sent first charge to his brother the Marquisse Montacute then residing at Pensfret, with a sufficient Army to secure those parts; that hee should not suffer his access unto York, lest he grew more potent, then was to be wished; himselfe making ready with all possible speed, to repaire into those parts; but whether the Marquisse purposely winked, or else (and that rather) would not see at all, hee made no great hast to forsey his way to York, neither sought to emperch the passage: when Edward from thence marched in a more hostile manner towards Nottingham, taking his way not farre from Pensfret, and as it were through the midst of his enemies; which encouraged many to favour his designs, holding that Montacute was either a friend, or afraid to deale against so powerful an enemy.

(19) The White Rose thus bloomed, and the red falling his leafe, all took the time of this pleasant spring, and flocked to Edward as to their April Sun, who now more able, and therefore more bold made forward towards Leicester, where the Earles of Warwick and Oxford with a great power were, but because Clarence was absent, they let Edward hold on without any encounter, whose traine as hee passed was like to a river that in the running is ever increased with new springs, which Warwick perceiving, thought it more then time to give battell, well knowing that his brothers forbearance had given him that head. And to that end sent unto Clarence then about London in leuying of men, but hee somewhat too backward, and Warwick too forward, took into the City Country, meaning from thence to let on the enemy. But Edward whose heart had now past the darke threatening cloud, pitched his tent nere unto that City in a plaine field, and valiantly bad the Earle come to battell. But he then mistrusting (as in truth hee had cause) that the boldnes of Edward was backed by a Clarence, kept close within the walls, with a purpose to see how the world would goe.

(20) Edward loth to looke time about one Cities siege, raised his Campe, and haisted forward toward Warwick, unto which Towne likewise his brother Clarence, with some thousand strong was on march; these meeting upon a plaine, three miles from the Towne, set their Battels in Array, as if they meant to have fought, but the King, his brother Glovesier, Lord Biers, Malsins, and others, without any gard made towards Clarence, which when he beheld, himselfe accompanied with some of estate encountered his brother with a louing countenance and friendly cheare, so as no sparke of hatred was perceived betwix them, but with all brotherly affections entered into amitie and peace, which afterwards proved the confusion of the Duke. Clarence thus got fought

(61) This stout resolution made Edward more warie, and therefore to obtaine London, the only key that opened the dore to the Crowne, he halted thitherward, whose Citizens hearing of the increase of his host, and saying that Warwick was but a milke-sop to him, thought it most safely to faile with the surest winde, and therefore set open their Gates, and with publike applaud cried, King Edward. Which when the Duke of Somerset with others left to attend the innocent King Henry, heard, they fled for their liues; and left him in the Bishopps Palace at London, where his Competitor King Edward tooke him, and sent him againe prisoner to the Tower. With so many winds are the failies of their ships filled, which seeke the Port of their safety by the affections of the people; for euen the same day had Henry bene carried through the Citie (as it were) in triumph, and had heard the thunders of the Commons in euerie streete crying; God save King Henry.

(62) But Earle Warwick hearing how things went in London, and now fully conceiuing that the hazard of Battell must determine either with, or against him, being come to Saint Albons, fell into a deepe consideration what was to be done: His assistants were John Duke of Excester, the Earles of Oxford and Somerset, and Marquess Montacute his brother, whom notwithstanding he did not greatly trust, being alwaies too fauourable to the contrarie faction. Theſe in Counsell held it best pollicie to follow the Enemye, and before the bodies grew too great, to lop off the branches, least they should shadow their Sun-shine too farre. In which resolution, they halted forward and came vpon Barnet, with a full purpose to recover London: but Edward well knowing the flare of the City vnarm'd for siege, and ready to take flame of any impresse, ment not to be pent within thole weake wals; and therefore talking with him vnfortunate Henry, least any confederacy should be made in his absence, he marched with all possible hast, to encounter his opposites, before they came too farre, and vpon Gloucester nere vnto Barnet set downe his Tents close to the enemye, the cue of Christis resurrection, so caries in Mars of diuine celebrations, that the holiest feast is prophane, when his sword is drawne.

(63) The next day being the Paschall whereon Christ rose from death, which with due reuerence is celebrated in all the Christian world, these English contenders for a terrestrial Crowne, with itell all hearts and hands as brake, made ready to digge each others graves: for at break of day Warwick began to Marshall his Army, which he diuided into three battalions: The right wing was led by the Marquess his brother, with the Earle of Oxford, consulting chardy of horsemen, himselfe with the Duke of Excester led the left; and the maine battell was commanded by Edward Earle of Somerset, which was supplied for the most part with Archers. K. Edward likewise ordered his men. The forward was led by Richard Duke of Gloucester his brother, a good souldier and sufficient for aduise, the middle by himselfe, and his brother Clarence, having King Henry in their company: And the reuerend was commanded by the Lord Hastings, euer most firme for the hostle of Turke, reseruing a fresh supplie, when occasion should serue.

(64) The Battells ioined, were manfully maintained by the prowess of Oxford, vpon that part of the Kings, against which he fought, which with great violence he forced backe, so that many of them fled to London, bringing newes that with Warwick went the day: and surely in great forwardes it was, had not fortune thwarted it by an unexpected chance: for the day being foggy, and overcast with mists, hindred their eies of any farre sight, so as the flares embroiled vpon the Earle of Oxford mens Coates, were mistaken for the Sunne, which King Edwards men wore, in which error *Warwick*es Battell let flie at their owne fellows, who were in great forwardes to haue vponed the day, and they not knowing the cause of the error cried, treason, treason as all betraide. Whereupon the Earle of Oxford with eight hundred fled the field, leaving the chance to be cast for the Crowne; which when Warwick perceived with words like a souldier, he encouraged his men, and seeing the fresh supply of his enemye draw now vnto fight, he furiously rushed into the midst of their Battell, wherein he aduentured so farre as he could not be refused, but valiantly fighting was stracke downe, and among them slaine, hauing repaid his danger with many a wound. The Marquess Montacute made forward to second his brother, (who till then had bene the Mars and Malice King of England) but was so overlaid by his Opposites, that they sent his fellowe from his bodie whereby was ended that bloody daies task.

(65) In this Battell vpon King Edwards part, died the Lord Cromwell, the Lord Barnes, Ioune and heire to the Lord Sey, and Sir John Lisle Knight: In the quarrell of Henry died Richard Neill Earle of Warwick, and John Neill Marquess Montacute his brother, and vpon both sides of common souldiers saith Hall ten thousand, Stow fiftie four thousand, as Fabian saith lesse: all which were buried vpon the same Plaine; where afterwards a Chappell was built: the Duke of Excester being left for dead in the field, recovered, and tooke Sanctuary at Wymmsley. Edmund Duke of Somerset, and John Earle of Oxford escaped the field, and fled into Wales, where with Laffer Earle of Pembroke they still plotted to set vp King Henry, whom God and deliuiance would haue to be call downe.

(66) The same King Edward vpon the same day as an absolute Conquerour, led the vnfortunate Henry his Captiue to London, and entering the City in triumph wile, offered his roiall Standard in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul, whither the flaine bodies of Warwick and Montacute in two Coffins were brought, and lay there bare faced, and vnburied the space of three daies, least a false Brute should be made that they were not dead. After which they were conuayed to Bissham Abbey, and interred in that Priory among their Ancestors.

(67) Edwards Affaires thus farre prospered at London, the windes that had crooked Queene Margaret before, came fauourably about to fill her Sailes for England, & indeed to accomplish the decree, which heauen had appointed: mee with her Ioune Prince Edward and their French followers, landed vpon Eastre tye at Weymouth, and the Countesse of Warwick at Perisemouth, who hearing the sorrowfull newes of her husbands death, tooke Sanctuary within the Abbey of Beaulieu. And Queene Margaret understanding of the losse of Barnet field, withdrew aside to the Abbey of Conuay, vnto whom presently reſorted Edmund Duke of Somerset, with Lord John his brother, John Courtenay Earle of Deuonshire, Laffer Earle of Pembroke, John Lord West, and John Lang brother Prior of Saint John.

(68) These with many words of hope, comforted the sorrowfull Queene, and proſtred her their assistance assilance to erect Prince Edward her sonne, though it were done with the losse of their owne lues, requiring her only to vndertake the authority of the war, and themselves would vndergo the charge and burden thereof, by whose valor and power, they doubted not to daunt the pride of the usurping Edwards, who now held himselfe sure, and beganne to grow careless. To these their resolutions the warlike Queene most gladly consented, and gaue all encouragements vnto them like could; when falling in counsaile how to proceed, bet care (according to the naturall affection of a mother) was most vpon the safety and life of her sonne: and therefore a self for their owne parts (if fortune should faile in this their first attempt) as for the feare which the Turkiss would possesse (who whiles Prince Edward his corinall liard could not account the Diadem his Bride) shee thought it best to send him backe againe into France, till God had set the Crowne where it should stand: whence he might supply them with new forces, or at leastwise ouerawe Edward for tyrannizing too farre. But the Lords conerariwise alledgged, that Prince Edward being the morning Sunne of the Lancastrian hopes, and the rayes very splendent to most English eyes, was to be present in field himselfe, whose sight would both heat the courage of his owne Souldiers, and attract the glance of his aduersaries bearts, either to fight faintly, or else, and that rather, to come to his side. Thus their counsaile at that time preuailed, and thus resolved, every man departed to make ready his power, the Queene with her French repairing to Bath.

(69) But Edward in London had not sitetwo daies in rest, before hee heard of Queene Margaret's arriua, and the confluence of people out of Cornwall, Devonshire, and of the Westerne parts, which honourly flew to giue her assilance; wherefore committing to the Tower King Henry, and George Archbhoppe of Torke with a selected company, he marched to meet them, intending to cut off many springs before they should ioine to the body of a river, whose streame without danger could not be passed: therefore from Winchester, Abington, Chester, and Malmesbury hee proceeded; seeking and vying his enemies to battell: but the Queene and her forces fearing to abide in Bath, remoned to Bristol, Berkley, and Gloster, and lastly at Trinkeley, Duke Summerset her General pitched down his Tents not staying the coming of the Earle of Pembroke: his battell he marshalled into three fighes, whereof himselfe and his brother John Lord Summerset lead the foreward; the middle Battailion was commanded by Edward the young Prince, vnder the conduct of the Lords Saint Iohn and Wenlocke, and the Rereward gouerned by John Courtney Earle of Deuonshire, a mortall enemy against the house of Yorke.

(70) King Edward who was come now within sight of his enemies, diuided likewise his Army into 3. Battalions, committing the Foreward vnto the guidance of his brother Richard D. of Gloster a good Souldier, and of a deepe reach and policy: the Main hee vnderooke to gouerne himselfe; and the Rereward was commanded by the Lord Hastings his Chamberlaine. The field thus marshalled, and the signe of battell being giuen, a most bloody fight beganne, the King had planted his Ordinance at most advantage, which Gloster frankly belowned among the Dukes men, and they lodged betwixt ditches, bushes and hedges, with their showers of artowes galled Gloster's followers, so as by his command his battell gaue backe, as though they would shrinke, which Summerset no sooner perceived, but that he came on, and ouercome with courage, came out of his strength, when by a certaine passage before hand provided, he came vnto the place where King Edward was embattelled, thinking verily that Wenlocke had followed at his backe, who as it seemed meant nothing lesse.

(71) The advantage espied, Duke Richard made good his retreat, and with fresh supplies of two hundred speares so charged Summerset, as his battell was disorderd, and put to fearefull flight, himselfe recouering the Middleward, found there the L. Wenlock idle, whilst others were thus working for their lues, whom he most opprobriously reailed in the termes of a Traitor, & with his Battellaxe stroke his brains out of his head; when presently Gloster, and after him the King entered the Trench, wherein all of the Queenes part went to wracke; for there were slaine in this battell on her side John L. Summerset, John Courtney Earle of Deuonshire, the Lord Wenlocke in manners wee haue laid, Sir John Delour, Sir Edward Hapden, Sir Robert Whittingham, and Sir John Lewkenor, with three thousand others besides.

(72) Among them that fled, Prince Edward was one, whose Sir Richard Crofts apprehended before hee got to Trinkeley, but Edmund Duke of Summerset, John Langfrater, Prior of Saint Iohn, many Knights and Eliquiers tooke Sanctuary in the Abbey, and other places of the Towne, notwithstanding they were taken forth and arraigned before Richard Duke of Gloster, who that day fate Constable of England, where they were condemned and had iudgement of death, which they immediatlie suffered vpon a Scaffold set vp in the Town. With these two Lords died twelue worthy Knights, besides others of inferior degrees.

(73) Then was Proclamation made for the apprehension of Prince Edward, promising to his taker an annuie of an hundred pounds during his life, & if the Prince were liuing, his life to be spared, vpon which promises Sir Richard Crofts presented young Edward vnto the King, whom with a sterne countenance hee a while beheld, and as sternly demanded, how he durst so presumptuously with Banner displayed enter into his Realme; whereunto the Prince made this reply; to recouer (said he) my fathers Kingdomes and his most rightfull inheritaunce possessed by his Father and Grandfather, and from him immediatly belonging vnto me; how darst thou then which art his Subiect display thy colour against him thy Liege-Lord? which answer mooued King Edward to muches with his Gentle her dathed the Prince on his mouth, whom Richard Duke of Gloster with others of the Kings seruants most shamefully murdered, euen in his presence, and at his feete: whose body was buried without all solemnity among other poore and meane persons in the church of the Monastery of the Blacke-Fryers in Trinkeley.

(74) Queene Margaret in this fadall day of battell fled towards Worcester, and by the way tooke into a poore religious house in that her present distresse: but three dayes after shee was apprehended and brought vnto Worcester to King Edward, who committed her to iure and strait keeping, in which City she a while remained. But sodain news brought him, that the Northern men were in Armes, and meant to aduence for her liberty, the Conquerour marched to Cowmtrie, and there made preparation further to proceed: which when these hote spirits perfectly vnderstood, their courages grew colder, & their weapons cast away, they came thronging to Edward to offer him subiection; yet the Lancastrians were not so minded, but rather intended oner more to trie whether fortune would afford them her smile.

(75) A fitt instrument they had to forward the enterprise, namely Thomas Mordaunt bestard Fauconbridge sonne of Lord Fauconbridge Earle of Kent, a great supporter of King Edward's Crowne: howbeit this Ballard being a man of a turbulent spirit, and forward for adion, Earle Warwick had made him his Admirall to keepe the narrow seas, that none should haue way to strengthen King Edward, which his office he executed beyond his Commission, and became a taker of all Merchants goods, being aided with 300. Malecontents from Calles.

(76) His enterprise desperate, and his name growne fearful at sea, hee meant to make it so lesse on the land; for putting in at Dover, many misgoverned and loose persons daily drew to him, so as his power grew to bee threescore thousand strong: with these through Kent hee made his way towards London, meaning to doe much, the land so molested with intestine warres; and lodging his host on the Southside of London, commanded the Citizens to give him access, that with King Henry (whom hee meant to release from the Tower) he might passe through their streets, to meet and encounter the usurping Edward. But the Londoners knowing the rudeness of these Rakehels kept their gates shut and gained the time with sufficient strengthes: whence some Lords of the towvall blood therein residing, sent vnto Edward of their present danger, who presently sent them fiftene hundred of his best Souldiers, aliter whom in person hee warily marched, leading with him his prisoner Queene Margaret, whose boundes hee well knew, gaue him the full scope of liberty.

(77) Faenbridge in the meane while thirsting after spoile with his shippers secured the Thames at boue S. Katherine, purposing with his land Forces to passe the Riuer at Kingston: but hearing that Edward was on his March, and fearing to bee cut off from the benefite of his ships, hee altered his mind, when to open his way into London, hee caused the Bridge to bee fiered, and three thousand of his men being set ouer T. hamis by his ships, diuided themselves into two Companies, the one assaying to enter at Algate, and the other at Bishopgate, both which they likewise set on fire, so that the Citie was in three places fiered and assaulted at once, but with such euill successe to the assailants, that seven hundred were slaine, and the bold Ballard driuen to his ships.

(78) Vpon the twentieth of May the Conquerour Edward with his Capriue Queene Margaret entered London, and so into the Tower, the one in pomp commanding the place at his pleasure, the other in teares to remaine a most positiue prisoner, where her husband, the downcall King Henry was kept in hard durance. The place being thus charged with the presence of two Kings and their Queens, the Crokebacke of Gloucester intended to cleare by taking him away, that stood in his brothers way, whose succesor as it thought hee then meant to bee; and making his inward mind more deformed then were his outward lincamenes, without regard of blood-defiled hands, stabbed the most innocent Henry to the heart with his dagger, in which act at once beganne the ones happy rest, and the others foule guilt, which accompanied his conscience to the day of his death.

(79) The body of this murdered King was vpon the Ascension Eue laid in an open Coffin, and from the Tower guarded with many bills and glaues, was so caried through the streets vnto the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul, where it rested vncouered one day, and beganne to bleed againe afresh, a sorrowfull spectacle to most of the beholders, and thence was it carried to the Blacke-Fryers Church, where it likewise lay bare faced, and bled as before, all men being amazed at the sorrowfull sight, and lastly, it was put in a boat without Priest, Clerke, Torch or Taper, singing or laying, and was ferried vnto the Abbey of Chertsey in Surrey, & there without pompe entred. But afterwards King Henry the seueenth translated his body vnto his Castle of Windsor, where in a new Tombe at the entrance into the Chancell of the Chappell, and south dore of the Quier, it was princely bestowd, but since the Tombe is remoued, and where the Corps is now laid is not vulgarly knowne.

(80) This liued and thus dyed this innocent and iust King, who had beene proclaimed in his Cradle, crowned in his Infancy, and againe at more age had the Emperiall Diadem of France set on his head, li-

uing vprightly, louing his Subjects, and reigning thirty eight yeeres, was in that time tossed with variable successe, for twice hee was imprisoned, and deprived of his Crowne, betrayed, smitten, and wounded, and in all things became a worthy example of fortunes vnconstancy: hee was of stature very slender, of body slender, of face beautifull, and by a natural inclination abhorred all vice, farre from pride, giuen to prayer, well read in the Scriptures, vling works of Charity, and so chaste, as no suspicion of incontinency could be conceiued in him: nay, so farre to the contrary, that when certaine Ladies presented themselves before him in a maske, with their haire loose, and their breasts vncovered (hee then a Bachelor, and able of marriage) hee immediately rose vp and departed the presence, saying, fie, fie, forsooth yee are to blame. Oath hee vnd none, but in weighty matters, his affirmation was forsooth, and forsooth, very mercifull to the poore, and so pitifull to Malefactors, as he commanded the quarters of Traitors to be taken downe from the Gales, and buried, and so farre from reuenge, that hee willingly pardoned the greatch offences against him; for a Russian intending his death, wounded him in the side with his sword, what time he lay prisoner in the Tower, and being restored to his kingly estate, he freely forgave the fact; and another like Russian striking him on the face, hee punished with this onely reprehension, forsooth you are to blame to strike mee your anointed King: for these and his other paiter vertues, King Henry the 7. assayed to haue him canonized a Saint, but Pope Sixtus the 2. demanding too great a summe, the King went no further in the suite: notwithstanding in the repute of the vulgar hee was taken for no lesse, so as his red hat which had beene heald the head-ach, when it was put on, as the simple beleueed.

(81) The monument of his zeale to true piety, and care for posterities, are his famous Colleged of Eaton and Cambridge, the Chappell of which last, shewes the magnificence that the whole should haue bene of, had their Founder reigned to haue finished them himselfe: for the performance whereof hee enclosed certaine Bishops with other noble personages by his letters Patentes with lands and possessions, to the yeerely value of thirty foure hundred pounds very neere: but as his life ended, before that nature had thereto let her owne seale, so these remain vnperfected of the excellent beauties intended, which their zealous Founder meant to haue adorned them withall.

(82) And his sorrowfull Queene Margaret, who twentie sixe yeeres before this his death, with all pompe and royalty had bene crowned Queene of England, and had ruled all in all, now a poore Prisoner in distress and wants, wears out her time in teares and laments, and witheth for nothing more then the day of her death; which Duke Reiser her Father well vnderstanding, made suite to King Edward to haue her released by ranfome; and lastly, bought her liberty at so deare a rate, as hee first pawned, and afterward sold to Lewis the French King, the Kingdome of Naples, and of both the Sicilies to pay and repay the price of her redemption, vnto which poore father, this sorrowfull daughter returned, and ended her aged dayes, where shee had begun the dayes of her life.

(83) Victorious Edward thus leading Mars chained to his Chariot, and now himselfe led by Fortune to the high chaire of Estate, sits an absolute Monarch sure, and without opposit, vnto whose rayes all eyes turne a submissiue aspect: ouely bastard Faenbridge departed, from London (as we haue said) and withdrew vnto Sandwich with his disquiet crew, made shew to doe much, and did somewhat more then bragging, by rape, and tobbing, where cholerade Mariners came, which Edward hearing of, halted to Canterbury in person himselfe, fully resolved to weede vp by the rootes those new sponred blades of rebellion, and made great preparation to accomplish the same, which the Ballard hearing (though strong in his Sea-men) durst not bandy against, but sent his submission with protest of service and loyal obedience, and indeed so temporized with the king, as besides his pardon obtained, the sword of knighthood was laid upon his shoulder, & he was presently made the King's Vice-Admiral for the Seas. In which his office he bore himself (either by his own delinquency, or the King's Concoit) as he not long enjoyed the same, but was at Southampton beheaded, and other of King Henry's old favourites likewise fought after and daily endangered.

(54) In which times of fear, after Earle of Pembroke, with his Nephew young Henry Earle of Richmond, fled into Brittain, where, of that Duke they were most courteously entertained, with assurance made, that no wrong should be offered them, during their stay in his dominions. And so these two Earles the viceroy and nephew, there attended the day of their wished success.

(55) But John Earle of Oxford, who had withdrawn himself from Barnet field first into Wales, and thence into France, was far more unpardonable of those rough times, for having gotten store of provision by strong hand at Sea, with leasentive seven men only surprized Saint Michaels Mount in Cornwall, and made that peace good against the King, which he kept and maintained, but whether by force or favour King Edward much suspected, and therefore the more willingly came to a composition with his Subject, who upon the pardon of his life delivered the Mount to the King: and as some say the rather, for that his mind was then troubled with many ominous signs. For certain Borneas about this time built out of the Earth, as Pyre-ore at Market in the County of Bedford, whose name carried the quality of his nature. In Kent at Canterbury, Leitham, and Langley Parke, at Croyden in Surrey, and at Hangerhill near Dudley Castle one running verie fowle: all of them pediculous, as that credulous age beleaved, of great troubles to come: and therefore not trusting a new reconciled enemy, King Edward sent the said Earle Prisoner unto the Castle of Harfleur in Normandy, where he remained the space of twelve yeeres, unto the last of King Richard the 3. most securely guarded, and so straitly kept, as Lady Margaret his Countesse could not be suffered to have access unto him, in all that time. Neither was there allowed any coming out of his renews, or from the king, to maintain her estate, but was forced to live upon the Charity of others, & by the works that she made with her Needle: both of them very short to supply her great wants. This viceroy and almost viceroy was, was the more extremely followed, for that Oxford himself, his father and brother, had ever sided with the Lancastrians. And herself being sister unto Richard Duke of Warwick, the Capital obstacle against King Edward's proceedings, was held either dangerous, if her wealth balanced her birth and estate, or else unworthy of his favour, whose good fortunes as was suggested, she ever maligned.

(56) But much more miserable was the estate of Lord Henry Holland, Duke of Exeter, and Earle of Huntington, who flourished so long, as King Henry's pillar stood crowned on his base, and the Lancastrians (of whose house himself was) outward the times: he being the sonne of Lady Elizabeth the second daughter of John of Gaunt, and having married the sister of Edward the then reigning King, was notwithstanding driven to such want, as he may serve an example to all, how viceroy Adams sons are of any continuing greatness. For (saith Philip Comins) Lance saw the Duke of Exeter runne on fowle harts legged, after the Duke of Burgundies traitor, being his bread for Gods sake but he offered not his name, he being the necessity of the house of Lancaster, and brother in law unto King Edward, and being knowne what he was,

Burgundy gave him a small pension to maintain his estate.

(57) But when King Henry was againe restored, & the Title of the Crowne laid upon the success of Barnet field, this man Lord Henry bore himself most bravely against King Edward, and in fight was stricken downe, and left for dead, where, in his bleeding woundes he lay most part of the day, but yet recovering, and got to Westminster, he there took Sanctuary to save his life, for which, he became Suitor unto the king, but his wife Lady Anne sister unto King Edward, sued as earnestly for a divorce, which with great instancy she lastly obtained against him. How he released himself from the wrath of the king, is viceroy, and how he came by his death no man can tell, for his body was found cast upon the shore of Kent, as though he had perished by shipwracke upon the Sea.

(58) Now Edward to finish all factions, thought best to lop off both bough and branch, that gave any shadow to the Lancastrian delignes, to which end he farther picked, then found occasion of treason, to George Nevill Archbishop of York, whose goods, lands, and Lordships, he seized upon, got possession of his rich plate and Jewels, whereof one in his Mitre was of such value, as the King could it to be set in his Imperial Crowne, and the Archbishop to be sent over Sea to the Castle of Harfleur, where he remained a Prisoner a long time after, with no such courteous intreatments, as himself had viced to Edward when he was Prisoner.

(59) But the escape of Pembroke and Earle Richmond troubled the King not a little, the onely men now left to bandy against them, and therefore were most followed with a suspicious eye. In such case Edward promised the Duke of Brittain their recovery, with promises of heaps of gold to have them sent backe and delivered unto his hands: but the Duke that had given them his estate before, answered the English Ambassadors, that it stood not with honour, so to betray these distressed Princes, fled to him for relief, yet he faithfully undertook, that they should be so followed, as King Edward should sleepe quiet from their molestations, though he no better, Edward notwithstanding made the best of it.

(60) All now in quiet, and Edward draining without any Competitor, or malignant disturber, caused a high Court of Parliament to be assembled at Westminster, wherein he established those Acts, which Henry had abrogated, and abrogated those that were made against his favourites: at which session the Duke of Burgundie sent his Ambassadors unto Edward, craving his aide against the French King, which was the more willingly heard and granted, as well for his fathers recovery of the Duke, in time of his necessity, as for pleasure against Lewis, who had aided Warwick to dispossesse him of his Crowne. And indeed this was a spark, that was likely to set the hearts of the English on fire, to recover France lost by Henry the last King.

(61) All things in a readinesse King Edward repaired to Dover, and there embarked himself for Calis, with the greatest Army that ever from England set saile into France: for he had in his Company fifteen hundred Noble-men, and men at Armes, all of them mounred, and most of them barbed, who with the Archers on horsebacke also made up the number of fifteen thousand, besides a great number of footemen and others to pitch Tents to attend the Artillerie, and inclose their Campes. Before the Kings departure from England, he had sent Garter King at Armes unto King Lewis with a letter of defiance: who content demanded no less, then the whole Realme of France, which if he refused, bee threatened to invade his dominions with fire and sword.

(62) The letter received, and read in secret by Lewis himself, he privately sent for, and conferred with with the Herald, telling him that it was not Edward, but Burgundy that raked abroad these dying finders, who as a man discomfited & unfurnished for warre, would draw in the English, by his like dealings, to their inestimable Charges, to supply his defects; that Burgundy being of the house of Lanceaster hated most deadly the family of York, and more for feare then love married Edward's sister. As to touching the Countesse he told him, though Edward had married his Niece, yet hee would deceive him, as he had done his owne Master of France, who had heaped manie and extraordinary benefites vpon him. And lastly with the gift of three hundred Crownes, and the promise of a thousand more, he infligated the Herald to worke a peace. Garter very thankfull tooke the French gold, and counselled Lewis to send a Herald vnto his Master King Edward to demand a safe-conduct for conference: and so openly rewarded with thirtie Elles of Crimmon-velvet he departed.

Argentine hat (speech vnto K. Edward).

(93) King Lewis nothing so pompos as other Princes are, nor attended with Herald's consciously in his Court, was therefore enforced vnto this present shift: he caused a seruant of the Lord Hales to be arrayed like an herald in a trumpets banner, and sent him in hast into King Edward's Camp; where having audience, he shewed the great desire the King his Master had of peace, whole amity with England he had ever held, excusing his recent of Warwicke with the necessity of time, whom he aided not against Edward, but against Burgundy, who as he instantly alleged, had now drawne the English to this excessive charges, that he might thereby conclude a better composition for himselfe, and to amend the broken state of his owne affaires; lastly he desired that the King of England would grant a safe-conduct vnto the Ambassadors of the French King his Master, who should more fully informe his Maiestie, and giue his safe-conduct for a further conference in these affaires: and so wisely this counterfeit worded his message, that the King and Nobles liked well the overture, and thereupon granting a safe-conduct sent with him an English Herald, to receive the like and other assignements from the French King.

(94) But when the Duke of Burgundy vnderstood that a peace was trauesed betwixt Edward & Lewis, he stormed not a little, and with so small haile from Luttreburgh accompanied with sixteene horse only, came to his brother King Edward, and in a great rage reproofed him of breach of promise, and vncourteous requital of his former kindnes, that thus would enter amity with his great foe, and in outward semblance more ready to hie then to batle, burst into these reproofes.

"Have you f quoth hee) brother, passed the Seas, entered France, and without killing of a poore flie, or burning of a silly Sheepecocke taken a shamefull cruce? O *h*s, George I did Edward your noble Ancestor euer make Armie into France, and returned without battell or Conquest? That victorious Prince King Henry the fifth (as neere of kinne vnto you as me) whose blood you haue either rightfullie or wrongfullie (God knoweth) extinguished and destroyed, with a small puilliance conquered Normandy, kept it, and neuer would come to composition, till he had the whole kingdom of France offered him, and was made heire apparent vnto that Crowne. Contrariwise you without any thing done, proffer of battell, or giue of honor haue now condicqued vnto a peace as profitable for England as is a poore peafod: haue I (I thinke you) for my particular vfe drawne the English forces into France (which am able of my selfe to defend mine owne cause?) I tell you plainly no, but rather to aid you, to recover your ancient Territories wrongfullie withheld: and that you shall well knowe I need not your aide, I will heare of no truce with the French, till three moneths after your arrival in England at the least: And thereupon continuously arising, he threw downe the Chair, where he had late and offered to depart.

(95) Nay say brother Charles (quoth K. Edward) I with patience haue heard you speake what you would, you shall now perforce heare from me what you would not: First therefore for my thus entrance into France, no man knoweth the occasion better then you selfe for, mauger your owne great power you speake of: you doe remember I know, how the French King tooke from you the faire Towne Amiens, and the strong Pile Saint Quintin, with diners other places which you neither durst, nor were able either to refuse or defend, since which time he hath gotten from you, your best some friends and secret Counsellors, so as your selfe stood in doubt (determining to besiege Noyse) whether the losse would be greater in your absence (the French King waiting as a fox for his pray) or gaine more in Germany by your power and presence: and to keepe this wolfe from your fold, was the principall cause why you so earnestly praised me, and continually solicited me to passe over the Sea, promising mountains, but performing none a Mole-hill, bragging a supply both of horse and foote, but neuer lent me a boote, not a lackie. Thinke you (brother) if wee had entered this enterprise into our owne quarrell, we would haue expected your aide? I assure you nothing lesse, for if we had intended any such Conquest, we would with Souldiers fire and sword, haue so infected the aire with the flames and staine of France, as should haue annoyed your Countreys of Flanders and Brabant, and given you lesiure to sit still and tell of our euer achieved great victories, nothing doubting but to haue gotten and kept with like manhood, and in as great glorie, as any of our Ancestors before vs had done. But the occasion of warre being yours, and you wilfully (I will not say cowardly) neglecting the same, I meane not to prosecute, for the French King neuer offended me nor my Subiects, except in fauouring Warwicke against me, nay I may say against you, and now offerech such honorable overtures of peace, which I by Gods grace meane not to forsake, but will obferue and keepe. God fend you ioy thereof, quoth the Duke, and so abruptly departed from the King.

The conference for peace came downe.

Commissioners for peace.

Conditions of the peace.

Lewis his liberty tooke by the peace.

Ph. Com. lib. 4. p.

The Kings of England and France doe not see each others.

Preparing the meeting place of the King.

(96) The peace thus resolved vpon, betwixt the two kings of England and France, the place appointed for conference was neere vnto Amiens, and the parties assigned for the French, were the Ballard of Bourbon Admirall of France, the Lord S. Pierre, and the Bishop of Emure. For the English, were the Lord Howard, Sir Thomas St. Leger, and Doctor Morton Lord Chancelier of England. Their meeting, presently fell to a conclusion of peace: the conditions whereof were: That the French King should forthwith pay to the King of England twenty two thousand Crownes. That the Dauphin should marrye Lady Elizabeth, King Edward's eldest daughter, and that shee should haue for her maintenance the Duchy of Guienne, or else fifty thousand Crownes yearly to be paid in the Tower of London, for nine yeeres space. This peace was so acceptable to King Lewis, as he sent sixteene thousand Crownes to be distributed amongst the English Souldiers, with plate and great presents to men of any fort: & indeede gaue them such entertainment in Amiens as was most bounteous, whereof if any desire further to know, let him read Comines vpon the same text.
(97) To grafit which peace with a louing beginning, the two Kings were desirous to see each others, for which end Commissioners were sent to assigne the place: and lastly agreed, that the Towne Piquigny about three leagues from Amiens, seated in a bottom, through which the Riner Sonne ranne, was the fittest: ouer which a strong bridge was built, and in the midst thereof, a grate made ouer-thwart with barres, no wider asunder then a mans might well thrust thrust in his Arme, covered with boards over head to avoid the raine, & the bridge so broad that twelve might stand in a rancke on both sides.

(98) The day approached, and the two Kings come to the place, hee of France came first to the Gate, accompanied with twelve personages, as was the appointment; wherof John Duke of Bourbon and the Cardinal his brother were the chiefe: King Edward entering the bridge on the other end, with his brother the Duke of Clarence, the Earle of Northumberland, the Lord Hastings his Chamberlaine, and the Lord Chameller, himselfe apparelled all in cloth of gold, with a rich Jewell of precious stones, in forme of a Flower de Luce: advanced forward, and within five foote of the Gate, put off his cap, and bowed his knee within halfe a foote to the ground. King Lewis as readily doing his likely reverence unto Edward. Where, after embraces through the Gate, the Chancellour of England who was Prelate and Bishop of Ely, made an eloquent and learned Oration, which done, he read the Articles of peace and demanded the Kings whether they were done with their full contents. Which granted by both: either of them laying their one hand upon the Midfall, and the other upon the Holy-Crosse,ooke their solemne Oathes to observe the same. And then falling into a more familiar and Courtey Complementall conference, King Lewis told K. Edward that he would one day invite him to Paris, there to Court his faire French Ladies, with whom if hee committed any sinne, he merrily told him that Cardinal Bourbon, should be his Confessor, whose penance would be the easier, for that Bourbon vied to buffet faire Ladies himselfe; which no sooner was spoken, or howsoever meant, but Edward was as forward of thanks and acceptance, and indeed so ready, that King Lewis rounding Communes his boisme servant in his care, told him flatly he liked not Edward forwardnes to Paris, too many English Princes having beene there before: and thus the conference ended, and King Edward busines in France, hee returned into England, and into the City of London was received little lesse then in triumph-wile.

(99) But though Edward fortunes thus outwardly flourished, yet inward feares nipped his still troubled mind, one branch having lapped, whose growth hee much feared would shadow his Crowne, which was Henry Earle of Richmond alive and at liberty in the Duke of Brittaine Court. To having therefore his purpose to passe, hee sent D. Stillington and others, Ambassadors unto Francis Duke of Brittain, with store of gold and good words, as that hee meant to match his eldest daughter Lady Elizabeth unto the young Earle of Richmond, whereby all cause of dissensions might at once be cut off: the Duke thinking no danger where the water went smooth, easily consented to ship him theroon; but ere they were embarked, hee had knowledge that the voyage should cost young Henry his life; wherefore in all hast hee sent his Treasurer Peter Landais to prevent it, who secretly told Richmond what married Edward intended; wherat the distressed Earle amazed, was put to his shifts, and for want of better, tooke Sanctuary at S. Mathew, where the English his conductors lay for a wind.

(100) The Earle thus elapsed, the Ambassadors complained to the Duke, imputing the fault as far as they durst unto him, who had not deale like a good Marchant to take their money, and to retain the wares; his answer was, the delivery was good, but themselves negligent Factors, that made not the commodity to their best advantage. And yet for the love hee bare to their King, hee undertooke that Richmond should be sure kept either in Sanctuary, or else in prison, whence as hee promised hee should not escape: And so with a flea in their care, they returned, having cleared Edward of his money, and care for sure keeping of Henry, who though hee were sore displeased with Stillingtons simplicity: yet the promise that the Duke of Brittain had made, much mitigated and calmed his mind.

(101) And now the Realme quiet, no warre in hand, nor none towards (but such as no man looked should happen;) hee framed himselfe so to the peoples affections, and held their hearts not in a contrainted feare, but with as loving and ready obedience as any King attaining the Crowne by his sword ever had. Nor was ever any Prince more familiar with his Subjects then this King Edward was, who now having his tribute truly paid from France, and all things prospering as was desired, hee set heart upon pleasure, which hitherto had bene afflicted with continuall tumulte: yea and often laid from him the state of a Prince, and would accompany and converse with his meane subjects: a loose-lone that doth naturally attraet the English hearts; among many others we of London remember this to our grace. Unto Windsore hee sent for the Lord Mayor of London, the Aldermen and others, upon no other occasion, then to hunt in his company and himselfe to be merry with them: As also at another time hee did the like in Waltham, where hee gave them most familiar intertainment, and sent to the Lady Mairreffe and her sisters two harts, sixe Buckes, and a Tonne of wine, which wanne more love then manifold their worthes.

(102) Somewhat hee was given to Court and converse with faire Ladies, which fault was well noted and prevented by King Lewis, for his French dames: but in England hee had liberty with very large scope, for besides the Lady Lacy and others, y whose hee had issue, three concubines hee kept, and those of three diuers, and severall dispositions, as himselfe would often confesse, one the merriest, another the wildest, and the third the holiest harlot in his realme, as one whom no man could get out of the Church valesse it were to his Bed, the merriest was Shores wife, of whom hereafter we shall speake, the other two were greater Personages, but in their humility are content to bee namelesse, and to forebare the praise of those persones.

(103) This fault of the King did not greatly offend the people: for one mans pleasure could not extend to the displeasures of manie, it being done without violence, and in his latter daies lessened and w^{as} left. But a farre more greater sinne and reproach hee fell into, among his other Princely dispositions: For being on progresse in Warwickshire, and hunting in Arrow Parke, belonging to Thomas Penderel Esquire, with the death of much Game hee slew a White Bucke greatly esteemed of the said Burdet, who understanding thereof, with his horses in his Belly, that moored the King to kill the same Bucke, wherof hee was accused and condemned of treason, his wordes being drawne, to with the horses in the Kings bellie: for which beheaded hee was at Ti-borne, and buried in the Grey-Friers Church at London.

(104) But a more lamentable tragedie happened unto the land, by the death of George Duke of Clarence the Kings second brother, who being accused of high Treason, was committed to the Tower, where hee loone after ended his life. His attainer was, that the said Duke had caused dierce of his servants to enslave the people, that Thomas Burdet his servant likewise, was wrongfully put to death: and further laboured (through their reports) to make the world believe, that K. Edward wrought by Nigromancie, and vied to poison such subjects as he hated: And also that the said Duke upon purpose to exalt himselfe and his heires to the Regall dignitie, most falsly and vntroily published that the King was a Bastard, and therefore not capable of raigne. Moreover that hee induced dierce of the Kings naturall subjects to be sworn upon the blessed Sacrament, unto him and his heires, without any other restrictions of their allegiance: for which intent (as there was alleged) leaged) hee had gotten an exemplification vnder the great Seale of King Henry the first, that if the said king and his sonne Prince Edward died without issue male, the said Duke and his heires should inioy the Crowne: For these in Parliament begun at 1788. minister the fifteenth of January he was attained of high treason: but whether guiltie or guiltles, to men (saith Grafton) that have made large inquisition, yea and of such as were of so small authority in those daies, the certaintie thereof was had, and could not truly be disclosed, but by conjectures, which as often decease the imaginations of fantasiefull folke, so declare trauels to them in their conclusions.

(105) I am not ignorant that some haue alleged the cause of this Noble mans death to arise from a foolish prophesie; whereof (saith Comines) the Englishmen are neuer conuincid, & this is the Cobdyle, who vied to make an art of their letters, gaue forth forsooth that a Q. should raigne after an E. which must needs be George Duke of Clarence, though Gloucester more trauisly lay in winde for the game. This indeede troubled the King not a litle, but the Queene and her blood much more, and therefore of both King and Queene Duke George was mistrusted, and greatly malignid in all that he did. Who now a widower (for Warwickes daughter was dead) sent vnto his sister Margaret the Duchesse of Burgundie, to worke a marriage for him with her husbands daughter the Lady Marie. Against which the Queene most earnestly interposed her selfe, and foliowed the Ladie in the behaile of Lord Anthonie Earle Rivers her brother, whereby great discontent was ministred to the Duke, and new scabioses daily beed in the Kings breast.

(106) John Serres the French Histogrian interlacing the life of King Lewis with the Acts of K. Edward and his brethren, saith confidently, that the English King so much affected the league and alliance with France, as that he caused his brother Clarence to be put in prison, because he intended to haue past the Seas to succore the Dowager of Burgundie Ladie Margaret his sister, vpon whole Territories King Lewis encroached, after the death of Duke Charles her husband slaine at the battell of Marne.

(107) But howeouer Clarence had offended, certaine it is, that he was found guilty by the foresaid Parliament, and the cleuening of March following, after he had offered his Maffe-penny in the Tower of London, was drowned in a But of Almsbury, whose bodie was buried at Tewkesburie in Gloucestershire, by the bodie of his Duchesse Ladie Isabel Countesse of Warwick, who being with Child, died of poison a litle before. And although the King had consented to his death, yet so sooner was it done, but that he wished it againe vndone, and was so grieved at the remembrance, as when anie made suie for the life of a condemned, he would openly say: Oh unfortunate brother for whose life no man would make suie. This good Duke (for so he was he called) left aife behind him, Edward Earle of Warwick and Margaret afterwards Countesse of Salisbury, both of them infants, and followers of their fathers fortunes: he a continual Prisoner, at foure and twentie yeeres of age vnder Henry the French, was beheaded vpon the Tower-hill; and there at fixtie two, lost hers within the Tower, and time of King Henrie, the eight.

(108) But how dainty soener King Edward was of the breach of amitie, betwix him and the French King, in regard whereof he suffered Mary the young Duchesse of Burgundie the daughter of his owne sisters husband to be molested by intrusion of the French, and all in fauour of the contract commenced betweene the Dauphin & Lady Elizabeth his daughter, yet did Lewis for his part but dailie and drie out time: For Ambassadors imploied for the full accomplishing thereof, they of France came either without commission, or thole recalled, the new were sent without instructions, while indeed Lewis was working for his sonne another way: I will to match him with Mary Dauchesse of Burgundy, but that refused, with Margaret of Flanders daughter to Duke Maximilian sonne to Fredericke the Emperour: and to hold the world from suspition, in the meane while Ladie Elizabeth the Infanta of England was in the French Court vinnally called Madame the Dauphin, and all things in France so soundly carried, as Edward suspected no leake in the Caske: for now growne fat and vnable for paines, he both gloried in his nine famous victories at home archieued, and seemed fustillie satisfied, that his yeerly tribute from France was so truly paid.

(109) At the same time James the third of that name King of Scotland, sent his Ambassadors vnto Edward to obtaine the Lady Cecile the Kings second daughter to be ioined in marriage with his sonne James the young Prince, which was well liked vnto, by Edward and his Council, and least the motion should goe backe, a great summe of money lent to the Scottish King with this condition, that at a certaine time appointed, it should be at K. Edwards choise, whether his daughter should match with that Prince, or else to haue the said summe againe repaid. Against which alliance and league (as Lely reporteth) Lewis of France much repined, and to annihilate the same sent Dr. Ireland, a certaine knight, and another religious man, to moue King James to make warre against England.

(110) Off hele no Peace-makers for Christ, but fire-brands of belial, blew the mothered sparkes of dissension into a flame of bloody warre, which fell the more heauy vpon Scotland, for that K. James much wedded vnto his owne will, and altogethet ruled by men of meane worth, who him selfe had aduanced from nothing, had not only neglected by their inligations the loue of this Nobles, but also banished the Realme of Scotland, Alexander Duke of Albany his second brother; and had caused the veins of John Earle of Marre his other brother, to be opened, whereby he hied to death: these and other discontentes alienated his Subjects hearts from him, which had the land more open vnto the English Insaunders; and yet to draw them more deadly against him, relying vpon his owne valour, and the assistance of France, he sent word vnto Edward, that he should not aid his owne sister of Burgundy against K. Lewis, being the Scots Allies also with threats of warre commanded him to deliuer to his Ambassadors, the Duke of Albanie (then residing in the English Court) and laillie to make good and repay dammages done vpon the Scottish Borders.

(111) King Edward not a litle incensed at these double dealings, even in the winter season mustered his men, prepared his artillery, and rigged his ships, that nothing should be vncare at the next Spring; which no sooner was come, but that he ordained for his Lieutenant his brother Richard Duke of Gloucester, who with Henrie Earle of Northumberland, Thomas Lord Stanley, the Lord Lovell, Greylock and others, (the Duke of Albany marching vnto Gloucesters banner) with twenty thousand strong repaired into the North: and first besieged the strong Towne Berwick, then entering the chiefe City Edinburgh, vrged K. James to performe his covenants, concerning the marriage betwixt Prince James his sonne, with Lady Cecily before agreed vpon, threatening delation if the match went not forward. The Scottish Nobility considering the eminent danger, put to death the wicked Counsellors of their King, ordained the Duke of Albany the Viscount of Scotland, and promised to repay the money recited according to Covenants; after which with the deliuey of the strong Towne Berwick, which had bene out of the English possession the space of one and twentie yeers, a generall peace was concluded betwix the two Realmes. Whereupon not long after, Garter King at armes was sent into Scotland, with an Instrument in writing vnto the Provoost and Burgeses of Edinburgh, burgh (who had undertaken to disburse the money) to lignifie King Edwards minde touching the marriage intended, and to demand the said somme by a day assigned, which accordingly was repaide.

(111.) The marriage with Scotland thus broken off, for the Lady Cleve, by K. Edward himselfe; that with France for the Princess Edwards, both he and his Queene greatly desired, and daily fought after. But Lewis the French King, finding the daughter of Austria more fit for his sonne, dallied out Edward with shewes of firme faith, till he had effected the thing he went about: what musick founded so harshly in the English Kings eare, as in no wise hee would suffer that string to be touched, but ever belewed that the French meant him faire play, and although the yeeres of the parties themselves might beget some insipition, these being much elder then the Dauphin, and the truth thereof confirmed by the Duke of Austrias Legat-Ambassadors residing in England, yet Edward would not so much as suppose a suspect against the French King, and therefore suffered Lewis to inroach vpon those parts of Picardie that ioyned to Calis, and to gaine time till it was past recall: for then the Lord Howard returning from France, confidently told him that hee was present, and saw the Lady Margaret of Austria, daughter to Duke Maximilian, sonne to the Emperour Fredericke, received vnto France with great pompe & royaltie: and at Ambois contracted and espoused to the Dauphin.

(112.) Edward mightily chafed to be thus abused by Lewis, made great preparation for France, but whether with anger, griefe, or melancholy, hee fell into a dangerous and deadly sickness; some say, of a superfluous surfeit, whereunto he was much given: Communes faith, of a Calerrie, which weak estate turned his minde another way: for calling his Lords into his sickle presence, and raising his faint body vpon his Bed-Pillows, these words vnto them hee lastly spake:

"(114.) My Lords, my deare Kinsmen, & Allies; in what plight I lie, you see, and I feele; by which the lesse while I looke to lue with you, the more deeply am I moued to cate in what case I leaue you; for such as I leaue you, such bee my children like to finde you. Which if they should (that God forbid) finde you at variance, might hap to fall themselves at warre, ere their discretion would graue to set you at peace. Yee see their youth, of which I reckon the only surety to rest in your concord. For it sufficeth not that all you loue them, if each of you hate other. If they were men, your faithfulness hath would suffice: but childhood must be maintained by mens authoritie, and slippery youth vnderpropped with elder counsell, which neither they can haue, vellese you giue it, nor you giue it, if you agree not. For where each laboureth to breake that which the other maketh, and through hatred of each others persoo impugneth each others counsell, there must it needs be long, or any good conclusion goe forward: And while cyther party striueth to bee chiefe, flatterie shall haue more play then plainesse, and faithfull aduise, of which much needs is the euill bringing vp of the Prince, whose minde in tender youth infected, shall readily fall to riot and mischief, and draw downe with him his noble Realme vnto ruine: but if grace turne him to wisdom: which if God send, then they that by euill meanes before pleased him best, shall after fall furthest out of fauour, so that euill at length euill dris draw to nought, and good plain wayes prosper. Great variance hath there long time bene betweene you, not alwayes for great causes. Sometime a thing right well intended, our misconstruptions turneth vnto worke, or a small displeasure done vs, either our owo affections or euill tongues agreeth. But this wot I well, ye neuer had so great cause of hatred, as you haue of loue. That we

"be all men, that wee be Christian men, this shall I leaue for Preachers to tell you (and yet I wot nere whether any Preachers words ought more to moue you, then his, that is by and by, going to the place that they all preach of.) But this I shall desire you to remember, that the one part of you is of my blood, the other of my Allies; and each of you with other, either of kindred or affinity, which spiritual kindred of affinity, if the Sacraments of Christs Church beare that weight with vs, that would to God they did, should no lesse moue vs to charitie, then the respect of fleshly consanguinitie. Our Lord forbid, that you loue together the worse for the selfe cause, that you ought to loue the better. And yet that happeneth, and no where finde we so deadly debate, as among them, which by nature and law ought most to agree together. Such a pestilent serpent is ambition, and desire of vaine glory and foueraintie, which among states where it once crotcheth, creepeth forth so fast, till with dissension and variance hee turneth all to mischief, first longing to be next the best, afterward equall with the best, and at last chiefe and above the best. Of which immoderate appetite of worship, and thereby of debate and dissention, what losse, what sorrow, what trouble, hath within these few yeeres growne in this Realme, I pray God as well forget as we remember. Which things, if I could aduise haue foreseen, as I haue with my more paine then pleasure proceed, By Gods blessed Lady (that was euer his oath) I would neuer haue won the curse of men, knees, with the losse of so many heads. But sith things passed cannot be graue-called, much ought we the more beware, by what occasion wee haue taken to great hurt afore, that wee sit bones fall not into the like againe. Now be those griefes passed, and all is (God bee thanked) quiet, and likely right well to prosper in wealthful peace vnder your Cousins, my children, if God send them life, and you loue. Of which two things the lesse losse were they, by whom though God did his pleasure, yet should the Realme alway finde Kings, and peradventure as good Kings. But if you among your selues in a childes raigne fall at debate, many a good man shall perishe, and happily he too, and yet together this Land finde peace againe. Wherefore in these last words that euer I looke to speake with you, I exhort, and require you al, for the loue that you haue euer borne vnto me; for the loue that I haue euer borne vnto you, for the loue that our Lord beareth to vs all, from this time forward all griefes forgotten, each of you loue others, which I verily trust you will, if you any thing regard, either God, or your King, affinitie or kindred, this Realme, or your owne cuntry, or your owne surety.

(115.) And therewithall the King no longer indoring to sit vp, layd him downe on his right side, his face towards them, who with weeping eyes & words as fiered time, recomfired the sick dying King, ioyning their hands, and outwardly forging that, which inwardly they meant not to forget. The King ouer-joyed to see their willing reconcilments spake not many wordes after, but commending his soule vnto God, in their presence departed this life at his Palace of Westminster, vpon the 9. day of April, and yeere of Christs appearance 1451. at the age of forty one, when he had wore the royal Diademe, two and twenty yeeres, one moneth and five dayes; and was buried at Windsor, in the newe Chappell, whose foundation himselfe hee layd.

(116.) Of personage hee was the goodliest Gentleman (saith Communes) that euer mine eyes beheld; faire of complexion, and of most princely presence; courageous of heart, politick in counsell, in aduersitie nothing abashed, in prosperitie rather ioyous then proud: in peace iust and mercifull; in warre sharpe and fierce, and in field bold and venturous: yet no further then wisdom would, and is no lesse com mended

His Wife.

(117) Elizabeth the daughter of Richard Woodvill Earle Rivers by his wife Isabel Dutcheffe of Bedford, who was the daughter of Peter Earle of S. Paul, and he the sonne of Peter de Lucembourg, was first married unto Sir John Grey Blaine at S. Albans, where he was knighted the day before his death by King Henry the sixth, unto whom they bare two sonnes and a daughter, after whose death shee was privately remarried unto K. Edward the fourth, the first day of May, at his manner of Grafston in Northamptonshire Anno 1464, and in the next yeere following upon the sixte and twentieth of May, was crowned Queen at Westminster with all due solemnities. Shee was his wife eightene yeeres, eleven moneths, and nine daies, no more fortunate in attaining to the height of all worldly dignitie, then vnsfortunate in the murder of her sonnes, and losse of her owne liberty: For in the beginning of K. Edwards raigne, shee was forced to take Sanctuary at Westminster, wherein her first sonne Prince Edward was borne, and at his death did shee like in feare of the Protector, and lastly having all her lands and possessions seized upon by K. Henry the seventh, lived in meane estate in the Monastery of Bermondsey in Southwarke, where not long after shee left the troubles of her life, and enjoyed a quiet portion or burying place by her last husband King Edward at Windsore.

(118) Blanche Butler, as we find is recorded upon the Parliament Rolle, was contracted unto King Edward: but how true considering the occasion, and time of the Act, we leave for others to judge, onely this is most certain that this Lady Blanche was the daughter of John Talbot Earle of Sherburne, and the wife of Sir Thomas Butler Knight, sonne and heire to Ralph Butler Barone of Sedley, which Blanche died the thirtieth of June the yeere of Christ Iesus 1466, and the eight of King Edward the fourth his raigne.

His Issue.

(118) Edward the eldest sonne of K. Edward the fourth by Queene Elizabeth his wife, was borne in the Sanctuary at Westminster the fourth of November, and yeere of grace 1471, being the tenth of his fathers raigne, at that time expelled the Realme by the powerfull Earle Warwicke: but fortune changed, and the father restored; the sonne, the first of Iuly and yeere of Christ was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall and Earle of Chesler; and had not the ambitious hand of his vncle bene defiled in his innocent blood, he might have borne the Diademe manie yeeres, whereas he bare the Title of King not many daies.

(119) Richard the second sonne of K. Edward the fourth by Elizabeth his Queen, was borne at Sherburne, and in his infancy was created Duke of York, he was affianced unto Anne daughter and heire to John Marquis Duke of Norfolke, by which he was intitled Duke of Norfolke, Earle of Marshall, Warren, and Notts; but, being neither Title, wife, or his owne life long, was with his brother murdered in the Tower of London, and in the prison of that Tower, which upon that most sinfull deed is ever since called the bloody Tower, their bodies as yet unknowne where to have buriall.

(120) George the third sonne of K. Edward the fourth by Queene Elizabeth his wife, was also borne in Sherburne, and being a young Child was created Duke of Bedford, but lived not long after, and lieth buried at Windsore.

(121) Elizabeth the fifth daughter of K. Edward the fourth, by Elizabeth his Queen, was borne at Westminster the eleventh of February, and fifth of her fathers raigne, being the yeere of Salvation 1466. Shee was promised in marriage to Charles Dauphin of France, wooed and Courted by her vncle Cromwell, when he had murdered her brothers, and usurped the Crowne, but better desire attending her, shee was referred to joine the union and marriage with the onely heire of Lancaster, which was Henry of Richmond, afterward King of England, from whom is branched the roiall stemme that spreadeth his beauty in this North-West world, even James our dread Sovereigne, and great Brittaines Monarch.

(122) Cecily, the second daughter of K. Edward the fourth by Queene Elizabeth his wife, was fought unto, by James the third of that name, to be joined in marriage with James his sonne Prince of Scotland, and Duke of Rothsay, which match was promised upon conditions and choise of K. Edward, who lastly brake off from further proceeding, and the Lady married unto John Viscount Wels, whom shee outlived, and was againe remarried, but by neither husband had any issue, and therefore lesse noted; her body lieth buried at S. Maries in the Isle of Wight.

(123) Anne the third daughter of K. Edward the fourth, by Queene Elizabeth his wife, was married unto Lord Thomas Howard, Duke of Norfolke, Earle of Marshall, and high Treasurer of England; unto whom shee bare two sonnes both dying without issue, and her selfe without more fruit of wombe, left her life, and lieth buried at Stratfordham in Norfolke.

(124) Bridget the fourth daughter of K. Edward the fourth by his wife Queene Elizabeth, was borne at Utham in Kent, the tenth of November, and yeere of Grace 1480, being the twentieth of her fathers Raigne. Shee took the habite of Religion, and became a Nun in the Nunnery of Dorford, in the same County, founded by K. Edward the third, where shee spent her life in contemplations unto the day of her death.

(125) Margaret the fifth daughter of K. Edward the fourth by Queene Elizabeth his wife, was promised in marriage unto the King of Denmarke, but died (before it could be solemnized) in the Tower of Greenwich, the Sunday before Pentecost the twentieth two of her fathers raigne, and yeere of Grace 1482, and was buried at Windsore.

(126) Margaret the sixth daughter of K. Edward the fourth, by his wife Queene Elizabeth, died an Infante without other mention in our Authors.

(127) Katherine the seventh daughter of King Edward the fourth, by Queene Elizabeth his wife, and the last of them both, was married unto William Countrey Earle of Devonshire, and Lord of Orchampton, unto whom shee bare Lord Henry; after the death of his father Earle of Devonshire, who by King Henry the eighth was created Marquess of Exeter in Anno 1525.

His Concubines.

(128) Elizabeth Lucie, is certainly known to have been King Edwards Concubine, though nothing so certainly mentioned, whose Ladie, or of what Parage shee was; that shee was conceived by him with child is before declared, but who that child was, is as obscurely laid downe, therefore in these things we must be silent, and leave the doubts to be resolved by others. Three other concubines this king had, whereof Shores wife was not the least beloved, whose life falleth further to be spoken of in the Raigne of the usurper Richard, where her storie shall be shewed more at large.

His naturall Issue.

(150) Arthur, surnamed Plantagenet, the naturall sonne of K. Edward the fourth, (whose mother as is supposed, was the Lady Elizabeth Lucie) was created Viscount Lisle by King Henry the eight at Bridewell in London, the twentieth sixth of April, and yeere of Salvation 1533. which title was conferred vpon him in right of his wife Lady Elizabeth, sister and heire vnto John Gray Viscount Lisle, and the late wife and then widdow of Edmond Dudley; who bare vnto this Viscount three daughters, which were Bridget, Frances, and Elizabeth, all of them afterward married. This Arthur Lord Lisle was made Lieutenant of Calis by the said K. Henry, which Towne some of his seruants intended to haue betraied to the French, for which their fast him selfe was sent to the Tower of London; but his truch appearing after much search, the King sent him a rich ring from his owne finger, with such comfortable wordes, as at the hearing thereof a sudden ioy ouercharged his heart, & was so immoderately reueiled, that the same night it made an end of his life, whose body was honorably buried in the same Tower.

(151) Elizabeth the naturall daughter of K. Edward the fourth, was married to Sir Thomas Lumley Knight, the sonne of George, Lord Lumley, who died before his father: shee bare vnto the said Sir Thomas, Richard, afterward Lord Lumley, from whom the late Lord Lumley did descend.

EDWARD THE FIFTH. KING OF ENGLAND AND FRANCE, AND LORD OF IRELAND, THE FIFTIE FIFTH MO- NARCH OF THIS LAND, HIS RAIGNE, AND DEATH.

For the most part written by Sir Thomas Moore.

CHAPTER XVII II.

He father thus dying in the strength of his yeeres, and the sonne left to rule before he was ripe, the Synners of dissensions which the sicke King had lately raked vp, presently brake forth into a more raging flame; for the king and Queenes blood that should haue supported young Edwards estate, the one side being suspicious, and the other prouoked by the execrable desire of soveraignty, left the tender king (a Prince of such towardnes as his age could conteine) destitute and vnarmed, which if either kind or kindred had holden place, must needes haue bene the surest pillars of his defence. The raigne of this King (if we may so call the short time of his Soueraignty) began the same day that his father died, though he was neuer Crowned, nor yet commended the affaires of the Kingdome as an absolute Monarch, his young brothers fortunes being ballanced with his.

(2) For Richard Duke of Gloucester, by nature their vncle, by office their Protector, to their Father beholden, to themselves by Oath and Allegiance bounden, all bands broken that holdeth man and man together, without any respect of God or the World, vnaturally contrined to bereave them, not onlie of their dignaty, but also their liues. But forso-much as the Dukes demeanour minitred in effect all the whole matter whereof the raigne of this young and soft Edward must intreat, it is therefore consentient, somewhat to shew you etc we goe further, what man this was, and from whom he defended that could find in his heart so much mischief to conceive.

(3) Know first then that Richard Duke of York, a noble man and a mighty, beganne not by warre, but by law to challenge the Crowne; putting his claime into the Parliament; where his cause was (either for right or favour) so farre forth advanced that King Henrie bloud (albeit he had a goodly Prince) was verily relected, the Crowne by the authoritie of that high Court intailed to the Duke of York, and his issue male in remainder, immediately after the death of King Henrie. But the Duke not induring so long to carrie, intending vnder pretext of disfection and debate arising in the Realme, to prevent his time, and to take vpon him the rule in King Henrie's life, was with many other Nobles laine at Wakefield, leauing three sonnes, Edward, George, and Richard; all of them as they were great issues of birth, so were they great and flatly of stomacke, greedy and ambitious of authority and impatient of partners.

(4) For Edward reuenging his fathers death deigned King Henrie, and attained the Crowne; The second, George Duke of Clarence, was a goodly Noble Prince, and in all things fortunate, if either his owne ambition had not set him against his brother, or the enie of his enemies, his brother against him. For were it by the Queen and Lords of her blood which highly maligned the Kings kindred (as women commonly, not of malice but of nature hate them whom their husbands loue) or were it a proud appetite of the Duke himselfe, intending to be King: at least wife hainous treason was laid to his charge, and finally were he faulty, were he faultlesse, attained he was by Parliament, and iudged to death, as we haue said.

(5) Richard the third founte, of whom we now entreat was in wit and courage equal with either of them, in body and prowesse farre vnder them both, little of stature, ill limmed, and crook-backed, his left shoulder much higher then his right, very hard fauoured of visage, and such as in States is called warly, in other men otherwise: he was malicious, wrathfull, and enuious, yes and from a fore his birth cuer forward. For it is for truth reported, that the Dutchesse his mother had so much adoe in her traualle, that shee could not be deliuered of him vnscut, and that he came into the world with his feet forward, as men be borne onward, and (as the faine runner) also not vntoothed; Whether men of hardred report about the truth, or else that nature changed her Courte in his beginning, which in the course of his life many things vnusually committed.

(6) No euill Captaine was in the warre, as to which his disposition was more inclined then for peace; sundry victories he had, and sometimes overthrowes, but neuer in default as for his owne person, either of hardines, or politike order; free was he of his dispende, and somewhat about his power liberal: with large gifts he gave him vniuersall friendship, for which he was forced to pill and pole in other places, which gave him steadfast hatred. He was close and leet, a deepe dissembler, lowly of countenance, arrogant of heart, outwardly familiar, where even now he hated, and not letting to kisse whom he thought to kill; despitefull and cruel, he was not for euill-will alwaies, but oftner for ambition, and either for the surety, or increase of his estate. Friend and foe was much what indifferent; where his advantage grew, he spared no mans death, whose life withstood his purpose. He slew with his own hands, King Henrie the sixth, being Prisoner in the Tower, as men constantly said, and that without commandment or knowledge of the King, who vndoubtedly if he had intended his death, would haue appointed that butcherly office to some other then his owne brother.

(7) Some wife men also iudge, that his drift covertly conueiled, lacked not in helping forth his brother Clarence to his death; which he refused openly, howbeit somewhat (as mendremed) more faintly, then he that was hartly minded to his wealth: And they that thus iudge, thinke that long time in King Edward's life, he forsaile to be king, in case that his brother (whose life he looked that euill dier should shorthe) should happen to deceale (as indeed he did) while his children were young. And they deeme that for this intent he was glad of the Duke of Clarence's death, whose life must needs haue hindered him, in intending (being his elder brother) whether the same Duke had kept him true to his Nepheue the young king, or enscripized to be king himselfe. But of all this point, there is no certainty, and who fo disinceth vpon coniectures, may as well shooe too farre, as too short. Howbeit this haue I by credible information learned, that the same night, in which King Edward died, one Mistifolke long ere morning, came in great haile to the boole of one Pattur dwelling in Red Crosse street without Creepie-gate in London; and when he with halty rapping, quickly was let in, he shewed vnto Pattur that K. Edward was departed. By my troth man quoth Pattur, then will my Master the Duke of Gloucester be king, what cause he had fo to thinke, hard it to say, whether being toward him knew any such thing intended, or otherwise had any iukling thereof, for it was not likely that he spake it of no ground.

(8) But now to return to the course of this History; were it that the Duke of Gloucester had of old foreminded this conclusion, & was now thereunto moued, & put in hope by the occasion of the tender age of the young Princes his Nepheues (as opportunity & likelihood of speed, putter a man in courage of that he neuer intended) certain it is, that he contrived their destruction, with the vsurpation of the regall dignite vpon himselfe, and forasmuch as he well willed, and hoip to maintaine a long continued grade and harbaring betweene the Queenes kindred, and the Kings blood, either part enuying others authority; he now thought their disitions should be (as it was indeed) a forward beginning to the pursuise of his intent, and a sure ground for the foundation of all his building, if he might first, vnder the pretext of reuenging old displeasure, abuse the anger and ignorance of the one party, to the destruction of the other, and then winne to his purpose as many as he could, and those that could not be wonne, might be lost before they were aware; for of one thing was he certaine, that if his intent were perceived he should (some haue made peace between both the parties with his owne blood.

(9) King Edward in his life, albeit that this disfection betweene his friends somewhat grieved him, yer in his good health he somewhat lesse regarded it, because he thought whatsoever busines should fall betweene them, himselfe should alwaies be able to rule both the parties. But in his last sickness, when he perceived his naturall strength fo sore infeebled, that he dispaired all recoarie; then considering the youth of his Children, albeit he nothing lesse mistrusted them that that happened, yet well fore-seeing how many harmes might grow by their debate, while the youth of his children should lacke discretion of themselves, and good Counsell of their friends, of which either party should counsell for their owne commoditie, and the rather by pleasant aduile to winne themselves fauour, then by profitable aduertisements to doe his children good, hee called some of them before him that were at variance, and in speciall the Lord Marquesse Dufferin, the Queenes sonne by her first husband, and William Lord Hastings a noble man, then Lord Chamberlaine, against whom the Queene especially grudged, for the great fauour the King bare him; and also for that shee thought him secretly familiar with the King in waston company. Her kindred also bare him sore, as well for that the King had made him Capaine of Calis, which office the Lord Rivers, brother to the

looked against the Lord Cham-

Queene claimed of the Kings former promise, as for diuers other great gifts which he receiued, that they looked for. These were the grudges which the king on his death bed fought to remoue, and they in themselves seemed to cancel, as we haue said, though the sparks of these displeasures burst afterward into a dangerous flame, which consumed most of them, as afterward shall appeare.

(10) For assoone as the King was departed this life, his sonne Prince Edward drew towards London from Ludlow in Wales, which Countrey being farre off from the law, and recourse to iustice, was become to be farre out of Order, and growne wilde for Robbers, Routers walking at liberty vncorrected: for which cause this Prince in the life time of his father was sent thither, to the end that the authority of his presence should reframe euill disposed persons, from the boldness of their former outrages. To the gouernance and ordering of this young Prince as his tending thither, was there appointed Sir Anthony Woodville Lord Rivers, and brother vnto the Queene, a right honorable man, as valiant of hand as pollicke in Counsell, admiued there vnto him others of the same partie, and in effect euerie one as he was needfull of kin vnto the Queene, so was he placed next about the Prince.

(11) That drift of the Queene not vnwisely denied, whereby her blood might of youth be rooted in the Princes fauour, the Duke of Gloucester turned vnto their destruction, and vpon that ground set the foundation of all his vnhappy building. For whomsoever he perceived either at variance with them, or bearing himselfe their fauour, he brake vnto them, some by mouth, some by writing and secree messengers, that it was neither reason, nor in any wise to be suffered, that the young King their Mother and kinsman, should be in the hands and Custody of his mothers kindred, sequestred in manner from their Company and attendance, of which euerie one ought him as faithfull seruice as they, and many of them farre more honorable part of kin then his mothers side: whose blood (quoth he) hauing the Kings pleasure was farre vnmeet to bee matched with his, which now to be as who say removed from the king, and the lesse noble to be left about him, is (quoth hee) neither honorable to his Maiestie nor vnto vs, and also to his Grace no fauour, to haue the mightiest of his friends from him, and vnto vs no little iopardy, to suffer our well proued coull-willers to grow in ouer great authority with the Prince in youth, who is light of belief and soone perswaded. Ye remember I row K. Edward himselfe, albeit he was a man of age and discretion, yet was he in many things ruled by the bend, more then stood either with his honor, or our profit, or with the commodity of any man else, except only the immoderate aduancement of themselves. Which whether they forer thirsted after their owne weale, or out woe, it were hard I weene to gesse, and if some folkes friendship had not held better place with the King, then any respect of kindred, they might perhaps easily haue intreated and brought some of vs to confusion ere this; why not as easily as they haue done some other alreadie, as neere of his roiall blood as we! But our Lord hath wrought his will and thanks be to his grace, that perill is past: howbeit as great is growing, if we suffer this young King in our enemies hand; which without his knowledge might abuse the name of his commendement, to any of our vndoing, which thing God and good prouision forbid.

(12) Of which good prouision none of vs hath any thing the lesse neede, for the late made attornment, in which the Kings pleasure had more place then the parties wils: nor none of vs, I beleue, is so vnwise our soone to trust a new friend made of an old foe, or to thinke that an howlerly kindness, suddenly contracted in one houre continued yee scarce a fortnight, should be deeper fetled in their stomackes, then a plough accustomed malice many yeeres rooted.

With these wordes and writings and such other, the Duke of Gloucester soone set afire them that were of themselves prouid enough to kinde, especially two, Edward Duke of Buckingham, and William Lord Hastings Chamberlaine, both men of honor and of great power. The one by long succession from his Ancestry: the other by his office, and the Kings fauour. These two not bearing each to other so much love, as both of them hatred vnto the Queenes part, in this point accorded together, with the Duke of Gloucester, that they would vicerly remoue from the Kings Company all his mothers friends vnder the name of their enemies.

(13) Vpon this conclusion the Duke of Gloucester vnderstanding, that the Lords which at that time were about the King, intended to bring him to London to his Coronation, accompanied with such power of their friends, that it should be hard for him to bring his purpose to passe, without the gathering a great assembly of people, and in manner of open warre, whereof the end hee wille well was doubtfull, and in which the King being on their side, his part should haue the face and name of a Rebellion; he secretly therefore by diuers meanes, caused the Queene to be perswaded and brought in minde, that it neither were neede, and also should be iopardous, the King to come vp strong.

(14) For wherens now euerie Lord loued other, and no other thing studied vpon, but about the Corosation and honor of the King: if the Lords of her kindred should assemble in the Kings name much people, they should gine the Lords of the contrary faction cause to feare and suspect, least they should gather this people not for the Kings safeguard, whom no man impugned, but for their destruction, hauing more regard to their old variance, then their new attornment: for which cause they should assemble on the other party much people againe for their defence, whose power shew well with stretched farre: and thus should all the Realme fall on any proare: and of all the hurt that thereof should insue, which was likely not to be a hink, & the most harme like to fall where these least would, all the world would put her and her kindred in the blame, and say that they had vnwisely and vntuallie also broken the amay and peace, which the King her husband so prudently made betwix his kin and hers on his death bed, and which the other party faithfully observed.

(15) The Queene in this wise perswaded, sent such word vnto her sonne, and vnto her brother being about the King: besides the Duke of Gloucester, himselfe and other Lords the chiefe of his bend, wrote vnto the King so reuerently, and to the Queenes friends there so lovingly, that they nothing earthly mistrusting, brought vp the King in great haile, but not in good speed, with a fober company. Now was the King in his way to London gone from Northampton, when the Dukes of Gloucester and Buckingham came thither, where remained behind the Lord Rivers the Kings vnkle, intending on the morrow to follow the King, and bee with him at Stony-Stratford, twelue miles thence, earely ere he departed. So was there made that night much fridullie chere betwix these two Dukes and the Lord Rivers a great while: but incontinene after that, they were openly with great curtesie departed, and the Lord Rivers lodged, the Dukes secretly with a few of their most priuy friends, set them down in Counsell, wherein they spent a great part of the night: & at their rising in the dawning of the day, they sent out priuily to their seruants in their Innes and lodgings about, giuing command to make themselves shortly ready, for their Lords were to horseward: vpon which messagers, many of their folke were attendant, when many of the L. Rivers seruants were vntready.

(16) Now had these Dukes taken into their custodies the keyes of the Inne, that none should passe forth without their licence: and besides this, in the high-way towards Stony-Stratford, where the King lay, they had belovewd certaine of their men, that should send backe againe, and compell to returne any man that were gotten out of Northampton towards Stony-Stratford, till they had further order: forasmuch as the Dukes themselves intended for the shew of their diligence, to bee the first that should that day attend upon the Kings Highnesse out of that Towne. Thus bare they folke in hand: but when the Lord Rivers vnderstood the gates closed, the wayes beset, neither his seruants, or himselfe suffered to goe out, considering well so great a thing without his knowledge, could not bee done for nought and comparing this present manner, with his last nightes chere, in so few howres to haue so great a change, marvellously misliked it. Howbeit fith hee could not get away, nor keepe himselfe close hee would not, left hee should seeme to hide himselfe for some secret feare of his own fault, whereof he saw no such cause in himselfe: hee determined vpon the surety of his owne conscience, to goe boldly vnto them, and to enquire what this matter might meane; whom as soone as they saw, they beganne to quarrell with, saying, that hee intended to seruillance betwene the King and them, and to bring them to confusion, but it should not lie in his power. And when he beganne (as hee was a very well spoken man) in fteemly wife to excuse himselfe, they carried not the end of his answer, but shortly took him, & put him in ward and that done, forthwith went to horsebacke, and tooke the way to Stony-Stratford, where they found the King with his Company, ready to leape on horsebacke, and depart forward to leaue that lodging for them, because it was too strait for both companies.

(17) And as soone as they came in his presence, they alighted downe with all their company about them; to whom the Duke of Buckingham said, Go afore Gentlemen, and Yeomen keepe your rooms. In which goodly array they came to the King, and on their knees in very humble maner saluted his Grace, who receiued them in very ioyous and amiable manner, nothing knowing, nor mistrusting as yet what was done. But euen by and by in his presence, they picked a quarrell to the Lord Gray, the Kings other brother by his mother, saying, that he with the Lord Marquess his brother, and the Lord Rivers his vnckle, had compassed to rule the King and the realm, and to set variance among the States, and to libbide and destroy the noble blood of the Realm towards the accomplishing whereof, they said that the Lord Marquess had entred into the Tower of London, & thence taken out the Kings treasure, and had sent men to the sea. All which things the Dukes well knew were done for necessary and good purposes, by the whole Councell at London, saying that forthwith they must lay.

(18) Vnto which words the King answered, what my brother Marquess had done I cannot say: but in good sooth I dare well answer for mine vnckle Rivers, & my brother here, that they are innocent of any such matter: yea my liege, quoth the Duke of Buckingham, they haue kept their dealings in these matters farre from the knowledge of your good Grace. And forthwith they accused the Lord Richard, Sir Thomas Vaughan, and Sir Richard Hunt Knights in the Kings presence, and brought the king and all his company backe vnto Northampton, where they tooke againe further counsell. And there they sent away from the King whome it pleased them, and set new seruants about him, such as better liked them: then him. At which dealing the king wept, and was nothing content; but it booted not: and at dinner, the Duke of Gloster sent a dish from his owne Table to the Lord Rivers, bidding him be of good chere for all should bee well. But the Lord Rivers thanking the Duke, prayed the Messenger to beare it to the Lord Richard, with the same message for his comfort, as one to whom such aduersity was strange, but himselfe had bene all his dayes inured therewith, and therefore could beare it the better: but for all this comfortable counsell of the Duke of Gloster, he sent the Lord Rivers, and the Lord Richard, with Sir Thomas Vaughan into the North Country into diuers places to prison, and afterward all to Powfret, where they were in conclusion beheaded.

(19) In this wife the Duke of Gloster tooke vpon himselfe the Order and Governance of the young King, whom with much honour and humble reuerence he conuaid towards London. But anone the tidings of this matter came hally to the Queene, a litle before the midnight following, and that in the forest wile, that the King her sunne was taken, her brother, her sonne, and other friends arrested, & sent no man with whiteth, to bee dooe with God wot what. With which tidings, the Queen in great fright & heavinesse, bewailed her childes raigne, her friends mischance, and her owne misfortune, damming the time that euer shee disswaid the gathering of power about the King, got her selfe in all hast possible with her young sunne, and her daughters, out of the Palace of Wyndesore, in which shee then lay, into the Sanctuary, lodging her selfe, and company there in the Abbots place.

(20) Now came there one like wile, not long after night from the Lord Chamberlaine, vnto the Archbisshoppe of York then Chancellor of England, to his place not farre from Wyndesore; and for that hee shewed his seruants, that he had tidings of great importance, that his M. gaue him in charge, not to foreheare his reist, they letted not to awake him; nor hee to admit the Messenger vnto his bed side. Of whom hee heard that these Dukes were gone backe with the Kings Grace from Stony-Stratford vnto Northampton: notwithstanding Sir (quoth he) my Lord sendeth your Lordshippe word, that there is no feare: for hee assureth you that all shall bee well. I assure him (quoth the Archbisshoppe) bee it as well as it will, it will neuer bee so well as we haue seene it. And thereupon by and by after the messengers departure, hee caused in all hast all his seruants to be called vp, and so with his owne household about him, enery man weaponed, hee tooke the Great Seale with him, and came yet before day vnto the Queene. About whom he found much heuinesse, rumble, hast and businesse, carriage and conuoyance of her stuffe into Sanctuary, chests, coffers, packes and fardels, trussed all on mens backs, no man voccupied, some lading, some going, some discharging, some coming for more, some breaking down the wals to bring in the next way, and some drew to them to helpe to carry a wrong way. The Queene her selfe sat alone alone on other rushes, all desolace and dismayed, whom the Archbisshop comforted in the best manner hee could, shewing her that hee trusted the matter was nothing so fure as shee tooke it for, and that hee was put in good hope and one of feare, by a message sent him from the L. Chamberlaine: Ah woe worth him (quoth the Queene) hee is one of them that laboureth to destroy mee and my blood.

(21) Madam (quoth hee) bee of good cheare; for I assure you, if they crowne any other King then your sonne, whom they haue now with them, we shal on the morrow crown his brother, whom you haue here with you: and here is the great Seale, which in like sort as that noble Prince your husband deliuered it vnto me, so here I deliuer it vnto you, to the vse and behoofe of your sonne, and therewith hee betooke her the Great Seale, and departed home againe, euen in the dawning of the day: by which time hee might in his Chamber window see all the Thames full of boats of the Duke of Glosters seruants, watching that no man should goe to Sanctuary, nor none should passe vnsearched. Then was there great commotion and murmur, as well in other places about, as especially in the City, the people discerly serily diuining vpon this dealing. And some Lords, Knights or Gentlemen, eyther for fauour of the Queene, or for feare of themselves, assembled in sundry Companies, and went flocke-meale in harness: and many also, for that they accounted this demeanour attempted, not so specially against the other Lords as against the King himselfe in the disturbance of his Coronation.

(22) Burthen, by and by the Lords assembled together, towards which meeting, the Arch-bishoppe of York fearing that it would bee criticised (as it was indeed) to his ouermuch lightnesse, that hee so sodainly had yielded vp the great Scale to the Queene (to whom the custody thereof nothing appertained) without speciall commandement of the King, secretly lent for the Scale again, & brought it with him after the accustomed manner. And at this meeting, the Lord Hastings, whose trust toward the King no man doubted, nor needed to doubt, perswaded the Lords to beleue, that the Duke of Gloster, was sure and faithfully faithfull to his Prince, and that the Lord Aumer and Lord Richard, with the other knight, were for matters attempted by them against the Dukes of Gloster and Buckingham put vnder arrest for their fury, not for the Kings iopardy; and that they were also in safeguard, and that they no longer should remaine, then till the matter were, not by the Dukes only, but also by all the other Lords of the Kings Councell indifferently examined, and by other discretions ordered, either iudged or appealed. But one thing he aduiled them beware, that they iudged not the matter too farre forth ere they knew the truth, nor turning their private grudges into the common hurt, ieking and prouoking men vnto anger, and disturbing the kings Coronation; towards which the Dukes were coming vp, that they might peraduenture bring the matter to farr out of ioynt, that it should neuer bee brought in frame againe. Which firste if it should happen (as it were likely) to come to a field, though both parties were in all things equall, yet should the authority be on that side where the King is himselfe.

(23) With these perswasions of the Lord Hastings, whereof part himselfe beleued, of part he with the contrary these commotions were somewhat appeased, but especially by that, that the Dukes of Gloster and Buckingham were to meet, and came so shortly on with the King, in none other manner, with a one other voice, or any other semblance then to his Coronation; causing the same to be blowne abroad, that these Lords and Knights which were taken, had contriued the destruction of the Dukes of Gloster and Buckingham, and of other the Noble blood of the Realme, to the end that themselves would alone denaine and gouerne the King at their pleasure. And for the Colourable prooffe thereof, such of the Dukes servants as rode with the Carre of their fluste that were taken (amongst which fluste vnto marvell though some were harness, which at the breaking vp of the household, must needs either he brought away, or cast away) or they went vnto the people all the way as they went, saying, loe here be the barrels of harness, that these Traitors haue priuily contriued in their Carriages to destroy the Noble Lords withall. This deale, albeit it made the matter to women more vnlily, well perceiving that the intenders of such a purpose, would rather haue had their harness on their backs, then to be bound vp in barrels: yet much part of the common people were therewith verie well satisfied, and said it were almes to hang them.

(24) When the King approached neere to the City Edmond that Goldsmith then Maior, with William White and Iohn Matthew Sheriffe, and all the other Aldermen in scarlet, with five hundred horse of the Citizens in violet, receiued him reverently at Harnesey, and ryding from thence, accompanied him into the City, which he entered the fourth day of May the first and last yeere of his Raigne. The King was lodged in the Bishops Pallace, where was kept a great Councell, and there was twome to the king, the Duke of Gloster, the Duke of Buckingham, and all the Lords. But the Duke of Gloster, bare him in open light so reuerent to the Prince, with all semblance of lowlines, that from the great obloquie in which he was so late before, he was suddenly false in so great truth, that at the Councell next assembled, he was made the only man, chiefe & thought most meet to be Protector of the King and his realm, so that (were it desiring, or were it folly) the lambe was beate to the wolfe to keepe. At which Councell also, the Arch-bishop of York Chancellour of England, which had deliuered vp the great Scale to the Queene, was thereof greatly reprovde, and the Scale taken from him, and deliuered to Doctor Rafell Bishop of Lincolne, a wife man, and of much experience, and vndoubtedly one of the best learned men that England had in his time: diuers Lords & Knights were appointed vnto diuers Roomes, the Lord Chamberlaine, and some others, keeping still their offices they had before.

(25) Now although that the Protector, so fore thirsted for the fulfilling of those desires which he had begun, and thought every day a yeere till they were achieved, yet durst he no further attempt, so long as he had but halfe his pray in his hand: well waring, that if he depozed the one brother, all the Realme would fall to the other, if either remained in Sanctuary, or should be conueied to his further liberty: wherefore, incontinent at the next meeting of the Lords in Councell, he propozed vnto them, that it was a heinous deed of the Queene, and proceeded of great malice towards the Kings Counsellors, that they should keepe in Sanctuary the Kings brother from him, whose speciall pleasure and comfort were to haue his brother with him: and that by her done, was to none other intent, but to bring all the Lords in obloquie, and murmur of the people, as though they were not to be trusted with the Kings brother, who by assent of the Nobles of the land, were appointed as the Kings neerest friends, to the tuition of his owne trayall person. The prosperitie whereof standeth (quoth hee) not all in keeping from enemies or ill viand, but partly also in recreation, and moderate pleasure, which hee in his tender youth cannot take in the company of ancient persons, but in the familiar conuersion of those that be neither farre vnder, nor farre above his age, and neuertheless of estate conuenient to accompany his noble Maestie; wherefore with whom rather, then with his owne brother? And if any man thinke this consideration (which I thinke no man thinketh that Ioeath the King) let him consider that sometimes without small things, greater cannot stand. And verily, it redoundeth greatly to the dishonour both of the Kings Highnesse, and of vs all that are about his Grace, to haue it runne in e-very mans mouth, not in this Realme only, but also in other lands (as euill words walke farre) that the Kings brother shall bee faine to keepe Sanctuary; for every man I deeme, will suppose, that there is occasion giuen, why it should so be: and such euill opinions once fastened in mens hearts, hardly can bee screwed out againe, and may grow to more grieue then any man here can diuine. Wherefore I thinke it were not the worst to send vnto the Queene for the redresse of this matter, some honourable trusty man, such as both tendreth the kings weale, and the honour of this Councell, and is also in fauour and credence with her. For all which considerations, none seemeth to mee more meete, then is our reuerend Father here present, my Lord Cardinal, who may in this matter doe most good of any man, if it please him to take the paines, which I doubt not of his goodnesse hee will not refuse, for the Kings sake and ours, and weale of the young Duke himselfe, the Kings most honourable brother, ther, and after my Soueraigne himselfe, my moit deere Nephew. Considering that thereby shall be ceased the slanderous rumor and obloquie now going, and the hurts avoided that thereof might insue, and much rest and quiet grow to all the Realme. And if he be percase to oblitinate, and so precisely for upon her owne will, that neither his wife and faithfull aduertisement cannot move her; nor any mans reason conuince her: then shall we by mine advice, and by the Kings authority, fetch him out of that Prison; & bring him to his noble prefence, in whose continuall company he shall be so well cherished, and so honorably intreated, that all the world shall to our honor, and her reproach perceive, that it was only malice, frowardnes, or folly, that caused her to keepe him there: this is my minde in this matter for this time, except any of your Lordships any thing perceive to the contrary, for neuer shall I by Gods Grace, so wed my selfe to my owne will, but that I shall be ready to change it vpon your better aduises.

(16) When the Protector had said, all the Councell affirmed that the motion was good and reasonable, and to the King and the Duke his brother honorable, and the thing that should cease great murmur in the Realme, if the mother might be by good means induced to deliuer him. Which thing the Archbishop of Turke, whom they all agreed also to be thereto most conuenient, tooke vpon him to move her, and therein to doe his vttermoost endeavour: howbeit if she could by no means be entreated with her good will to deliuer him, then thought he, and such other of the Clergy then present, that it were not in any wise to be attempted, to take him out against her will. For it would be a thing that should turne to the great grudge of all men, and high displeasure of God, if the priuiledge of that holy place should now be broken, which had so manie yeeres bene kept, which both Kings and Popes so good had granted, so many had confirmed, and which holy ground was more then fise hundred yeeres agoe, by S. Peter in his owne person, in spirit accompanied with great multitude of Angels, by night so specially hallowed and dedicated to God, (for the prooffe whereof, they have yet in the Abbey, S. Peters Cope to shew) that from that time hitherward, was there neuer so vndeuous a King, that durst violate that sacred place, or so holily a Bishop, that durst presume to consecrate it: and therefore (quoth the Archbishop of Turke) God forbid that any man should for any thing carnall, enterprize to breake the immunity and liberty of that sacred Sanctuary, that hath bene the safeguard of many a good mans life: and I trust (quoth he) with Gods grace we shall not need it. But for what need soeuer, I would not we should doe it: I trust that shee shall be with reason contented, and all things in good manner obtained, but if it happen, that I bring it not so to passe, yet shall I toward it with my best, and you shall all well perceive, that there shall be of my indeuour no lacke, if the mothers dread, and womanish feare be not the let.

(17) Womanish feare, nay womanish frowardnes (quoth the Duke of Buckingham) for I dare take it vpon my soule, that we knoweth there is no need of any feare, either for her soule or for her welfare. For as for her, here is no man that will be at warre with a woman. Would God some of the men of her kin were women too, and then should all be soone in rest: Howbeit, there is none of her kin the lesse loued, for that they be of her kin, but for their owne euill deserting. And nay the lesse, if we loued neither her, nor her kin, yet were there no cause to thinke, that we should hate the Kings noble brother, to whose Grace we owe felices be of kin: whose honor, if there as much desired, as our disonour, and as much regard tooke to his wealth, as to her owne will, there would be as loth to suffer him from the King, as any of vs bee. For if there haue we, (as would God there had as good will as there hath shewed we) these reckneeth her selfe no wiser, then shee thinketh some that be here, of whose faithfull minde shee nothing doubteth, but verily beleueeth and knoweth, that they would be as sorry of his harme, as her selfe, and yet would haue him from her, if shee bide there: and we all (I thinke) content, that both be with her, if shee come thence, and hide in such place, where they may be with their honour. Now then, if they reuile in the delinquence of him, to follow the Councill of them, whose wilddome shee knoweth, whose truth shee well trusteth: it is ealie to perceive, that frowardnes leaue her, and not feare. But goe to, suppose that shee feare, (as who may let her to feare her owne shadow) the more shee feareth to deliuer him, the more ought we to feare to leaue him in her hands. For, if shee cast such fond doubts, that shee feare his hurt: then will shee feare, that hee shall bee fetcht thence. For shee will soone thinke, that if men were let (which God forbid) vpon so great a mischief, the Sanctuary would little let them: which good men might (as I thinke) without sin, somewhat lesse regard then they doe. Then, if shee doubt, lest hee might bee fetched from her, it is not likely that shee shall send him somewhere out of the Realme: Verily, I looke for none other. And I doubt not, but shee now as fore mindeth it, as we the let thereof. And if he might happen to bring that to passe (as it were no great matter, we letting her alone) all the world would say, that wee were a wise sort of Councillors about a King, that suffer his brother to be cast away vnder our noses. And therefore I assure you faithfully for my mind, I will rather manage her hand, fetch him away, then leaue him there, till her frowardnes and fond feare conuince him away. And yet will I breake no Sanctuary therefore: for verily, with the priuiledges of that place, and other like haue bene of long continued, I am not he that wil goe about to breake them. And in good faith, if they were now to begin, I would not be that should be about to make them. Yet will I not say nay, but that it is a deed of piety, that such men, as the sea, or their euill debters haue brought in poverty, should haue some place of liberty, to keepe their bodies out of the danger of their cruell Creditors. And also, if the Crowne happen (as it hath done) to come in question, while either part taketh other as Traitors, I like well there be some places of refuge for both. But as for theues, of which these places bee full, and which neuer fall from the craft after they once fall therunto: it is pity the Sanctuary should serue them, & much more manquellers, whom God bad to take from the Altar and kill them, if their murder were wilfull. And where it is otherwise, there need wee not the Sanctuaries, that God appointed in the old Law: for if either necessity, his own defence, or misfortune draweth him to that deed, a pardon serueth, which either the law granteth of course, or the King of pity may. Then looke we now how few Sanctuary men there be, whom any fauourable necessity compelled to goe thither: and then see on the other side, what a sort there be commonly therein of them, whom wilfull wickednesse hath brought to naught: what rabble of theues, murderers, and malicious hainous Traitors, and that in two places especially? the one at the elbow of the City, the other in the very bowels. I dare well avow it, weigh the good that they doe, with the hurt that commeth of them, and yee shall finde it much better to lacke both, then to haue both. And this I say, although they were not abused as they now be, and so long haue been, that I feare mee ever they will bee, while men bee afraid to set the hands to amend that, as though God & S. Peters were the patrons of vngraciously liuing Now vnthrifis riot, and ruine in debt, vpon the boldnes of these places; yea, and rich men runne therewith poore mens goods, there they build, there they spend, and bid their Creditors goe whistle. say, they dare not abide with their husbands for beeing. Thieues bring thither their flon goods, and lue theron riotously: there they deuile new robberies, nightly they steale out, they toh and riuie, kill and come in againe, as though those places gaue them not onely a safeguord for the harme they haue done, but a licence also to do more; howbeit much of this mischief, if Wifemen would let their hands to it, might bee amended, with great thanks of God, and no breach of the Priuiledge. The residue, such lo long agoe, I wot neere what Pope, and what Prince more pious then pollicricke hath granted it, and other men since, of a certain religious feare, haue not broken it; let vs therefore take paine therewith, and let it a Gods name stand in force, as farre forth as reason will, which is not fully so farre forth, as may serue to let vs of the fetching forth of this Nobleman, to his honour and wealth, out of that place, in which he neither is, nor can bee a Sanctuary man. A Sanctuary serueth alwayes to defend the body of that man that standeth in danger abroad, nor of great hurt onely, but also of lawfull hurt; for against vnlawfull harmes, neuer Pope nor King intended to priuiledge any one place, for that priuiledge hath euery place: knoweth any man any place, wherein it is lawfull for one man to do another wrong? that no man vnlawfully take hurt, that liberty, the King, the Law, and very nature forbiddeth in euery place, and maketh to that regard, for euery man, euery place a Sanctuary: but where a man is by lawfull means in perill, there needeth hee the tuition of some special priuiledge, which is the onely ground and cause of all Sanctuaries: from which necessity this noble Prince is farre, whose loue to the King, nature and kindred piousness, whose innocency to all the world, his tender youth piousness, and so Sanctuary, as for him, neither none hee needeth, nor none can hee haue. Men come not to Sanctuary, as they come to Baptisme, to require it by their Godfathers; hee must aske it himselfe, that must haue it, and reason, with no man hath cause to haue it, but whose conscience of his owne fault maketh him faine need to require it: what will then hath yonder babe? which and if he had discretion to require it, if neede were, I dare say would now bee right angry with them that keep him there: and I would thinke without any scruple of conscience, without any breach of Priuiledge, to bee somewhat more homely with them, that be there Sanctuary men indeed: for if one goe to Sanctuary with another mans goods, why should not the King, leauing his body at liberty, faine the party of his goods, euen within the Sanctuary? for neither King nor Pope can giue any place such a priuiledge, that it shall discharge a man of his debtes, being able to pay. And with that diuers of the Clergy that were present, whetber they said it for his pleasure, or as they thought, agreed plainly, that by the law of God, and off the Church, the goods of a Sanctuary man, should bee deliuered in payment of his debtes, and flon goods to the owner, and onely liberty referred him, to get his liuing with the labour of his hands. Verily (quoth the Duke) I thinke you say very truth; and what if a mans wife would take Sanctuary, because the liue to runne from her husband? I would wene if he could allledge none other cause, hee may lawfully without any displeasure to Saint Peter, take her out of Saint Peters Church by the arme. And if no body may be taken out of Sanctuary, that faith he will bide there, then if a child will take Sanctuary, because hee feareth to goe to schoole, his Master must let him alone. And as simple as the sample is, yet is there lesse reason in our case then in thers, for therein, though it bea childhild feare; yet is there at the least wife some feare, and herein is there none at all. And verily, I haue often heard of Sanctuary men, but I neuer heard euer of Sanctuary Children. And therefore, as for the Conclusion of my mind, who so may haue deferred to need it, if they thinke it for their suretie, let them keep it; but he can be no Sanctuary man that had neither wilidome to desire it, nor malice to deferre it, whole life or libertie, can by no lawfull processe stand in icopardie: and hee that taketh one out of the Sanctuary to do him good, I say plainly that he breaketh no Sanctuary.

(13) When the Duke had done, the temporall men wholly, & most part of the spirituall also, thinking no hurt earthly meant towards the young babe, considered in effect, that if hee were not deliuered, hee should bee seized; howbeit they all thought it best, in the auoiding of all manner of rumor, that the Lord Cardinall should first assey to get him with her good will. And therupon, all the Councill came vnto the Starre-Chamber at Westminster, and the Lord Cardinall leauing the Protector with the Councill in the Starre-Chamber, departed into the Sanctuary to the Queene with diuers other Lords with him, were it for the respect of his honour, or that hee should by presence of so many, perceiue that this errand was not one mans mind: or were it, for that the Protector intended not in this manner, to trust any one man alone, or else, that if hee finally were determined to keepe him, some of that Company had happily secret instructions incontinent, maugre her mind to take him, and to leaue her on respiteto conuey him, which hee was likely to mind, after this matter broken to her, if the time would in anywise serue her.

(19) When the Queene and thuse Lords were come together in presence, the Lord Cardinall shewed her, that it was thought vnto the Protector, and vnto the whole Councill, that her keeping of the Kings brother in that place, was the thing which highly sounded, not onely to the great rumor of the people, and their obloquie, but also to the importable griefe and displeasure of the kings royall Ministry, to whose Grace it were a singular comfort, to haue his naturall brother in Company, as it was both his dishonour, all theirs, and hers also, to suffer him in Sanctuary, as though the one brother stood in danger and perill of the other. And hee shewed her, that the Councill therefore had sent him to require her the deliuey of the young Duke, that hee might bee brought vnto the Kings presence at his liberty, out of that place, which they reckoned as a prison, and there hee should bee demeaned, according to his estate: and hee in this doing should doe great good to the Realme, pleasure to the Councill, and profite to her selfe, succour to her friends that were in distresses, and besides that (which hee wist well hee specially tendered) not onely great comfort and honour to the King, but also to the young Duke himselfe, whose great wealth it were to be together, aswell for many greater causes, as also for both their disports and recreations; which thing the Lords deemed not flight, though it seemed light, well pondering, that their youth without recreation and play, cannot endure, nor any stranger, for the consuetude of both their ragings and estates, so merite in that point for any of them, as eyther of them for other.

(10) My Lord (quoth the Queene) I say not nay, but that it were very convenient, that this Gentleman whom you require, were in company of the King his Brother; and in good faith, I thinke it were as great commodity to them both, for yet a while to bee in the custody of their mother, the tender age considered of the elder of them both, but specialie the younger, which besides his infancy, that also needeth good looking to, hath a while been so fore diseased, weared with sicknesse, and is so newly rather a little amended, then well recovered, that I dare put no person earthly in trust with his keeping but my selfe onely, considering that there is (as Phyfaints say) and as wee also find, double the perill in the reciduation, that was in the first sicknesse, with which discale, nature being fore laboured, fore-wearied and weakened, waceth the lesse able to beare out and sustaine a new surfeit. And albeit there might be found other that would happily do their best vnto him, yet is there none that either knoweth better how to order him, then I that so long haue kept him, or is more like tenderly to cherish him then his owne mother that bare him.

(31) No man denieth good Madam (quoth the Cardinal) but that your Grace were of all others most necessary about your children, and so would all the Councell not onely bee content, but glad that you were, if it might stand with your pleasure, to bee in such place as might stand with their honour: but if you doe appoint your selfe to carry here, then they thinke it were more conuenient that the Duke of Zerke were with the King, honourably at his liberty, to the comfort of them both, rather then here as a Sanctuary man, to both their dishonour and obloquie, sith there is not alwayes so great a necessity to haue the child with his mother, but that occasion may sometimes bee such, that it should bee more expedient to keepe him elsewhere, which well appeareth in this, that at such time as your dearest sonne then Prince, and now King, should for his honour, and good order of the Country, keepe his residence in Waler, farre out of your Company, your Grace was well contented therewith your selfe.

(32) Not very well contented (quoth the Queen) and yet the case is not like, for the one was then in health, and the other is now sicke: in which case I maruaile greatly, that my Lord Protector is so desirous to haue him in his keeping, where if the Child in his sicknesse miscarrie by nature, yet might hee runne into slander and insipision of fraud. And where they call it a thing so fore against my Childes honour, and theirs also, that hee abide in this place: it is all their honours there to suffer him abide, where no man doubteth hee shall be best kept, and that is here, while I am here, which as yet intend not to come forth, and inopard my selfe after other of my friends, which would God were rather here in surety with mee, then I there in leopardy with them.

(33) Why Madam (quoth another Lord) know you any thing why they should bee in leopardy? Nay verily (quoth she) not why they should bee in prison, as now they bee. But it is I trow no great maruaile though I feare, lest those that haue not lested to put them in drance without colour, will let as little to procure their destruction without cause: The Cardinal made a conuenience to the other Lord, that hee should harpe no more vpon that string, and then said heere to the Queen, that he nothing doubted, but that those Lords of her honourable kinne, which as yet remained vnder arreſt, should vpon the matter examined doe well inough, and as towards her noble person, neither was, neither could be any leopardy.

(34) Whereby should I trust that (quoth the Queene?) in that I am guiltlesse? as though they were guilty: in that I am with their enemies better loned then they? when they haue them for my fake, in that I am so neere a kin to the King? and how farr they be off if that would helpe, as God grant it hurt not, and therefore as for me, I purpose not as yet, to depart hence. And as for this gentleman my sonne, I minde that hee shall be where I am, till I see further: for I assure you, for that I see some men so greedy, without any substantiall cause to haue him, makes me much more fearefull to deliuer him. Truly Madam (quoth he) the more vnwilling that you be to deliuer him, the more vnwilling other men be to suffer you to keepe him, lest your selfe lesse feare might cause you farther to conuey him: and many there be that thinke he can haue no priuiledge in this place, which neither can haue will to aske it, nor malice to deliuer it, and therefore they reckon no priuiledge broken, though they fetch him out, which if you finally refuse to deliuer him, I verily thinke they will so much dread his my Lord his vnle, for the tender loue he beareth him, lest your grace should hope to find him away.

(35) Ah sir (quoth the Queene) hath the Protector so tender zeale that he feareth nothing, but lest he should escape him? thinke he that I would find him hence, which is not in plight to send one, and in what place could I account him sure, if he be not sure in the Sanctuary: which there was neuer Tyrant yet so diuelish, that durst presume to breake. And I trust God is as strong now to withstand his aduersaries, as ever he was. But my sonne can deliuer no Sanctuary, and therefore he cannot haue it. Forsooth he hath found out a goodly glosse, by which that place that may defend a thiefe, may not saue an innocent: but he is in no leopardy, nor hath no need thereof: would God he had not. I thinke the Protector, (I pray God hee may proue a Protector) thinke hee that I perceiue not whereunto his painted Proceſse draweth? It is not honorable that the Duke abide here: It were comfortable for them both, that he were with his brother, because the King lacketh a play fellow forsooth. I pray God send them both better play fellows then him, that maketh so high a matter, vpon so trifling pretext, as though there could none be found to play with the King, but his brother, (that hath no list to play for sicknes) come out of Sanctuary, out of his liſegard to play with him. As though Princes, as young as they be, could not play but with their Peeres, or Children could not play but with their kindred, with whom for the most part they agree much worse then with strangers. But the Child cannot require the priuiledge: who tolde him so? he shall heare him aske it, if he will. Howbeit, this is a gay matter, suppose hee could not aske it, suppose hee would not aske it, suppose hee would aske to goe out, if I say hee shall not: if I aske the priuiledge but for my selfe, I say hee that taketh him out against my will, breaketh the Sanctuary. Serueth this liberty for my person onely, or for my goods also? you may not take hence my horse from me: and may you take my child from me? He also is my ward: for as my leauned Councell sheweth me, sith he hath nothing by difcent holden by Knights seruice, the law maketh his mother his Gardian. I then may no man I suppose, take my ward from me out of Sanctuary, without the breach of Sanctuary. And if my priuiledge could not serue him, nor he aske it for himselfe, yet sith the law cometh to me the custodie of him, I may require it for him, except the law giue a child a Gardian only for his goods and lands, discharging him of the cure and safe-keeping of his body, for which only both lands and goods serue. And if examples be sufficient, to obtaine priuiledge for my child, I need not further seeke them, for in this place in which now we be (and which is now in question, whether my child may take benefit of it) mine other sonne now King, was borne, kept in his Cradle, and preferred to a more prosperous fortune, which I pray God long to continue. And as you all know, this is not the first time that I haue taken Sanctuary. For when my Lord my husband was banished, and thrust out of his Kingdome, I fled hither, being great with Child: and here I bare the Prince: and when my Lord my husband returned safe againe, and had the victory, then went I hence, to welcome him home, and from hence I brought my babe the Prince vnto his father, when hee first rooke him in his armes. And I pray God that my sonnes Pallace may be as great a safeguard vnto him now reigning, as this place was sometime to the Kings enemy. In which place I intend to keepe his brother, since mans law serueth the Gardian to keepe the infant. The law of nature will the mother to keepe her child, Gods law privileged the Sanctuary, and the Sanctuary my sonne, first I feare to put him in the protectors hands, who hath his brother already, and were (if both failed) inheritor to the Crowne; and the cause of my feare, hath no man to doe to examine. But yet I feare no further then the law feareth, which as learned men tell me, forbiddeth euery man, the custody of them by whose death hee may inherite lesse land then a Kingdome. I can no more: but whosoever he be that breaketh this holy Sanctuary, I pray God shortly send him need of a Sanctuary when hee may not come to it, for taken out of Sanctuary I would not that my mortall enemy were.

(36) The Lord Cardinal perceiuing that the Queene waxed euer the longer the farther off, & also that shee beganne to kindle and chafe, and speake more biting words against the Protector, and such as he neuer beleued, and was also loath to heare, hee said to her for a final conclusion, that he no longer would dispute the matter, but if shee were content to deliuer the Duke to him, and to the other Lords present, hee durst lay his body and soule both in pledge, not onely for his safety, but also for his estate; And if shee would giue a resolute answer to the contrary, hee would forthwith depart therewithall, and stift who so would with this his office afterward, for he neuer intended more to moue her in that matter, in which shee thought that hee and all others also shoulde her selfe, lacked either witt or truth; if they were so dull that they could perceiue nothing what the Protector intended: truth, if they should procure her sonne to be deliuered into his hands, in whom they should perceiue towards the Child any euill intention.

(37) The Queene with these wordes stood a good while in a deepe study. And for as much as hee seemed the Cardinal ready to depart, and the Protector himselfe ready at hand, so as shee verry thought hee could not keepe him there, but that he should incontinent be taken thence, and to conuiey him elsewhere, neither had shee time to serue her, nor place determined, nor persons appointed, all things verry ready, this message came on her so suddainly, nothing lesse looked for, then to haue him fetcht out of Sanctuary, which shee thought to be now beset in such places about, that hee could not be conuieyed out without, and partly (as shee thought) it might fortune her feare to be false, so well shee wist it was either needlesse or bootlesse: Wherefore, if shee must needs goe from him, shee deemed it best to deliuer him, & besides the Cardinals faith, shee nothing doubted, neither some other Lords, whom shee saw there present, which as shee feared lest they might be deceived, so was shee well assured they would not be corrupted: and thought it would make the more warily to looke to him, and the more circumspectly to see to his safety, if with her owne hands shee betooke him to them of trust. And lastly taking the young Duke by the hand said vnto the Lords.

(38) My Lord, and all my Lords; I neither am so vnwitt to mistrust your wits, nor so suspicious to mistrust your truths: of which thing I purpose to make you such a prooue, as if either of both lacked in you, might both turne mee to great sorrow, the Realme to much harme, & you all to great reproch. For loe, here is (quoth hee) this Gentleman, whom I doubt not, but I could heere keepe safe if I would, whatsoever any man say: and I doubt not also, but there be some abroad so deadly enemies vnto my blood, that if they wist where any of it lay in their owne bodies, they would let it out. We haue also experience, that the desire of a kingdome knoweth no kindred: the brother hath bene the brothers bane: and may the Nephewes be sure of their Vncle? Each of these children is the others defence, whilst they are asunder, and each of their lines lieth in the others body: keepe one safe and both be sure, and nothing for them both more perillous then to be in one place. For what wife Merchant aduentureth all his goods in one ship? All this notwithstanding, I deliuer him, and his brother in now, to keepe into your hands, of whom I shall aske both, before God and the world. Faith full ye be, that wot I will; and I know well you be wise, power and strength to keepe him, if yee list, neither lack yee of your selfe, nor lack helpe in this case. And if you cannot otherwise, then may you leaue him heere: but onely one thing, I beseech you, for the trust that his father euer put in you, and for the trust I now put you in, that as farre as you thinke I feare too much, bee you well wary that you feare not too little: and therewithall saue sayd vnto the child, Farewell mine owne sweet son, God send you good keeping: let me kisse you yet once, ere you goe for God knoweth when we shall kisse together againe. And therewithall hee kist him, and heliess him, turned her back and wept, and went her way, leauing the child weeping as faire. When the Lord Cardinal, and those other Lords with him, had receiued the young Duke, they brought him into the Scar-chamber, where the protector tooke him in his armes, and kist him with these words: New welcome my Lord, euen with all my heart: In which saying, it is like hee spake as he thought. Thereupon forthwith they brought him vnto the King his brother, into the Bishops Pallace at Palmer; and from thence both of them through the Citie of London honourably attended into the Tower, out of which after that day they neuer came againe.

(39) The protector hauing both the children now in his hands, opened himselfe more boldly, both to certaine other men, & also chiefly to the Duke of Buckingham. Although I know that many thought that this Duke was priuie to all the protectors counsell, euen from the beginning, and some of the protectors friends sayd, that the Duke was the first mouer of the protector to this matter, sending a priuie messenger vnto him straight after King Edward death. But others againe, which knew better the subtiltie of the protector, deny that hee euer opened his enterprize to the Duke, vntill hee had brought to passe the things before rehearsed. But when hee had imprisoned the Queenes kindred, and gotten both her sonnes into his owne hands; then hee opened the rest of his purpose with lesse feare to them whom hee thought meet for the matter, and especially to the Duke, who being wonne to his desires, hee held his strength more then halfe increased. The matter was broken vnto the Duke by libell persons, and such as were their craft-makers in the handling of such wicked deuises: who declared vnto him that the young King was offended with him, for his kinsfolkes sakes, and if he were euer able hee would reuenge them: who would prick him forward thereunto if they escaped (for they would remember their imprisonment) or els if they were put to death, without doubt the young King would be careful for their deaths, whose imprisonments was grievous vnto him. And that with repenting the Duke should nothing anail, for there was no way left to redeeme his offence by benefits, but he should sooner destroy himselfe then saue the King, who with his brother, and his kinsfolkes hee saw in such places imprisoned, as the protector might with a becke destroy them all: and without all doubt would doe it indeed, if there were any new enterprize attempted. And that it was likely as the Protector had provided priuie guard for himselfe, so had hee spials for the Duke and traines to haue caught him, if hee should be against him; & that peraduenture from them, whom hee least suspected. For the state of things, & the dispositions of men were then such that a man could not well tell whom hee might trust, or whom hee might feare. These things and such like, being beaten into the Dukes minde, brought him to that point, that where hee had repented the way that hee had entred, yet would hee goe forward in the same, and since hee had once beganne, hee would stoutly goe through. And therefore to this wicked enterprize which hee believed could not be avoyded, hee beat himselfe, determining, with the common mischief could not be amended, he would turne it as much as he might to his owne commoditie.

(40) Then was it agreed, that the Protector should have the Dukes aide to make him King, and that the Protector should lawfull force should marry the Dukes daughter, and that the Protector should grante him the quiet possession of the Earldome of Hereford, which he claimed as his inheritance, and could never obtaine it in King Edwards time. Besides these requests of the Duke, the Protector of his owne accord, promised him a great quantitie of the Kings treasure, and of his household stuffe. And when they were thus at a point betwixt themselves, they went about to prepare for the Coronation of the young king as they would have it seeme. And that they might turne both the eyes & minds of men into perceiving of their drifts otherwise, the Lords were lent for from all parts of the Realme, and came flocking unto the solemneitie. But the Protector and Duke after they had sent the Lord Cardinals Archbishop of York, then L. Chancellor, the Bishop of Ely, the Lords Stanley & Hastings, then Lord Chamberlaine, with many other Noblemen, to conferre and deule about the Coronation in one place, as fast they were in another place contriuing the contrary, to make the Protector king: to which counsell, albeit there were adhibited very few, and they very secret; yet began here and there, some muttering among the people, as though all should not long be well, though they neither knew what they feared, nor wherefore: were it that before such great things, mens hearts of a secret iustit of nature infligie them, as the Sea without winde swellth of him selfe sometime before a tempest; or were it that some one man happily somewhat peccetings, filled many men with suspition, though hee shewed lewse men what hee knew. Howbeit somewhat the dealing it telle made men to mule on the matter, though the counsell were clofe. For by little and little, all men withdrew from the Tower, and repaired to Crawley in Bishopsgate streete, where the Protector kept his house in great state. So that the Protector had the resort, and the King left in a manner desolate. And whilst some for their businesse made suite to such as were in office for the King, some were secretly by their friends warned, that it might happily doe them no good, to be too much attendant about the King without the Protectors appointment, who then began to remove many of the Princes old servants, and in their stead to place about him new.

(41) Thus many things meeting together, partly by purpose, & partly by chance, caused at length not onely the common people that moue with the winde, but wiser men also, and some Lords likewise, to marke and muse at the matter; in so much, that the Lord Stanley, who was after Earle of Derby, said to the Lord Hastings, that he much misliked these two secret counsells. For while we (quoth he) talke of one matter in the one place, little wot we, whereof they talke in the other place. My Lord (quoth the Lord Hastings) of my life neuer doubt you: for while * one man is there, which is neuer thence, one can things be moued that should sound amisse against me, but it shall be in mine eares as it be well out of their mouths: this ment he by Caterly, which was of his neere counsell, and whom hee very familiarly viced, and in his most weighty matters put too man in for speciall trust, nor too man so much beholden unto him as Caterly was. A man indeed well leamed in the Lawes of this Land, and by speciall fauour of the Lord Chamberlaine, in good authoritie, and bare much rule in Leicester shire, where the Lord Hastings power chiefly lay. But surely great pitie it was, that he had not had either more truth, or lesse wit. For his diffimulation onely kept all that mischief vp: In whom if the Lord Hastings had not put for speciall trust, the Lord Stanley and hee had departed with diuers other Lords, and had broken all the dance, for many ill signes that he saw, which he now conuises all to the best. So surely thought he, that there could bee no harme towards him intended, in that counsell where Caterly was. And of truch, the Protector and Duke of Buckingham, made very good semblance unto the Lord Hastings, whom undoubtedly the Protector loaged well, and loth was to loose him, but for feare, lest his life should have quailed their purpose; for which cause hee moued Caterly to proue with some words, call out a farte off, whether hee could thinke it possible to winne the L. Chamberlaine to their part. But Caterly whether hee assayed him, or assayed him not, reported unto them, as hee found him to fast, and heard him speake for terrible words, that hee durst no further breake. True it is, that the Lord Chamberlaine of very trust shewed unto Caterly, the difficult that others began to haue in the matter: & therefore Caterly hearing as hee affirmed, least their motion might with the Lord Hastings diminish his credence, whereunto only all the matter leached hee counsilled and procured the Protector hastily to rid him. And much the rather, for that hee trusted by his death, to obtaine much of the rule that the Lord Hastings bare in his Countrey: the onely defect whereof, was the affectiue that induced him to be partner, and oore speciall contriuer of all this horrible treason.

(42) Soone after this, vpon Friday the thirteenth day of June, many Lords assembled in the Tower, and there sate in counsell, deuising the honorable solemneitie of the Kings Coronation; of the which the time appointed was soene, that the Pageants and subtleties were in making day and night at Westminster, and much victuall killed, that afterward was cast away. These Lords sining together communing of this matter, the Protector came in amongst them about nine of the clocke, saluting them countenouly and excusing himselfe, that he had bene from them so long, laying merrily, I haue bin a sleeper this day. And after a little talke with them, hee said to the Bishop of Ely, My Lord, you haue verie good Strawburies at your Garden in Holborne, I pray you let vs haue a melle of them: Gladly my Lord, said the Bishop, would God I had some better thing as ready to pleasure you as that: and therewith in all haste hee sent his seruant for a melle of Strawburies. Whereupon the Protector saring the Lords sat in conference, prayed them to spare him for a little while, and departed thence. But soone after, betwixt ten and eleuen, hee returned into the counsell Chamber amongst them, with a wonderfull fowre and angry countenance, knitting the browes, frowning and frowning, and gnawing on his lippes, sat him downe in his place, all the Lords much dismayed, fore maruelling of this his foddaine change, and what thing should him aile: Hee sining thus a while, began thus to speake, what are they worthy to haue, that compassie and imagine the destruction of mee, being so neere of blood unto the King and Protector of his royal person and his Realme? At which question, all the Lords sate fore astonied, musing much by whom this question should be meant, of which euery man knew him selfe cleare.

(43) Then the Lord Chamberlaine, as hee that for the loue betwixt them, thought he might bee bouldest with him, answered & said, That they were worthy to be punished as hainous traitors whatsoever they were: and the same all the other Lords affirmed. That is (quoth the Protector) yonder forcefelle my brothers wife, meaning the Queene, and others with her: at these words many of the Lords that launoured her, were greatly abashed: but the L. Hastings was in his minde better conioice, that it was moued by her, then by any other whom hee loued better: howbeit, his heart some what grudged, that he was not afore made of counsell in this matter, as hee was of the taking of her kindred, & of their putting to death, which were by his assent before devised to bee beheaded at Powsey the selfe same day in which hee was not aware, how it was by other devised, that himselfe should bee beheaded the same day at London. Then said the Protector, yee shall all see in what wife that Sorceresse, and that other witch of her counsel, Shores wife, with their infinity, have by their forerice and witchcraft wasted my body. And therewith hee plucked uppe his doublet sleewe to the elbow vpon his left arme, where he shewed a weariſh withered arme, and finally, as it was neuer other.

(44) And thereupon every mans mind fore misgaue them, well perceiving that this matter was but a quarrell. For they well knew, that the Queen was too wife to go about any such foily; & if she would, yet would thee of all others, not make Shores wife of counsell, whom of all women shee most hated, as that Concubine whom the King her husband had moſt loathed. And also no man there present, but knew well enough, that his arme was cutt ſince his birth. Nevertheless the Lord Chamberlaine, (which from the death of King Edward kept Shores wife, on whom hee ſomewhat doted in the Kings life, ſaying as it is ſaid, that hee forbore her for reverence towards the King, or else of a certain kind of fidelity to his friend) answered and ſaid: Certainly my Lord, if they haue ſo heinouſly done, they bee worthy of heinous puniſhment. What (quoth the Protector) thou ſerueſt mee I ween with ifs and withs, I tell thee they haue ſo done, and that I will make good on thy bodie Traitor. And therewith as in a great anger, hee clapped his fiſt vpon the board a great rap: at which token giuen, one without the Chamber cryed, treason, where-with a doore clapped, and in came ruſhing men in haſt, as many as the Chamber might hold, and among the Protector ſaid to the Lord Hastings, I arreſt thee Traitor: What mee my Lord quoth hee? yea thee Traitor quoth the Protector; and another let ſlie at the Lord Stanley, who ſhrunk at the ſtroke vnder the Table, or elſe his head had bene clef to the teeth: for as wiſely as hee ſhrunk, yet came the blood about his eares. Then were they all quickly beſet in diuers Chambers, excepting onely the Lord Chamberlaine, whom the Protector bad ſpeede and ſhrie him ſpace, for by S. Paul ſaid hee, I will not to dinner till I ſee thy head off. It booted him neto aſke why, but heauly rooke a Priſt aduenture, and made a ſhort ſtrife, for a longer would not be ſuffered. The Protector made ſo much haſte to dinner, which hee might not goe to, till this was done for ſaving of his oath. So was hee brought forth into the greene, before the Chappell within the Tower, and his head laid down vpon a long logge of timber, and there ſtruck off, and afterward his body with the head, was entered at Windſor, beſide the body of K. Edward.

(45) A maruallous caſe it is to heare, either of the warnings that hee ſhould haue voided, or the tokens of that hee could not auoid: for the ſelf night before his death, the Lord Stanley ſent a ſtruly ſecret Meſſenger vnto him at Midnight in all the haſt, requiring him to riſe, and ride away with him, for he was vterly diſpoſed no longer to abide, hee had ſo fearefull a dreamer: in which he thought, that a Bore with his tuſkes, io razed them both by the heades, that the blood ranne about both their ſhoulders. And forasmuch as the Protector gaue the Bore for his cognizance, this dreame made ſo fearefull an impreſſion in his heart, that hee was thoroughly determined no longer to tarry, but had his horſe ready, if the Lord Hastings would goe with him, to ride yet ſo farre the ſame night, that they would be out of danger before it was day. Ah good Lord (quoth the Lord Hastings to the Meſſenger) leaueſt thou my Lord thy Maſter ſo much to ſuch triſles, and haſt ſlain in dreames, which either his owne feare fantaſieth, or doe riſe in the nights reſt, by reaſon of the dayes thoughtes? Tell him it is plaine Witchcraft, to beleue in ſuch dreames, which if they were tokens of things to come, why thinketh hee not, that wee might be as likely to make them true, by our going, if we were caught and brought back (as friends ſaile flyers) for then had the Bore a cauſe likely to riſe wth his tuſkes, as men that fled for ſome fallhood: wherefore, either there is no perill, not none there is indeed, or if any be, it is rather in going then abiding. And if wee muſt needs fall in perill, one way or other, yet had I rather, that men ſhould ſee, it were by other mens fallhood, then thinke it our fault or fault-heere. And therefore goe to thy Maſter man, and commend me to him; and pray him to bee merry and haue no feare; for I aſſure him, I am aſſure of the man that hee worſhippeth of, as I am of mine owne hand. God ſend Grace Sit (ſaid the Meſſenger) and went his way.

(46) Certaine it is alſo, that in riding towards the Tower the ſame morning in which hee was beheaded, his horſe twice or thrice ſtumbled with him, almoſt to the falling; which thing, albeit each man knoweth daily hapneth, to them to whom no ſuch miſchance is toward, yet hath it bene of an olde rite and cuſtome obſerued, as a token oftentimes, notably foregoing ſome great miſfortune: Now this that followeth was nowarning, but an enuious ſcorne. The ſame morning before hee was vp, came a Knight vnto him, as it were of courteſie, to accompany him to the Counſell; but of truth ſent by the Protector, to haſte him thitherwards, with whom hee was of ſecret confederacy in that purpoſe, a meane man at that time, but now of great authority. This Knight, when it hapned the Lord Chamberlaine by the way to ſtay his horſe, and commune a while with a Priſt whom hee met in Towerſtrete, brake his tale, and ſaid merly to him; what my Lord, I pray you come on, wherto talke you ſo long with a Priſt, you haue no need of a Priſt yet, and therewith laughed vpon him, as though hee would ſay, yee ſhall haue ſoone. But ſo little wiſt the other what hee meant, and ſo little miſtruſted his preſent perill, as hee neuer was merrier, nor neuer ſo full of good hope in his life, which ſelfe thing is often ſeene a ſigne of change; but I ſhall rather let any thing paſſe me, then the vaine ſurety of mans mind to neere his death. Vpon the very Tower-wharfe, ſo neere the place where his head was ſtrooke off ſoone after, there met hee with one Hastings, a Perſeuant of his owne name. And of their meeting in that place, hee was put in remembrance of another time, in which it had happened them before, to meet in the like manner together in the ſame place. At which other time the Lord Chamberlaine had been accuſed vnto King Edward by the Lord Rivers the Queenes brother, in ſuch wiſe as hee was for the while, (but it laſted not long) ſarre fallen into the Kings indignation, and ſtood in great feare of himſelfe. And forasmuch as hee now mette this Perſeuant in the ſame place, that leopardy ſo well paſſed, it gaue him great pleaſure to talke with him thereof, with whom hee had before talked thereof in the ſame place, while hee was therein. And therefore hee ſaid, ah Hastings, art thou remembered that I met thee once here with a heavy heart? yea my Lord (quoth hee) thou remember I well, and thanked bee God, they got no good, nor you no great harme. Thou wouldſt ſay ſo (quoth he) if thou knew ſo much as I know, which few know elſe as yet, and more ſhall ſhortly. That ment hee by the Lords of the Queenes kindred, which were taken before, and ſhould that ſame day bee beheaded at Powſey: which hee well wiſt, but was nothing aware, that the axe hung ouer his owne head. In faith man (quoth he) I was neuer ſo ſorry, nor neuer ſood in ſo great dread of my life, as I did when thou and I met here. And loe, how the world is changed, now ſtand my enemies in the danger (as thou maist hap to heare more hereafter) and I neuer in my life fo merry, nor neuer in fo great surety. Oh good God, the blindness of our mortall nature, when he most feared he was in good surety, when he reckoned himselfe sure, he lost his life, and that within two houres after. Thus ended this honorable man, a good Knight and a gentle, of great authority with his Prince, of using somewhat dissolute, plaine and open to his enemies, and secret to his friends, easie to be beguiled, as he that of good heart & courage foreboded no perillous losing man, a passing well beloued: very faithful, and trusty enough, trusting indeed too much. Now flew the fame of this Lords death swiftly through the Citie, and from thence further, like a winde in euery mans eare.

(47) But the Protector immediately after dinner, intending to set some colour vpon the matter, sent in all haste for many substantiall men, out of the City into the Tower, at whose coming thither, himselfe with the Duke of Beckingham, blood harnessed in olde rusty brigandines, such as no man should weene, that they would vouchsafe to haue put on their backs, except that some suddain necessity, had constrained them thereto. And then the Protector shewed them, that the Lord Chamberlaine, and others of his conspiracy, had contriued to haue suddainly destroyed him and the Duke there the same day in Council. And what they intended further, was not yet well knowne. Of which their treason he neuer had knowledge, before ten of the clocke, the same forenoone, which suddain feare droue them to put on their defence, such hardnesse came next to hand: and so had God holpen them, that the mischief returned vpon them that would haue done it: and this he required them to report.

(48) Euerie man answered him faire, as though no man mistrusted the matter, which of truth no man beleued; y^er for the further appeasing of the peoples minde, he sent immediately after dinner, in all haste, an Herald of Armes, with a Proclamation to be made through the City in the Kings name, containing that the Lord Hastings with diuers others of his traitorous purpose, had before conspired the same day, to haue slaine the Lord Protector, and Duke of Beckingham, sitting in the Council, and after to haue taken vpon them, to rule the King and the Realme, at their owne pleasures; thereby to pill and spoile, whom they listed vncontrolled. And much matter there was in that Proclamation, deuised to the slander of the Lord Chamberlaine, as that he was an euill Counsellor to the Kings father, enticing him to many things, highly recondemning to his great dishonour, and to the vniuersall hurt of his Realme, by his euill company, sinister procuring, & vngracious example as well in many other things, as in the vicious liuing, and inordinate abusion of his body, both with many others, and especially with Shores wife, who was one also of his most secret Counsell, in this bawous treason, with whom hee lay nightly, and namely, the night last past, before his death, so that it was the lesse maruell, if vngracious liuing brought him to an vnhappy ending, which he was now put vnto, by the most dread commandement of the Kings highnesse, and of his honorable and faithfull Council, both for his demerits, being so openly taken in his falsely conceived treason, as also least the delaying of his execution, might haue encouraged other mischievous persons partners of his conspiracy, to gather and assemble themselves together in making some great commotion for his deliuerance, whose hope being now by his well-deserued death politically repressed, all the Realme should by Gods grace, rest in good quiet and peace.

(49) Now was this Proclamation made within two houres, after that he was beheaded, and was so curiously indited, and so faire written in parchment, in so well a set hand, and therewith of it selfe so long a processe, as euery child might perceiue, that it was prepared before. For all the time between his death, and the proclaiming, could scarce haue sufficed vnto the bare writing alone; had it bene but in paper, and scribbled forth in haste at aduerture. So that vpon the proclaiming thereof, one that was Schoole-master of Pauls, of chance standing by, and comparing the shortnes of the time, with the length of the matter, said vnto them that stood about him: Here is a gay gossie, whose soule cast away for hast: and a Merchant answered him, that it was written by Prophecie. Now then by and by, as it were for anger, not for courtousnesse, the Protector sent the Sherif of London, into the house of Shores wife (for her husband dwelled not with her) and spoiled her of all that shee had, about the value of three thousand marks, carrying her through London vnto the Tower, and there left her Prisoner, where (for fashion sake) he laid to her charge, that shee went about to bewitch him, and that shee was of Council with the Lord Chamberlaine to destroy him: in conclusion, when no colour could fasten vpon these matters, then laid hee hainously vnto her charge, the thing that hee selfe could not deny, that all the world was true, and that neithers euery man laughed at, to heare it then so suddainly, so highly taken, that shee was nought of her body. And for that cause (as a good conuenient Prince, cleare and faultlesse himselfe, sent out of heauen into this vicious world for the amendment of mens manners) after shee had laine Prisoner in Loadgate, becaused the Bishop of London to put her to open penance, going before the Crosse in procession vpon a Sunday, with a taper in her hand. In which shee went in countenance and pace demote so womanly, and albeit shee were out of all array save her kirtle only, yet went shee so faire and lovely, namely while the wondering of the people cast a comly tud in her cheekes (of which before shee had most mist) that her great shame, wan her much praise, among those that were more amorous of her body, then curious of her soule. And many good folk also that hated her liuing, and glad to see liue so corrected, yet pitied the more her penance, then reioiced therein, when they considered that the Protector procured it more of a corrupt intent, then any virtuous affection.

(50) This woman was borne in London, wretchedly friended, honestly brought vp, and very well married, suuing somewhat too soonely; her husband an honest Citizen, young, and goodly, and of good substance. But for asmuch as they were coupled ere shee were well ripe, these not very frantically loved, for whom shee neuer longed; which was happily the thing that the more made her incline vnto the Kings appetite, when he required her. Howbeit the respect of his totality, the hope of gay apparel, ease, pleasure and other wanton wealth, was able soone to pierce a soft tender heart. But when the King had abused her, among her husband (as he was an honest man, and one that could his good, not preferring so much a Kings concubine) left her vp to him altogether. When the King died, the Lord Chamberlaine tooke her, which in the Kings daies, albeit he was sore enamoured vpon her, yet he forbore her, either for reuerence, or for a certaine friendly faithfulness: proper shee was, and faire; nothing in her body that you could haue changed, vnlesse you would haue wished her somewhat higher. Thus they say that knew her in her youth. Albeit some that now see her (for as yett shee liueth) deeme her neuer to haue bene well viaged, whose iudgement seemeth to me somewhat like, as though we could gesse the beauty of one long before departed, by her scalp taken out of the Charnell house: for now shee is olde, leane, withered, and dried vp, nothing left but tucled skinned, and hard bone; and yet being euen face: who so well aduise her visage, might gesse and deuise, which parts how filled, would make it a faire face.

face. Yet delighted not men, so much in her beauty as in her pleasant behaviour, for a proper wit these had, and could both read well and write, merry in company, ready and quick of answer, neither mute nor full of babble, sometime taunting without displeasure, and not without disport: in whom King Edward took special pleasure, whose favour to say the truth (for lime it was to belie the Duel) the never abused to any mans hurt, but to many a mans comfort and relief, when the King took displeasure, she would mitigate and appease his mind; where men were out of favour, she would bring them in his grace, for many that highly offended she obtained pardon. Of great forfeitures she gave them remission. And finally, in many weighty suites shee found many men in great need, either for none, or very small rewards, and those rather gay then rich, either for that she was content with the deed it selfe well done, or for that shee delighted to see liued vno, and to see what shee was able to do with the King, or for that wanton women and wealthy, bee not alwayes courteous. I doubt not some shall thinke this woman too slight a thing to be written of, and let amongst the remembrances of great matters: which they shall specially thinke, that happily shall esteeme her only by that they now see her. But to my seeming, the chance is so much the more worthy to be remembered, in how much shee is now in the more beggerly condition, vntirend, and worne out of acquaintance, after good subsistence, after so great fauour with a Prince, after so great suite, and seeking to, of all those, that in those dayes had businesse to speeche, as many other men were in their times, which bee now famous only by the infamy of their ill deedes: her doings were not much lesse, albeit they bee much lesse remembered, because they were not so euill: for men vie, if they receive an euill turne, to write it in marble: and who so doth vs a good turne, we write it in the dust, which is not worst proued by her: for at this day shee beggers of many, at this day liuing, that at this day had begged if shee had not bene.

(11) Now it was so desired by the Protector and his Councell, that the selfe same day in which the L. Chamberlaine was beheaded in the Tower of London, and about the selfe same howre was then (not without his assent) beheaded at Fenfrat, the fore-remembered Lords and Knights, that were taken from the King at Northampton and Stony-Stratford; which thing was done in the presence, and by the order of Sir Richard Ratcliffe Knight, whose seruice the Protector specially vied in that counsell, and in the execution of such lawlesse enterprises, as a man that had bene long secret with him, hauing experience of the world, and a shrewd witte, short and rude in speech, rough and boisterous of behaviour, bolke in mischief, as farr from pity, as from all feare of God. This Knight bringing them out of prison to the Scaffold, and shewing to the people present, that they were Traitors, not suffering them to speake, or declare their innocency, left their wordes might haue inclined men to pity them, and so haue the Protector and his party, caused them hastily without Iudgement, proccesse or manner of order to bee beheaded, and without all guilt, but onely that they were good men, too true to the King, and too nigh to the Queene.

(12) Now when the Lord Chamberlaine, and thiole other Lords and Knights were thus beheaded and ridde out of the way: then thought the Protector, that while men mused what the matter meant, while the Lords of the Realme were about him out of their owne strengthes, while no man wist what to thinke, nor whom to trust, before they should haue space to dispute, and digest the matter, and make parties, it were best hastily to pursue his purpose, and put himselfe in possession of the Crown, ere men could haue time to deuise how to resist. But now was all the study, by what meanes the matter being of it selfe so hainous, might be first broken to the people in such wise as it might bee well taken. To this counsell they tooke diuers, such as they thought meet to bee trusted, likely to bee induced to that part, and able to stand them in stead, eyther by power or policy: Among whom they made of counsell Edmond Shea Knight, then Maior of London, who vpon trust of his owne aduancement, whereof he was of a proud heart, highly desirous, should frame the City to their appetite. Of Spiritual men they tooke such as had wit, and were in authoritie among the people, for opinion of their learning, and had no scrupulous conscience. Among these had they John Shea Clerke brother to the Maior, and Fryer Pinker Prociouall of the Augustine Fryers, both of them Doctors in Divinity, both great Preachers, both of more learning then verue, and of more fame then learning; for they were before greatly esteemed of the common people; but after that neuer. Of these two, the one made a Sermon in praise of the Protector before the Coronation; the other aiter, both full of tedious flattery, as no mans ear could abide them.

(13) Pinker in his Sermon so lost his voice, that hee was forced to leane off, and came downe in the middle. Doctor Shea by his sermon lost his honesty, and soone after his life, for very shame of the world, into which hee durst neuer after come abroad. But the Fryer forced for no shame, and so it harmed him the lesse. Howbeit some doubt, and many thinke, that Pinker was not of counsell in the matter before the Coronation, but after the common manner, fell to flattery aiter: namely, sith his Sermon was not incontinent vpon it, but at S. Maries Hospitall in the Easter week following. But certayne it is, that Doctor Shea was of counsell in the beginning, so farr forth as they determined that he should first breake the matter in a Sermon at Pauls Crosse, in which hee should by the authority of his preaching, incline the people to the Protector; ghoosly purpose. But now was all the labour and study, in the deuise of some convenient pretext; for which the people should bee content to depole the Prince, and accept the Protector for King. In which diuers things they deuided: but the chief thing and the weightiest of all, the inuention relied in this, that they should alledge bastardy, either in K. Edward himselfe, or in his children, or both. So that hee should seeme disabled to inherit the Crowne, by the Duke of York, and the Prince by him. To lay bastardie in King Edward, sounded openly to the rebuke of the Protector owne mother, who was mother to them both: for in that point could bee none other colour, but to pretend that his owne mother was an adulteresse, which notwithstanding to further the purpose hee leered not; but yet, hee would that point should bee lesse, and more fauourably handled, not fully plaine and directly, but that the matter should be touched allope, and craftily, as though men spard in that point to speake all the truth for feare of his displeasure. But the other point, concerning the bastardie that they deuised to surmise in K. Edwards children, that would hee should bee openly declared, and enforced to the uttermost. The colour and pretext whereof, was a contract pretended to be made by King Edward vnto the Lady Lacy, whereof we haue spoken in the raigne of the said King: which inuention how simple soeuer, yet it liked them, to whom it sufficed to haue somewhat to say, while they were fure to be compelled to no larger proof then themselves left to make.

(14) Now then it was by the Protector and his Councell concluded, that Doctor Shea should signifie in his sermon aforesaid, that neither King Edward himselfe, nor the Duke of Clarence were lawfully begot, nor were the very Children of the Duke of York, but begot vnlawfully by other persons, by adulterie of the Dutches their mother. And also that

The Maior of London made of the Protector his counsell.

Shee and Pinker were two of the Preachers.

Pinker preached at S. Maries Hospitall, and Doctor Shea at Pauls Crosse.

The plot and deuise how to surmise the bastardie to the Crowne.

The same story is the most probable.

K. Edward and his children made bastards.

Shere wife did much good, but no man hurt.

The Subiect not worthy to be written.

The flane of the world.

The Lords of the Queene's blood beheaded at Fenfrat.

The Protector thought to strike while the yeast was new.

that dame Elizabeth Lucy was verily the wife of K. Edward, and so the Prince and all his other children begot by the Queene, were all of them bastards. And according to this deuile Doctor Shaw vpon Sunday the nineteenth of Iune at Pauls Crosse in a frequent assembly, took for the theme of his sermō this saying, Speris vitalemus non agens radices altas: Bastardus flos fluitat necesse est deinde rore. Wherevpon, when he had shewed the great grace that God giueth, and secretly in funderth in right generation after the lawes of Matrimonie, then declared he, that commonly those children lacked that grace, and for the punishment of their parents, were for the more part vnhappy, which were begot in bafe, but specially in adultery. Of which though some by the ignorance of the world, and the truth hid from knowledge inherite for the time other mens lands, yet God alwaies so proudeth, that it continueth not in their blood long; but the truth coming to light, the rightfull inheritors be restored, and the bastards slip pulled vp ere it can take any deepe roote. And when he had said for the prooffe and confirmation of this sentence certaine examples taken out of the old testament, and other ancient histories, then he began to descend into the praise of the Loid Richard, late Duke of York, calling him the father to the Lord Protector, and declared the title of his heires vnto the Crowne, to whom it was after the death of King Henry the first, entailed by authority of Parliament. Then shewed he, that the verie right here of his body lawfully begotten, was only the Lord Protector. For he declared then that King Edward was neuer lawfully married vnto the Queene, but was before God, husband vnto Dame Elizabeth Lucy, and so his children bastards. And besides that, neither King Edward himselfe, nor the Duke of Clarence, among those that were secret in the household, were reckoned very certainly for the children of the Noble Duke, as boole that by their features, resembled other knowen men, more then him from whose vertuous conditions, he said also, that King Edward was farre off. But the Lord Protector he said, the very Noble Prince, the speciall pattern of Knightly prowesse, as well in all Princely behaviour, as in the lineaments and fauour of his visage, representing the very face of the noble Duke his father: This is he (quoth he) the fathers owne figure, this is his owne countenance, the verie print of his visage, the very vndoubted Image, and plain expresse likenesse of that noble Duke.

(55) Now it was before drifft, that in the speaking of these words, the Protector should haue come to among the people to the sermon ward, to the end that those words meeting with his presence, might haue bene taken among the hearers, as though the holy Ghost had put them in the Preachers mouth, and should haue moued the people euen then to be, King Richard, King Richard, that it might haue bene after said, that he was specially chosen by God, and in manner by miracle. But this deuile quailed, either by the Protectors ouersight, or by the Preachers ouer much diligence, for while the Protector stand by the way trying, lest he should present those words, and the Doctor fearing lest he should come ere his sermon could come to these words, halted his matter thereto, who was come to them and past them, and had entred into other matter ere the Protector came. Whom when he beheld coming, he suddenly left the matter with which he was in hand, and without aie deduction thereunto, out of all order, and out of all frame, began to repeat those words againe: This is the verie Noble Prince, the speciall pattern of Knightly prowesse, which as well in all Princely behaviour, as in the lineaments and fauour of his visage, representeth the very face of the Noble Duke of York his father: this is the fathers owne figure, this is his owne countenance, the very print of his visage, the sure vndoubted Image, the plain expresse likenesse of the noble Duke, whose remembrance can neuer die while he lineth. While these words were in speaking, the Protector accompanied with the Duke of Buckingham, went through the people, into the place where the Doctors commonly stand in an upper story, where he stood to heare the sermon. But the people were so farre from crying King Richard, that they stood as if they had bene turned into stones, for wonder of this shameful sermon. After which once ended, the Preacher got him home, and neuer after durst looke out for shame, but kept himselfe out of sight like an Owle. And when he once asked one, that had bene his old friend, what the people talked of him, albeit that his own conscience well shewed him that they talked no good, yet when the other answered him, that there was in euery mans mouth spoken of him much shame, it so strake him to the heart, that within few daies after, he withered and consumed away.

(56) On the Tuesday following this sermon, there came into the Guild hall in London the Duke of Buckingham, accompanied with his Lords & Knights, more perchance then knew the message which they brought. And there in the East end of the Hall, where the Maior keepeth the hallings, the Maior, and Aldermen being assembled about him, and all the commons of the City gathered before him: after silence commanded in the Protectors name vpon great paine, the Duke stood vp, and (as he was neither vnlearned, and of nature marvellously well spoken) hee said vnto the people with a cleare and loud voice in this manner. Friends, for the zeale and happy fauour that we beare you, we be come to breake vnto you, a matter of great weight, and no lesse weighty, then pleasing to God, and profitable to all the Realme: nor to no part of the Realme more profitable then to you the Citizens of this noble City. For why, the thing that we wot well you haue long time lacked, and so longed for, that you would haue giuen great good for, that you would haue gone farre to fetch, that thing we be come hither to bring you, without your labour, paine, cost, aduerture or iopardie. What thing is that? Certes, the liberty of your owne bodies, the quiet of your wises, and your daughters, the safeguard of your goods: of all which things in times past you stood enermore in doubt. For who was there of you all, that could account himselfe Lord of his owne goods, among so many sinners and traps as were let therefore, among so much pilling and polling, among so many taxes and tallages, of which there was neuer end, and often times no need: or if any were, it rather grew of riot, and vnreasonable wast, then any necessary or honorable charge: So that there was daily piling from good men and honest, great substance of goods to be lashed out among vnchrits, so farre forth that fiftieens sufficed not, nor any viall manner of known taxes: but vnder so euery name of beneuolence and good will, the Commissioners so much of euery man tooke, as no man could with his good will haue giuen. As though that name of beneuolence, had signified that euery man should pay not what himselfe of his owne good will list to grant, but what the King of his good will list to take. Who neuer asked little, but euery thing was haunred about the measure, amercements turned into fines, fines into ranfomes; small trespasses into misprision; misprision into treason. Whereof I thinke no man looketh that we should remember you of examples by name, as though Burdet were forgotten, who was for a wote in haste spoken, cruelly beheaded, by the misconstruction of the Lawes of this Realme for the Princes pleasure: with no lesse honour to Archibald then chief Justice, that left his office rather then be would assent to that iudgement, then to the dishonesty of those, that cyther for feare or flattery gave that iudgement. (57) When the Duke had sayd, & looked that the people who be hoped the Maior had framed before, should after this proposition made, haue cryed, King Richard, King Richard; all was hush and mute, and not a word answered thereunto: wherewith the Duke was manfully abashed, & taking the Maior neerer to him, with other that were about him praise to that matter, said vnto him softly, What meaneth this, that the people bee so silent? Sir (quoth the Maior) perchance they perceiue you not well, that shall we mend (quoth hee) if that will helpe. And by and by some that louder, hee rehearsed them the same matter againe, in other order and other words, so well and onerately, so suddenly and plainly, with voice, gesture, & countenance so comely, that euery man much maruailed that heard him, and thought they neuer had in their bearing, so euill a tale to well told. But were it for wonder or feare, or that each man lookt that other speake first, not a word was there answered of all the people that stood before, but was as still as the midnight, not so much as rowning among themselves, by which they might seeme to commune what was best to doe. When the Lord Maior saw this, hee with the other partners of that counsell drew about the Duke, and sayd, That the people had not beene accustomed there to bee spoken vnto, but by the Recorders; who is the mouth of the Citie, and happily to him they will answere.
 With that the Recorder called Fitz-William, a sad man and an honest, who was so newly come into that office, that hee neuer had spoken to the people before, and loth was with that matter to beginne, notwithstanding, thereunto commanded by the Maior, he made rehearsal to the commons, of that the Duke had twice rehearsed to them himselfe. But the Recorder so tempered his tale, that hee shewed euery thing as the Dukes words, and no part of his owne.
 But all this noyng, so change made in the people, which stood gazing at the bench as men altogether amazed. Wherupon the Duke rowned vnto the Maior, and said, This is maruailous obdinate silence, and therewith hee turned vnto the people againe with these wordes: Deare friends, wee come to moue you to that thing which peraduenture we not so greedily needed, but that the Lords of this Realme and the Commons of other parts might haue sufficed, fusing that wee beare you such loue, and so much let by your friendship, that wee would not willingly do without you the thing which is for our honour and your wealth, which as it seemeth, either you see not, or wey not: wherefore we require you, giue vs answere, whether ye be minded as all the nobles of the Realme bee, to haue this noble Prince now Protector, to be your King or not.

(58) At which words the people beganne to whisper among themselves feerely, that the voyce was neither loud nor distinct, but as it were the found of a swarme of Bees, till at the last, in the nether end of the hall, a host of the Dukes ser-uants, and Nathfields, and of others belonging to the Protector, with some premisses and ladders that thrust into the hall among the presse, beganne sodainely at mens backs to cry out as loud as their throats would giue, King Richard, King Richard, & threw vp their caps in token of ioy. But they that stood before, call backe their heades, marrelling thereat, yet nothing they said. And when the Duke and Maior saw this manner, they wisely turned it to their purpose, and said it was a goodly cry, and a ioyfull, to heare euery man with one voice, no man saying nay: wherefore friends (quoth the Duke) since that wee well perceiue that it is all your whole minds to haue this noble man for your King, whereof we shall make to his Grace so effectuall repert, that we doubt not, but it shall redound vnto your great weale, and commoditie: we require that to morrow you goe with vs, and with you vnto his Noble Grace, to make our humble request vnto him in manner before remembered. And therewith the Lords came downe, and the assembly dissolved for the most part sad, some with glad semblances, and yet not very merry, yea and some that came with the Duke, not able to dissemble their sorrow, were faine at his backe to carrie their face to the wall, while the dolour of their heart harrit out of their eyes.

(59) On the next morrow, the Mayor with all the Aldermen, and chiefe Commoners of the City in their best array, assembling themselves together, repaired vnto Baynards Caille in Thames street, where the Protector lay. To which place repaired also according to their appointment, the Duke of Buckingham, with diuers noble men with him, beside many Knights and other Gentlemen. And thereupon the Duke first went vnto the Lord Protector, of the being there of a great and honourable company, to moue a great matter vnto his Grace: whereupon the Protector made difficultie to come out vnto them, but if hee first knew some part of their errand, as though hee doubted, and partly distrustful the coming of such a number vnto him so sodainly, without any warning, or knowledge whether they came for good or harme; then the Duke when hee had shewed this vnto the Maior and other, that they might thereby see, how little the Protector looked for this matter; they then sent vnto him by the Messenger such loosing message againe, and ther-with so humbly besought him to vouchsafe, that they might resort to his presence, to propole their intent, which they would not impart to any other person; that at the last hee came out of his chamber, and yet not downe vnto them, but stood aboue in a gallery ouer them, where they might see him & speake to him, as though hee would not yet come too neere them, till hee vnderstood what they meant.
 And thereupon the Duke of Buckingham first made humble petition vnto him on the behalfe of them all, that his Grace would pardon them, and hence-ce them to propole vnto his Grace, the intent of their coming without his displeasure, without which pardon obtained, they durst not be so bold to moue him in their suite. In which albeit they meant as much honour to his Grace, as wealth to all the Realm beside; yet were they not sure how his Grace would take it, whom they would in no wise offend.
 Then the Protector (as he was very gentle of himselfe, and also longed fore to know what they meant) gaue him leaue to perouse what him liked, verily wrutling for the good mind that he bare them all, none of them would intend any thing to himward, wherewith hee ought to be grieved.

(60) When the Duke had this leaue and pardon to speake, then waxed hee bold to shew him their intent and purpose, with all the causes mouing them therunto, as you haue heard before: and finally, to beseech his Grace, that it would like him of his accustomed goodness and teale vnto the realm now with his eye of pity, to behold the long continued distresse, and decay of the same, and to fer his grations hands to redresse an amendment thereof, hy taking vpon him the Crowne and government of the land according to his right and title lawfully descended vnto him, and to the law of God, profit of the Realme, and vnto his grace so much the more honour, and lesse paine, in that, that neuer Prince reigned ouer any people that were so glad to lue vnder his obediēce, as the people of this land vnder his.

(61) When the Protector had heard the proposition, he looked very strangely thereat, and answered: That albeit it were, he partly knew the things by them alleged to be true, yet such intire loue he bare vnto King Edward and his children, that so much more he regarded his honour in other Realme about, then the Crowne of any one, of which he was neuer desirous that he could not finde in his heart in this point to incline to their desire. For in all other Nations where the truth was not well knowne, it would peraduenture be thought, that it was his own ambitions minde and deuile, to depose the Prince, and to take him selfe the Crowne, with which infamie he would not haue his honour stained for anie Crowne, in which he had euer perceived much more labour and paine, then pleasure to him that would to vse it, as he that would not, were not worthy to haue it. Notwithstanding he not only pardoned them the motion that they made him, but also thanked them for the loue and hartie fauour they bare him, praying them for his sake to giue and beare the same to the Prince, vnder whom hee was, and would be content to line, and with his labour and counsell, as farre as should like the King to vse him, he would doe his vtermoost endeouore to set the Realme in good state, which was already in this little time of his Protectorship (the praise be giuen to God) well begun, in that the malice of such as were before, occasion of the contrary, and of new intended to be, were now partly hy good pollicy, partly more hy Gods speciall prouidence, then mans prouision repressed.

(62) Vpon this answer giuen, the Duke by the Protector's licence, a little towne, as well with other noble men about him, as with the Maior and Recorder of London. And after that, vpon like pardon desired and obtained, he shewed aloud vnto the Protector for a final conclusion, that the Realme was at a point, King Edwards line should not any longer raigne ouer them, both for that they had so farre gone, as it was now no thirty to retreat, as for that they thought it was for the weale valuerfull to take that way, although they had not yet begun it. Wherefore if it would like his grace to take the Crowne vpon him, they would humbly beseech him therunto, if he would giue them a resolute answer to the contrary, which they would be loth to heare, then must they needs secke, and would not faile to finde some other noble man that would.

These words much mored the Protector, which else as eery man may know, would neuer of likelihood haue inclined therunto. But when he saw there was none other way, but that either he must take it, or else he, and his both goe from it, he said vnto the Lords and commons.

(63) Sith wee well perceiue that all the Realme is so set, wherof we he very forry, that they will not suffer in any wise King Edwards line to gouerne them, whom he earthly man can gouerne against their wills, and well we also perceiue, that no man there is to whom the Crowne can hy iust title appertaine, as to our selfe, as vry right here lawfully begotten of the body of our most deare father Richard late Duke of Yorke, to which title is now loined your election, the Nobles and Commons of this Realme, which we of all title possible take for the most effectual: we be content, and agree fauourably to incline to your petition and request, and according to the same, we here take vpon vs the roiall estate, preheminance, and kingdome of the two noble realmes, England and France, the one from this day forward, hy vs and our heires, to rule, gouerne, and defend; the other hy Gods grace, and your good helpe, to get againe and subdue, and establish for euer in due obedience vnto this Realme of England, the aduancement wherof we neuer ake of God longer to line, then we intend to procure. With this there was a great shoute, crying King Richard, King Richard. And then the Lords went vp to the King (for so was he from that time called) and the people departed, talking discretely of the matter, eury man as his fantasie gaue him.

(64) Much was talked, and marvelled at the manner of this dealing, that the matter was made so strange vnto both parties, as though they neuer had commened either with others before, when as themselves with there was no man so dull that heard them, but perceived well enough, that all the matter was so made betwixt them. Howbeit, some excused that againe, and said all must be done in good order: And men must sometimes for manners like, not be acknowen what they know: for at the consecration of a Bishop, eury man woteth well, hy the paying for his bulles, that he purpoeth to be one, and though he pay for nothing else, and yet must he twice be asked, whether he will be a Bishop or no, and hee must twice say nay, and at the third time take it, as compelled therunto by his owne will. And in a Stage-play the people know right well, that he who plaith the Sowdaine, is perforce a sower, yet if one should know so little good, to shew out of season what acquaintance he hath with him, and call him by his owne name, while he standeth in his maiesty, one of his tomentors might hap to heare his head worthily for marring of the plaie.

(65) The chainge of this young King may well be accounted an interregnum without King, as well for his minoritye here vnder the rule of a Protector himselfe, as for the short time wherein he continued the name of a King, which onlie was two monethes and sixteene daies, and in them also hee sine vnto crowned without Scepter or ball, all which Richard aimed at, and perfidiously got, before they could come to his head, or into his hands. His age at the death of his father and entrance into his throne was eleven yeres five monethes and five daies, and within three monethes after, was with his brother smothered to death in the Tower of London, as shall be shewed in his Raigne, of whom we are now by order of succession to write.

CHAPTER XIX.

Richard, the third sonne of Richard Duke of Yorke, born at Fotheringhay Castle in the County of Northampton, was first honoured with the title of Glocester, being the third Duke of that name, & consequently by usurpation crowned King of Eng- land, the third of that name, a name indeed noted to the Kings so called, to be ever ominous; and the title of Glocester to those Dukes ever fatal, all of them both, dying violent and untimely deaths, which ought to have beene the more fearefull unto Richard, now having possession and interest in them both. But that not regarded, or desliny enforcing, his aspiring mind gaue him no rest, till his restless body found it lastly in the grave. For his brother decaied when his life was most desired, no man to shew tooke his death so heauily as himselfe, or tendered the young King with a more honourable respect, when as (God knowes) his mind ronne vpon deepe reaches, how to compasse the weatch for his owne head; which the better to fushion, hee withdrew a while into the North, and at Yorke in most sad and solemne manner obserued the Funerals of the dead King: but howeouer the Maske covered this subtle Dokes face from the eie of the multitudes yet Buckingham how well knew the ambitious desire of his aspiring heart, and indeed was the Dedalus that made him the wings, wherewith he mooned to neere vnto the Son, as that the wax melting (like the high-minded young Icarus) he caught his last fall.

(2) What intendments they had before the Kings death, is vncertaine, though it may be suspected: but sure it is, he now gone, the Duke of Burgham first solicited Gloster by his messengers in the North, met him at Northampton himselfe, accompanied him to London forwarded him in Conseil, and was the first Actor in this following tragedy. For, first making him Protector, procuring his young Nephew forth of Sanctuary, disabing the young King, balladizing them both, perwading the Citizens, working the Nobility: and all this done, so left the Crowne vpon crooke Richards head, and so moulded their minds vnto the man, as they all became humble petitioners vnto him for to accept of the same: who in the meane while had well coned his owne part, by profuse liberalitie, by passing great grauity, by singular affability, by mouldring of iustice, and by deepe and close deuises, whereby hee wonne to himselfe the hearts of all, but the Lawyers especially, so serued best his turn, which was so affected, that in the name of all the States of the Realme, a Petition was drawne and presented him to accept the wearing of the Crowne: the true copy whereof as we find it recorded in the Parliament Roll, we haue inserted, & is as followeth.

Memorandum quod quondam bulla exhibita fuit coram Domno Rege in Parliamento predicto in hac verba:

Where late heretofore, that is to say, before the consecration, coronation, and inthronization of our foraigne Lord the King, Richard the third, a roll of parchment containing in writing certaine Articles of the Tenor vnderwritten on the behalfe, and in the name of the three Estates of this Realme of England, that is to wite, of the Lords Spirituall & Temporall, and of the Commons by name, and diuers Lords Spirituall and Temporall, and other Nobles and notable persons of the Commons in great multitude was presented and actually deliuered vnto our said Soueraigne Lord, the interur and effect exprest at large in the same roll: to the which Roll, and to the considerations, and instant petition comprised in the same, our said Soueraigne Lord for the publike weale and tranquility of this land benignely assented. Now forasmuch as neither the said three Estates, neither the said persons which in their name presented, and deliuered as it is aforesaid, the said Roll vnto our said Soueraigne Lord the King, were assembled in forme of Parliament, by reason whereof diuers doubts, questions, and ambiguities became moued, and engendered in the minds of diuers persons, as it is said: Therefore the perpetual memory of the truth, and declaration of the same, be it ordained, provided, and established in this present Parliament, that the Tenor of the said roll, with all the contents of the same, presented as is aforesaid, and deliuered to our foresaid Soueraigne Lord the King, in the name and in the behalfe of the said three Estates out of Parliament, now by the same three Estates assembled in this present Parliament, and by authority of the same be ratified, enrolled, recorded, approved, and authorized into remouing the occasions of doubts and ambiguities, and to all other lawfull effects that shall now thereof ensue: So that all things said, affirmed, specified, desired and remembered in the said roll, & in the tenor of the same vnderwritten in the name of the said 4 Estates, to the effect exprest in the same roll be of the like effect, vertue & force, as if al the same things had bin so said, affirmed, specified, desired & remembered in a full Parliament, and by authority of the same accepted & approved. The Tenor of the said Roll of parchment, wherof above is made mention, followeth, & is such.

*To the high and Mighty Prince

Please it your noble Grace to vnderstand the considerations, election and petition vnderwritten of vs, the Lords Spirituall & temporall, and Commons of this Realme of England, and therunto agreeably to giue your assent to the common and publike weale of this land, to the comfort and gladnesse of all the people of the same. First, we consider how that heretofore in time past, this land many yeers flood in great prosperity, honour, and tranquillitie, which was caused, forso much as the King then reigning, vied and followed the aduise and counsell of certaine Lords spiritiual and temporall, and other persons of approved fidelitie, prudence, policy, & experience, dreading God, and hating tender scale and affection to indifferent ministration of iustice, and to the common and publike weale of the land: Then our Lord God was doted, loued and honoured, then within the land was peace and tranquillity, and among neighbours concord and charity, then the malice of outward enemies was mightily resisted and repressed, and the land honourably defended with many great and glorious victories, then the intercourse of Merchants was largely vied and exercised: by which things about remembered, the land was greatly enriched, so that as well the Merchants and Artificers, as other poore people labouring for their linings in diuers occupations, had competent gaine to the sustentation of them & their households, lining without miserable and inolerable poeerty: but afterward, when that such as had the rule and gouernance of this land, delighting in adulation and flattery, and led by sensuality and concupiscence, followed the counsell of persons insolent, vicious, and of inordinate auarice, despising the counsell of good, vertuous, & prudent persons, such as above bee remembered, The prosperity of this land dayly decreased, so that felicity was turned into misery, and prosperity into aduersity, and the order of policy, and of the law of God and Man confounded, whereby it is likely this Realme to fall into extreme misery and desolation, which God defend, without due prouision of conuenient remedy bee had in this behalfe, in all goodly haile.

(3) Ouer this, among other things more speciall wee consider, how that the time of the reignes of K. Edward the fourth last decreased, after the vngariously pretended marriage (as all England hath cause so to say) made betwixt the said King Edward, and Elizabeth sometimes wife to Sir John Grey knight, late naming her selfe, and many yeeres heretofore Queene of England, the order of all politike rule was peruerced, the lawes of God, and of Gods Church, and also the lawes of nature, and of England, and also of the laudable customes and liberties of the same, wherein every English man is inheritor, broken, subuerted and contemned, against all reason and iustice, so that the land was ruled by selfe will and pleasure, feare and dread, all manner of equity and law laide apart and despised, whereof ensued many Inconueniences and mischiefs, as murders, extortions, and oppressions, namely of poore and impotent people, so that no man sure of his life, laud or liuelyhood, nor of his wife, daughter nor seruant, every good maiden and woman standing in dread to be rauished and deflowred: and besides this, what discords, inward battels, effusion of Christian mens blood, and namely, by the destruction of the Nobles bloud of this land, was had and committed within the same, it is euident and necessarie through all this Realme, vnto the great sorrow and heavinesse of all true Englishmen. And here also wee consider, how that the said pretended marriage betwixt the above named King Edward and Elizabeth Grey was made of great presumption without the knowing & assent of the Lords of this land, and also by force and witchcraft committed by the said Elizabeth and her mother Isabel Dutchesse of Bedford, as the common opinion of the people, and the publike voice and fame is through all this land: and hereafter if the cause shall require, shall be pro-

wed sufficiently in time and place convenient. And here also we consider how that the said pretended marriage was made privately and secretly without edition of banns in a private Chamber, a prophane place, and not openly in the face of the Church after the law of Gods Church, but contrary thereto, unto, and the laudable custome of the Church of England. And how also that at the time of contract of the same pretended marriage, and before and long time after the said King Edward was and should married, and troth-plight to one Dame Eleanor sister daughter of the old Earle of Hereford with whom the same Edward had made a precontract of Matrimonie long time before hee made the said pretended marriage with the said Elizabeth Grey, in manner and forme aforesaid: which Premises being true, as in very truth they be true: it appeareth, and followeth evidently, that the said King Edward during his life, and the said Elizabeth lived together sinfully and damnably in adultery against the law of God and of his Church: And therefore no marvell that the Sovereigne Lord and the head of this land being of such vngodly disposition, and prouoking the ire and indignation of our Lord God; such heinous mischiefe and inconueniences as are aboue remembered, were vied and committed in the Realme among the Subjects. Also it appeareth evidently and followeth, that all the Issue and children of the said King Edward, beeing bastard and vnable to inherit, or to claime any thing by inheritance, by the law and custome of England.

(4) Moreover, we consider how that afterwards by the three Estates of this Realme assembled in Parliament, holden at Westminster the 17. yeere of the reigne of the said King Edward the fourth, hee then being in possession of the Crowne and royall estate, by Act made in the same Parliament, George Duke of Clarence brother to the said King Edward now deceased, was conquered and attained of high treason, as in the same Act is contained more at large, by cause and reason whereof, all the Issue of the said George, was and is disabled and barred of all right and claime that in any case they might haue or challenge by inheritance to the Crowne and dignity royall of this Realme: by the ancient law and custome of this same Realme.

Over this we consider that yee be the vndoubted lome and heire of Richard late Duke of York, very inheritor of the sayd Crowne and dignity royall; and as in right King of England by way of Inheritance: and that at this time the premises duly considered there is none other person living, but yee only that by right may claime the said Crowne and dignity royall by way of inheritance, and how that yee be borne within this land; by reason whereof, as we deeme in our minde, yee be more naturally enclined to the proffertie and common weale of the same: and all the three estates of the Land haue and may haue more certaine knowledge of your birth and filiation aforesaid. We consider also the great wit, prudence, iustice, princely courage, and the memorable and laudable acts in diuers battels, which as wee by experience know you heretofore haue done, for the saluation and defence of this same Realme; and also the great noblenesse & excellencie of your birth and blood, as of him that is descended of the three most royall houses in Christendome: that is to say, England, France and Spain. Wherefore these premises by vs diligently considered, we desiring effectually the peace, tranquillitie and weale publicke of this Land, and the reduction of this same to the ancient honourable estate and prosperitie, and hauing in your great prudence, iustice, princely courage, and excellent vertue, singular confidence, haue chosen in all that in vs is, and by this our writing choole you High and Mightie Prince our King and Soueraigne Lord, &c. To whom we know for certaine it appertaineth of inheritance to be chosen. And herewith we humbly desire, pray, and require your most noble Grace, that according to this election of vs the three estates of this Land, as by your true inheritance, you will accept and take vpon you the sayd Crowne and royall dignitie, with all things thereto annexed and appertaining, as to you of right belonging aswell by inheritance as by lawfull election: and in case yee lo doe, we promise to serue and assist your Highnesse, as true and faithful subjects, and liegemen; and to liue and die with you in this matter, and in every other iust quarrel. For certaine, we be determined rather to adventure & commit vs to the perill of our liues, and teopardie of death, then to liue in such thraldome and bondage as wee haue liued long time heretofore oppressed and injured by emotions and newe impositions against the Law of God and man, and the liberte, old policie and Lawes of this Realme, wherein every Englishman is inherited. Our Lord God, King of all Kinges, by whose infinite goodnesse and eternal prouidence all things beeing principally gouerned in this world; lighten your soule, and grant you grace to doe aswell in this matter as in all other, that may be according to his will and pleasure, and to the common and publicke weale of this Land: so that after great clouds, trouble, stormes, and tempests, the Sun of Iustice and of Grace may shine vpon vs, to the comfort and gladnesse of all true-hearted Englishmen. Albeit, that the right, title, & estate, which our Soueraigne Lord the King, Richard the third hath to, and in the Crowne, and royall dignitie of this Realme of England; with all things thereto within the same Realme, and without it vniued, annexed & appertaining, bin iust and lawfull as grounded vpon the lawes of God and of nature: and also vpon the ancient lawes and laudable customes of this said Realme; and so taken and reputed by all such persons as beene learned in the aforesaid lawes and customes: Yet notwithstanding, forasmuch as it is considered, that the most part of the people is not sufficiently learned in the aforesaid Lawes and customes, whereby the truth & right in this behalfe of likelihood may be hid and not clearly knowne to all the people, & the question put in doubt and question. And ouer this, how that the Court of Parliament is of such authoritie, and the people of this Land of such a nature and disposition, as experience teacheth that manifestation and declaration of any truth or right made by the three estates of this Realme assembled in Parliament, and by the authority of the same maketh before all other things most feith and certaine, and quietting of mens minds, remoueth the occasion of all doobers, and seditious language. Therefore at the request, and by the assent of the three estates of this Realme; that is to say, the Lords spirituall and temporall, and Commons of this Land assembled in this present Parliament, by authority of the same be it pronounced, decreed, and declared, that our said Soueraigne Lord the King was, and is the very vndoubted King of this Realme of England, with all things thereto within the same Realme, and without it vniued, annexed, and appertaining aswell by right of Consanguinity, and inheritance, as by lawfull election, consecration, and coronation. And ouer this, that at the request, and by the assent and authority aforesaid, be it ordained, enacted and established, that the said Crowne and royall dignity of this Realme, and the inheritance of the same, and all other things thereto within the Realme or without, is vniued, annexed, and now appertaining, rest and abide in the person of our said Soueraigne Lord the King during his life, and after his decease, in his heires of his body begotten; and in especiall at the request, and by assent and authority aforesaid, be it ordained, enacted, established, pronounced, decreed, and declared, that the high and excellent Prince Edward, son of our said Soueraigne Lord the King, be heires apparent of the same our Soueraigne Lord the King to succeed to him in the aforesaid Crowne and royall dignity,

(1) Their things I have laid forth more at large out of the Parliament Roll, that ye may vnderstand both what and how great matters, the power of a Prince, the outward show of vertue, the wily fetches of Lawyers, fawning bowe, peniue feare, desire of change, and goodly pretences are able to effect, in that most wise assembly of all the States of a Kingdom, even against all law and right, so that the saying of Salomon in this State seemed most true that to buye dayes is better then to deaden. But this Richard is not to be accounted worthy to have been a Soueraigne, had not beene a Soueraigne as Galus was reputed; who, when he was a Soueraigne, deceived all mens expectation; but most worthy in deede of Soueraigne, had hee not bene transported with ambition (which blasted all his good parts) by lewde practises, and by mischievous means, made foule way therunto: for that by the common consent of all that are wise, he was reckoned in the ranke of bad men, but of good Princes; as indeed King Richard through his short time of raigne is accounted to haue bene.

(6) The Crown and Scepter accepted as is said, King Richard vpon the twentie fifth of June, went in great pompe vnto Westminster hall, and there in the Kings Bench Court took his Seat, saying, that he would take vpon him the Crowne in that place, where the King himselfe ought to sit, whose chiefe duty was to administer Iustice to his people, and with a pleasing Oration so tickled the eares of his Auditors, that he killed the rursell to thinke that his like had neuer raigned in England; and so begonne himselfe with a pretended clemency, he pronounced pardon of all offences committed against him; for confirmation whereof, hee sent for one Fogge whom hee deadly hated, who for feare of him had lately taken Sanctuary at Westminster, and there in sight of the people with semblance accordingly, took him by the hand saying, that hee would bee thenceforth his assured in affection; wherat the Commons greatly reioyced, and with applauses extolled, though others wiser among them rooke it to bee but faised to serue his owne turne. And in his way homeward, whomsoever hee met, hee saluted: for a mind that knoweth it selfe to bee guiltie, is in a manner directed to a seruile flattery.

(7) King Richard whose guilty heart was full of suspicion, had sent for three thousand Souldiers out of the North to bee present in London at his Coronation; thefe vnder the leading of Robin of Biskdale, came vp both euill apparelled, and worke harnessed, in rually Armour, neither defensible for prooffe, nor feared for thefe: who mustering in Finsburie Fields, were with disdain gazed vpon by the beholders. But all things now ready for his Coronation (and much the sooner in that young Edwards prouision was conferred vpon his) vpon the fourth of July, he with his wife by water came to the Tower, where he created Estates, ordained the Knights of the Bathe, set at liberty the Archbishops of York, and the Lord Stanley, mote for feare then for loue, whose sonne the Lord Strange was then said to be gathering of men in Lancashire, whete those Lords haue great command.

(8) But Mortimer Bishop of Ely a firme man vnto King Edward, and vnpossiblet to bee drawn vnto the dissembling of his children, as was well perceived by the Protector, among others, at the Council held in the Tower, was left there prisoner, and accused of many great, but vnlikely treasons. This man borne in Derbyshire, and brought vp in the Vniuersity of Oxford, was from a Doctor of the Artes made a priuy Councellour vnto King Henry, and after his death althard by King Edward to lueue him, was sworn likewise of this Council, and made one of the Executors of his will: whose insight into the intended designs, the Protector much feared, and therefore hauing him fast minded too to keepe him, when hee released others laide in the Tower for the like feare. But the reuerence of the man, or vnderstanding of his wrongs, moued so the affection of the Oxford Academians, that they directed to the King (who professed much lone to that Vniuersitie) a petytory latine Epistle, no lesse eloquent & pithy, then circumspect and wary, wherein they thus pleaded for his liberty.

(9) Though many important motives we haue most Christian King, earnestly to commend to your princely clemency, the Reuerend Father in Christ, the Lord Bishoppe of Ely, as being not only one of the most eminent Sonnes of our Vniuersity, but also a singular Patrone and indulgent Father to vs all; yet could not these inducements (howe soeuer very ponderous with all grasse, fit mindes) perswade vs to become intercessors for his pardon, but euer with due regard both to your owne honour and safety; the great necessity of your princely fauours hauing more obliged vs, then of any your royall Predecessors; whilst therefore we stood in some doubt, how we should affected to your Highness, we held it an high offence, if by tendering his safety, we should any way hazard yours: but now vnderstanding, that his offence proceeded, not of petycacy, but humane frailty; and that hee hath alwayes humbly sued for pardon thereof, the bowels of our most vniuersitary, like Rachel weeping ouer her Children were moued with compassion ouer the deplored distress of this her deereft sonne; where in yet (as wee hope) her affection deserues no full reprehension. For if a pious affection be prayse-worthy, euen an enemy, much more is it in this our Academy, full of due obseruance towards your Majesty, and professing the study of all vertues. These things so being, we thought fite, (without longer delayes) to flie vnto your clemency, as humble Suppliants, that your Highness already hauing in part inflicted (though mildly) some chastisement on his fault would turn your royal aspect towards him, & impart to him the bounty of your gracious clemency; wherein, you shal not only performe an act most acceptable to him, to vs, and the whole Church, but very honourable & aduantageous also (as we hope) to your own person. For, vpon notice of the readynesse of so great a Prelate into your grace, who is there, that will not extoll with prayes vnto the skies your so great, and euen diuine clemency? Thus glorified the Romans, to haue it marshalled amongst their prayes, that Salustiane wights they spared, but strait the proud; and this also they challenged as their peculiar honour, that they were readier to remit, then to reuenge wrongs. Now if you will aspire to this high honour, (as easily you may, by being gracious to this man) you shal surmount the Romans themselves by so glorious a deed. As for the great benefite which may hereby accrue to your "your highnes, albeit(as we suppose) we can suffici-

"minde his singular vertues; yet had we rather leaue "that point wholly to, your secret considerations, "then pursue it with a discourse tedious to you, and
"enue-breeding to him: least happily by iustifying "in his praises, it may be thought, that we seeke ra"ther by violence to extort, then by submissiuenes to "beg his pardon, and ur selfe to relie more on the "greatnesse of his vertues, then of your Clemency, or
"lastly to appeale rather to your iustice, then to "your mercy. Wherefore (most puissant Prince) "thus perswade yout selfe of vs, that whatsoever
"we haue spoken in the Bishops behalfe, we doe it

(11) The next day with great pompe, state and "attendance of the Nobility, the King rode through "London, so as a more royall had not bene scene at an-
"ny Kings Coronation for there attended him, three "Dukes, nine Earles, two Vicounts, twenty Lords, fiftie "eighth Knights, all of them most richly furni"shed, whereof the Duke of Buckingham so farre ex"ceeded, that the caprison of his horse was so charg"ed with embroydered worke of gold, as it was born
"vp from the ground by certaine his footmen thereto "appointed. And contrary to my owne affections, "or manner of my former proceedings, I will yet con"tinue the most honorable offices performed at his

"these Lords assembled to set the Crowne vpon the "young Princes head, were so suddainly carried to "Crowne his Protector, and that vpon such false and "slandorous pretences, as euery one of them saw his

"may be scene, that we are all the issues of Adam,
"and in times of extremities, foreshew all possible re"gard, as ouermuch fearing our priuate and present

(12) Vpon the sixt of Iuly, King Richard with "Queene Anne his wife set forth from White-hall to"wards Westminster, royally attended, and went into "the Kings bench in the great hall, from whence him"selfe and Queen vpon ray Cloth, both of them bare"footed, went vnto King Edwards shrine in Saint Pe"ters Church, all the Nobility going with him in "their degree, the trumpets and Heraulds marshalling
"the way, the Crosse with a solemne procession fol"lowed, the Priests in fine surplices and gray Antyffes "vpon them, the Bishops and Abbots in rich Copes "all of them myrted, and carrying their Crosses in "their hands; next came the Earle of Huntingten bea"ring a paire of gilt spures signifying Knight hood; af"ter whom came the Earle of Bedford, who bare Saint "Edwards staffe for a Relique, then followed the Earle "of Northumberland with a naked pointed sword in his "hand betokening mercy, next whom the Lord Stan"ley bare the Mace of the Constableness, vpon whose "right hand the Earle of Kent bare a naked pointed "sword, and on his left hand the Lord Camell the like "naked pointed sword, the former signifying iustice to"wards the temporality, & the other iustice to the Clergy;
"the Duke of Suffolke then followed with the Scepter, "which signified Peace: the Earle of Lincoln bare the "Ball and Crosse which signified a Mercie: Then came the Earle of Surrey bearing the fourth sword "sheathed in a rich scaberd, and is called the sword of "Estate, next whom followed Garter King at Armes, "vpon whose right hand went the Gentleman Vtcher "of the Kings priuy Chamber, and on his left the "Lord Maior of London, with a Mace in his hand;

"Next vnto whom went the Duke of Norfolke bearing "the Kings Crowne betwix his hands, and then King
"Richard himselfe came, in a Sarvate and Robe of pur-

"Ladies of estate most richly attired. In this order ranne. For albeit the Barke of his begynne adventures, had without perill well passed the straightes, and now got sea-roume to spread saile at will; yet being vnder gale, and at fortunes dispose, he feared the gullt of euery wind: at leastwise suspected that his young Nepheues liuing would stay the course of his deeper reaches, as doth the little fish Remora, who boldeth (as at Anchor) the biggest shippe vnder saile. His inward study therefore still forged, howeuer his outward countenance was carried to cleare his passage by taking those dangerous lets away, well knowing, that his little Nepheues enjoying their liues, men would be meddling with their downe cast cause, and account him an vniurper without all right to the Realme. To stop which stream, no other course could hee find, but to cut off the current by which it ranne, as though the killing of his Kindmen could better his bad claime, or vnkindly murder make him a kindly King. But being reioiced, he forthwith sent one Iohn Greene a lieutenant in especiall trust vnto Sir Robert Brakenbury Constable of the Tower, with a letter of credence, that the same Sir Robert should in any wise put the two children to death.

(16) This Greene thus posted to London, deliuered his errand vnto Brakenbury, whom hee found kneeling at his Orizons before the Image of our Lady in the Tower, the businesse being of such weight as the King must be serued before hee had called with his Saint. The Constable reading the letter, and perceiving the bloody intent of the King, answered plainly, he would neuer put those innocent bribes vnto death, to die therefore himselfe. With which answer Iohn Greene returning, recounted the same to King Richard being at Warwick, yet in his way to Gloster, wherewith he was marvellously perplexed, and thereto took such displeasure, that the same night hee said to a secret Page of his: As in how shall a man trust? those that I haue brought up my selfe, those that I had trusted would most surely serue me even those false me, and at my commandment will do nothing. Sirquoth the Page, there lyeth one on your Pallier without, that I dare well say, to doe your Grace pleasure, the thing were right hard that hee would refuse; meaning this by Sir James Tirrell, who was a man of a goodly personage, and for Nature's gifts worthy to haue reioiced a much better Prince, if he had well serued God, and by grace obtained as much trust and good will, as hee had strength and wit.

(17) The man had an high heart, and fore longed vpward, not rising yet so fast as hee hoped, being hindred and kept vnder by the means of Sir Richard Ratcliffe, and Sir William Catesby, who longing for no more partners of the Princes fauour, and namely, not for him, whose pride they knew would beare no Peere, kept him by secret drifts out of all secret trust, which thing this Page had well marked and known: wherefore this occasion offered of very speciall friendship, hee took his time to put him forward, and by such wife to doe him good, that all the enemies hee had, except the Dinell himselfe could neuer haue done him so much hurt. For vpon this Pages words, K. Richard arose (for this communication had hee sitting at the draught, a convenient Carpet for such a Counsell) and came out into a Pallier-Chamber, where hee found in bed, Sir James and Sir Thomas Tirrell, of persons much like, and brethren in blood, but nothing of kin in conditions: Then said the King merrily to them, what Sire, be ye in bed so loose and calling vp Sir James, brake to him secretly his mind in this mischievous matter, in which hee found him nothing strange. Wherefore on the morrow hee sent him to Brakenbury with a letter, by which hee was commanded to deliuer Sir James all the keyes of the Tower for one night, to the end hee might accomplish there the Kings pleasure in such things as hee had giuen him in commandment. After which letter deli-uered, and the keyes received, Sir James appointed the night next ensuing to destroy them, devising before and preparing the means.

(18) The Prince in the Tower slenderly attended, and altogether neglected by the Nobility, lailly, had news that his vnkle had left the name of Protector, and taken vpon him the Title of King, who with full content of the Lords was to be crowned within a few daies following, with the same Crowne, and in the like estate as had bene provided for his solemnity, whereto the detected innocent sighted and said, Alas! I would my vnkle would let mee enioy my life yet, though I lose both my Kingdome and Crowne. Which words hee pronounced with such a feeling force, as much moued the Relator to pity, and to perfwade him with the best comfort hee could: but forthwith the Prince and his brother were both shut vp, and all attendants removed from them, onely one called Black-will, or William Slaughter excepted, who was left to serue them, and see them fare. After which time the Prince neuerited his points, nor cared for himselfe, but with that young Babe his brother lingered with thought and heavinesse, till their traitorous deaths deliueied them out of that wretchednelle: for the execution wherof, Tirrell appointed Atiles Ferrell, one of the foure that kept them, a fellow flattered in murder before time. To whom hee ioined one Iohn Dighton his bookekeeper, a bigger boord, square kane.

(19) About midnight (all others being removed from them,) this Atiles Ferrell, and Iohn Dighton, came into the Chamber, and suddenly wrapped vp the seely children in the Bed-clothes, where they lay keeping by force the feather-bed and pillows hard vpon their mouths that they were therein smothered to death, & gave vp to God their innocent soules into the ioues of heauen, leaving their bodies vnto the Tormentors dead in the bed: which after these monstrous wretches perceived, first by the strugling with the paines of death, and after long lying still to be thorowly dispatched, they laid their bodies naked out vpon the bed, and then fetched Sir James their inligator to see them, who caused these murderers to bury them at the staires foot, somewhat deepe in the ground, vnder a great heape of stones. Then rod Sir James in halbe to the King, vnto whom hee shewed the manner of their death, and place of buriall, which newes was so welcome to his wicked heart, as hee greatly reioiced, and with great thanks deliued (as some hold) this his mercuries instrument, knight. But the place of their buriall hee liked not, saying, that vile corner should not containe the bodies of those Princes, his Nepheues, & commanded them a better place for buriall, because they were the sons of a King. Wherupon the Priest of the Tower tooke vp the bodies; and secretly interred them in such place, which by the occasion of his death could neuer since come to light.

(20) The continuor of Iohn Harding tells vs from the report of others, that King Richard caused Sir Robert Brakenbury Priest to close their dead corpes in lead, and so to put them in a coffin full of holes, and hooked at the ends with two bookes of iron, and so to call them into a place called the Blacke-deepes at the Thames mouth, whereby they should neuer rise vp, or be any more scene. Wherefore they were buried, thus they died, and by these murderers. For very certaine it is, and well knowne, that at such time, as Sir James Tirrell was in the Tower, for Treason committed against King Henrie the seventh, both Dighton and hee were examined, and confessed the murder in manner as is said, but whether their bodies were removed they could not say. And thus as I haue learned of them that knew much, and little cause had to lie, were these two noble Princes, these innocent tender children, borne of most iust blood, brought vp in great wealth, likely to haue liued, to haue reigned, and ruled in the Realme, by traitorous tyranny taken, deprived of their states, shortly thus vp in prison and impiously murdered, and the body cast on God wot where, by the cruel ambition of their unnatural uncle, and his hellish Tormentors. Which things on every part well pondered; God neuer gaue this world a more notable example, neither in what vnsurety standeth this worldly weale, or what mischiefeth worketh the proud enterprise of an high heart, or finally, what wretched end ensueth such barbarous crueltie.

(20) For first to begin with the Ministers, Miles Forrester and S. Martin, peace-meale rotted away; Sir James Tyrrell died at Tower hill for treason. Deighton indeed walketh on alive in good possibility to be hanged ere he die, lying at Calow no lesse distained and hated then pointed at of all. King Richard himselfe as ye shall hereafter heare, was slaine in the field, hacked and bewed of his enemies hands, carried on horsebacke dead, his haire in despite torne and tugged like a Curie dogge: and the mischiefeth that he tooke was within lesse then three yeres of the mischiefeth that he did, and yer all the meane time spent in much paine and trouble outward, and much feare, anguish, and sorrow within. For I haue heard by credible report of such as were secret with his Chamberlaine, that after this abominable deed done, he neuer had quiet in his minde: he neuer thought himselfe sure: but where he went abroad, his eies ener-whirled about, his body priuily fenced, his hand euer on his dagger, his countenance & manner like one alwaies ready to strike againe, he tooke threst a nights, lay long waking and musing, fore wearied with care and watch, rather slumbered then slept, troubled with fearful dreames, suddainly sometimes start vp, leapt out of his Bed, and ranne about the chamber, so was his restlesse heart continually tossed and combled with the tedious impression and stormy remembrance of his abominable deed. Neither had he in his best, any time of quiet, for immediately began the conspiracy (or rather good consideration) between the Duke of Buckingham, and diuers other Gentlemen against him.

(21) Which Duke alsoone as Glocester vpon the death of King Edward came to York, sent thither in secret wise a trusty seruante of his, named Perisall, to assure him, that he would take his part in this his new world, and if need were, would waite vpon him with a thousand good-fellowes: and againe sent offers of the like vnto Nottingham, whither the Protector from York, with many Gentlemen of the North Countrey was come, and on his way to London ward in secret manner met him himselfe, but at Northampton openly with three hundred horsemen from thence still continued with him, being a partner of all his deuises, till that after his coronation they departed (as it seemed) very great friends at Glocester: first whence as soone as the Duke came home, he so lightly turned from him, and so highly conspired against him, that a man would maruell whereof the change grew. And surely the occasion of their variance is of diuers men diuersely reported: Some haue said, that the Duke a little before the Coronation, among other things, required of the Protector, the Duke of Hereford Lands, to the which he pretended himselfe inheritor. And forasmuch as the Title which he claimed by inheritance, was somewhat interlaced with the title of the Crowne, by the line of King Henry before deperied, the Protector conceived such indignation, that he reiecteth the Dukes request, with many spightfull and minatory wordes, which so wounded his heart with hatred and mistrust, that he neuer after could indure to looke a right on King Richard, but ever feared his owne life, so farre forth, that when the Protector rode through London towards his Coronation, he fained himselfe sicke, because he would not ride with him: And the other taking it in euill part, sent him word to rise, and come ride, or he would make him to be carried. Whereupon hee rode on with an euill will, and that notwithstanding on the morrow rode from the Feint, faining himselfe sick, wherent King Richard said, it was done in hatred and despite of him. And they say, that euer after continually each of them liued in such hatred and distrust of other, as the Duke verily looked to haue bene murdered at Glocester: from which neighbourhood he in faire manner deperied. But surely some right secret at this day denie this: and many right wise men thinke it valikely (the deepe dissembling nature of both those men considered, and what need in that greene world the Protector had of the Duke, and in what perill the Duke stood, if he fell once in suspicion of the Tyrant) that either the Protector would giue the Duke occasion of displeasure, or the Duke the Protector occasion of mistrust. And verily men thinke, that if King Richard had any such conceived opinion, he would neuer haue suffered the Duke to haue escaped his hands.

(22) The very truth is, Buckingham was an high minded man, and could euill beare the glory of another; so that I haue heard of some that say it, that the Duke at such time as the Crowne was first set vpon the Protectors head, his eye could not abide the sight thereof, but writhed his face another way. But men say, that hee was of such not well at ease which to King Richard was well knowne, and nothing ill taken, nor any demand of the Dukes vnconsciously reiecteth, but he both with great gifts and high benefits in most losing and trustie manner, departed at Glocester. But soone after his coming home to Brecknock, having there in custody by the commandement of King Richard, Doctor Martin Bishop of Ely, who (yee before heard) was taken in the counsell at the Tower, waxed with him familiar: whose wisdom abused his pride to his owne deliuerance, and the Dukes destruction.

(23) This Bishop was a man of great naturall wit, very well learmed, and honourable in behaviour, lacking no wise waies to winne fauour: he had been fast vpon the part of King Henry, while that part was in wealth; and notwithstanding left it not, nor forsooke it in woe, but staid the Realme with the Queen & the Prince, while King Edward had Henry in prison, and neuer came home but to the field. After which lost, and that side vtterly subdued, the other for his fast faith and wisdom not only was content to receiue him, but also wooed him to come, and had him from thence forth both in great secret trust, and very special fauour, which he nothing deueiled. For he being (as you haue heard) after King Edward death, first taken by the Tyrant for his truth to the King, found the meanes to set this Duke in his top, joined Gentlemen together in aide of King Henry, deuiling first the marriage between him and King Edward daughter: by which his faith, he declared the good seruice to both his masters at once, with infinite benefit to the Realme, by the coniunction of those two bloods in one; whose seuerall titles had long time disquieted the Land, hee fled the Realme, went to Rome, neuer minding more to meddle with the world, till the noble Prince King Henry the seventh got him home againe, made him Archbishop of Canterbury and Chancellor of England, wherunto the Pope ioined the honour of a Cardinal. Thus liuing many dayes in as much honour, as one man might well wish, ended then so godly, that his death with Gods mercy, well changed his life.

(24) This man therefore, as I was about to tell you by the long and often alternate prooffe, swell of prosperitie as aduersie fortunes, had gotten by great experience (the very mother or mistress of Wisdom) a deepe insight in policie worldly drifts. Whereby perceiuing now this Duke glad to commune with him, fed him with laire wordes, and many pleasant praises. And perceiuing by the proceffe of their communication, the Dukes pride now and then baile out a little bread of enuy, towards the glory of the King, and thereby feeling him easie to fall out, if the matter were well handled: hee craftily sought sought the wayes to picke him forward, taking alwayes the occasion of his coming, and keeping himselfe so close within his bounds, that hee rather seemed to follow then to leade him. For when the Duke first began to praise & boast of the King, and shew how much professe the Realme should take by his raigne; Mortou answered thus: Surely my Lord, folly it were for me to lye, for if I would sweare the contrary, your Lordship would not ween I beleuee, but that if the world would haue gone, as I could haue wished, King Henries son had had the Crowne, and not King Edward. But after that God had ordered him to lose it, and King Edward to raigne, I was neuer so mad, that I would with a dead man strive against a quicke. So was I to King Edward a faithfull Chaplaine, and glad would haue bene, that his child should haue succeeded him. Howbeit, if the secret iudgement of God haue otherwise provided, I purpose not to dispute against the pnce, nor labor to set vp, that God putteth downe. And as for the late protector and now King, and euen there he left saying, that hee had already medled too much with the world, and would from that day meddle with his Booke and his Beades, and no further.

(24) Then longed the Duke fore to heare what he would haue said, because he ended with the king, and there so suddainly stopped, and exhorted him so familiarly betweene them twaine, to be bolde to say whatsoeuer he thought, whereof he faithfullly promised there should neuer come hurt, and peraduenture more good then he would weene, and that himselfe intended to vse his faithfull secret advice and counsell, which he said was the only cause for which he procured of the King to haue him in his custody, where he might account himselfe at home, and else had he bene put in the hands of them with whom he should not haue found the like fauour. The Bishop right humbly thanked him and said: In good faith my Lord, I loue not to talke much of Princes, as a thing not all out of perill, though the word be without fault. Forasmuch as it shall not be taken as the party meant it, but as it pleaseth the Prince to construe it. And euer I think on Asps tale, that when the Lyon had proclaimed vpon paine of death there should no horned beaſt abide in the wood, one that had in his forehead a bunch of flesh, fled away a great pace. The foxe who saw him runne so fast, asked him whether he made all that haile; and he answered, In faith, neither wor, nor reck, for I was once hence, because of this Proclamation made against horned beaſts. What foole (quoth the Foxe) thou maist abide well enough, the Lion meant not thee, for it is no borne that is in thy head. No mary (quoth he) that was I well ynough, but what if he call it a borne, where am I then? The Duke laughed merrily at the tale, and said, my Lord I warrant you, neither the Lion nor the Boare shall picke any matter at any thing here spoken, for it shall neuer come to their eares. In good faith Sir, said the Bishop, if it did, the thing that I was about to say, (taken as well as afore God I meant it) could delerue but thanks; and yet taken as I weene it would, might happily turne me to litle good, and you to lesse. Then longed the Duke yet more to wit what it was; whereupon the Bishop said, in good faith my Lord, as for the late Protector, sith he is now King in possession, I purpose not to dispute his title, but for the weale of this Realme, wherein his Grace hath now the gouernance, and my selfe am a poore member, I was about to wish, that to those good abilities, whereof he hath already right many, litle needing my praise, it might yet haue pleased God for the better flure, to haue giuen him some of such other excellent vertues meet for the rule of a Realme as our Lord hath planted in the person of your Grace: and there left againe.

(25) The Duke somewhat maruailing at this suddaine pause, said: My Lord, I note your often bre-

things and suddaine stopping in your communication; so that to my intelligence, your wordes neither come to any direct or perfect sentence in conclusion, whereby either I might haue knowledge what your intent is now towards the King, or what affection you beare towards mee. For the comparison of good qualities ascribed to vs both, maketh mee not a litle to muse, thinking that you haue some other priue imagination imprinted in your heart, which you bee ashamed to disclose, and specially to mee, which on my honour doe assure you to be as secret in this case as the deafe and dumbe person to the finger, or the Tree to the Hunter. The Bishop being somewhat bolder, considering the Dukes promise, but most of all animated, because hee knew the Duke desirous to be magnified, and also he perceived the inward hatred which hee bare towards King Richard, hee opened his stomacke to the bottom, and said: My singular good Lord, sith the time of my captiuitie, which being in your graces custody, I may rather call it a libertie, then a strait imprisonment, in auoiding of idlenesse mother of all vices, in reading bookes and aneient pamphlets, I haue founde this sentence written, that no man is borne free and at libertie of himselfe onely: for one part of dueie he oweth to his parents, another part to his friends and kindred, but the nature Countrey in the which he first tasted this pleasant & flattering world, demandeth a debt not to be forgotte. Which saying, causeth mee to consider in what case the Realme, my natue Countrey, now standeth, and in what estate and assurance before this time it hath continued, what gouernour we now haue, and what ruler wee might haue; for I plainly perceiue (the Realme being in this case) must needs decay, and be brought to confusion: but once hope I haue, that is, when I consider your noble personage, your iustice and indifferencie, your feruent zeale and ardent loue towards your naturall Countrey; and in like manner, the loue of your countrey towards you, the great learning, pregnant wit, and eloquence, which to much doth abound in your person; I must needs thinke this Realme fortunate, which hath such a Prince in floure, meete and apt to bee Gouernour. But on the other side, when I call to memory the good qualities of the late Protector, and now called King, so violated by ryanry, so altered by vsurped authoritie, and so clouded by blind ambition, I must needs say, that hee is neither meet to bee King of so noble a Realme, nor so famous a Realme meet to be gouerned by such a tyrant. Was not his first enterprise to obtaine the Crowne, begunne by the murder of diuers personages? did hee not secondarily proceed against his owne naturall mother, declaring her openly to be a woman giuen to carnall affection and dissolute liuing? declaring furthermore, his two brethren and two Nephewes to bee bastards, and vs bee borne in adultery? yet not contented, after hee had obtained the Garland, he caused the two poore innocents his Nephewes, committed to him, to be most shamefully murdered: the blood of which litle babes daily cry to God from the earth for vengeance. What fury can be in this Land to any person, either for life or goods, vnder such a cruell Prince, which regardeth not the destruction of his owne blood, and much lesse the losse of others. But now to conclude, what I meane towards your noble person, I say & affirme, if you loue God, your lineage, or your natue countrey, you must your selfe take vpon you the Crowne of this Realme, both for the maintenance of the honour of the same, as also for the deliuerance of your naturall countrymen from the bondage of such a tyrant. And if your selfe will refuse to take vpon you the Crowne of this Realme, then I assure you by the faith you owe vnto God, to deuise some wayes how this Realme may bee brought to some conuenient regiment, vnder some good Gouernour. ended his saying, the Duke sighed, and spake vnto of a great while, so that night they communed no more.

(16) The next day the Duke sent for the Bishop, to whom hee said, My Lord of Ely, I must needs in hart thinke, and with mouth confesse, that you bee a sure friend, a true counsellor, and a very loue of of your country. And fith that at our last commu- nication, you haue disclosed the secrets of your hart touching the now vsurper of the crown, & also haue alittle touched the aduancement of the two noble families of Turke and Lancaster, I shall likewise de- clare vnto you my pitie intents and secret cogita- tions. And to beginne, when King Edward was deceased, I then began to studie, and with delibera- tion to ponder in what manner this Realme should be gouerned: I perfwaded with my selfe to take part with the Duke of Glocester, whom I thought to be as cleane without dissimulation, as tractable without iniurie, and so by my means he was made Protector both of the King and Realme, which authoritie being once gotten, he neuer ceased priuily to require mee and other Lords withall spirituall as temporall, that he might take vpon him the Crowne, till the Prince came to the age of foure and twenty yeres, and were able to gouerne the Realme as a sufficient King: which thing, when hee saw me somewhat slycke at, hee then brought in instruments, authentick Do- ctors, Proctors, and Notaries of the Law, with depo- sitions of diuers witnesses, testifying King Edward's children to bee balliards: which depostitions then I thought to be as true, as now I know them to bee faigned. When the said depostitions were before vs read, and diligently heard, he stood vp bare headed, saying: well my Lords, even as I sayd you would that my Nepheues should haue no wrong: so I pray you doe mee nothing but right, for these witnesses and sayings of fa- mous Doctors bee true: For I am only the vnderwrite here to Richard Plantagenet Duke of Yorke, aduogate to be the very heire to the Crowne of this Realme by au- thoritie of Parliament. Which things so by learned men for veritie to vs declared, caused mee and others to take him for our lawfull and vnderboord Prince and Soueraigne Lord. So againe by my ayde, hee of a Protector was made a King: but when he was once crowned King, and in all possession of the Realme, hee cast away his old conditions. For, when I my selfe sued to him for my part of the Earle of Her- fords Lands, which his brother Edward wrongfully desired from me, and also required to haue the of- fice of the high Constabillship of England, as diuers of my noble ancestors before this time haue had, and in long discent continued; in this my first suite, hee did not only first delay mee, and afterwards deny me, but gaue mee such vnkinde words, as though I had neuer furthered him: all which I suffered pa- tiently. But when I was informed of the death of the two young Innocents, O Lord, my heart inwardly grued, inasmuch as I abhorred the sight of him; I took my leaue of the Court, and returned to Breck- necke to you, but in my journey as I came, I had di- uers imaginations how to depriue this vnnatural vicer. First, I fantasied, that if I list to take vpon me the Crowne, now was the way made plaine, and occasion giuen. For I well saw hee was disfaigned of the Lords Temporall, and accursed of the Lordes Spirituall. After diuers cogitations of this matter, as I rode between Worcester and Bridgeforth, I en- countered with the Lady Margaret Countesse of Richmond, now wife to the Lord Stanley, who is the very daughter, and sole heire to John Duke of Som- erset my Grandfathers eld brother, so that she & her sonne Henry Earle of Richmond be both between me and the gate, to enter into the Maiestie tollall, & getting of the Crowne; and when wee had a little communed concerning her sonne, and were depa- red, I then beganne to dispute with my selfe, whe- ther I were bett to take vpon mee, by the election of the Nobility and Commonalty, or to take it by pow- er. Thus standing in a wauncing ambiguity, I con- sidered first, the office, duty, and paine of a King, which surely I thinke that no mortal man can iustly and truly osfer, except he be elected of God, as K. David was.

(17) But further I remembred, that if I once took vpon me the Gouernance of the Realme, the daugh- ters of King Edward and their Allies, being both for his sake much beloned, and also for the great iniurie done to them much pitied, would neuer cease to barke at the one side of me. Semblably my coffin the Earle of Richmond, his aides and kindfolkes will surely attempt either to bise, or to pierce me on the other side, so that my life and rule should euer hang vnquiet in doubt of death or depostition: And if the said two linages of Turke and Lancaster should inue in one against me, then were I surely matched. Where- fore I haue decreed determined, verily to relinquish all imaginations concerning the obtaining of the Crowne. For as I told you, the Countesse of Richmond in my turne from the new named King, meeting me in the high way, praised me first for kindnes sake, secondly for the loue I bore to my Grandfather Duke Hamfray, who was sworne brother to her fa- ther, to moue the King to be good to her sonne Hen- ry Earle of Richmond, and to license him with his fa- uour to returne againe into England, and if it were his pleasure so to doe, shee promised that the Earle her sonne should marry one of the Kings daughters at the appointment of the King, without any thing demanded for the said espousals, but only the Kings fauour, which request I loone ouerpassed and depa- red. But after my lodging I called to memory more of that matter, and now am bene, that the Earle of Richmond heire of the house of Lancaster, shall take to wife Lady Elizabeth eldest daughter to King Edward, by the which marriage both the houses of Turke and Lancaster may be vnted in one.

(18) When the Duke had said, Bishop Morton who euer fauoured the house of Lancaster, was won- drous ioyfull, for all his imagination tended to this effect; and left the Dukes courage should alwaies, or his minde alter, hee said to the Duke: My Lord of Buckingham, fith by Gods prouision, and your in- comparable wilddome, this noble conuincion is first moued, it is necessary to consider what persons we shall first make priuie of this politicke conclusion. By my troth (quoth the Duke) we will begin with my Ladie of Richmond the Earles mother, which knoweth where he is in Britaine: fith you will begu that way (said the Bishop) I haue an old friend with the Countesse, called Reynold Bray, for whom I shall send, if it be your pleasure: so the Bishop wrote for him to come to Breckneck, who strait came backe with the messenger, where the Duke and Bishop de- clared what they had deuised for the preferment of the Earle of Richmond, sonne to his Lady and Mi- stress: willing her first to compass how to obtaine the goodwill of Queen Elizabeth, and also of her el- dest daughter: and after secretly to lend to her sonne in Britaine, to declare what high honour was prepa- red for him, if he would sweare to marrie the Ladie Elizabeth alfoone as hee was King of the Realme. With which conclusion, Reynold Bray with a glad heart returned to the Countesse his Lady. Bray thus departed, the Bishop told the Duke, that if he were in his life of Ely, he could make many friends to fur- ther their enterprise. The Duke knew this to bee true, but yet loof to loose the society of such a Coun- sellor, gaue him faire words, saying, he should shor- ly depart well accompanied for feare of enemies, but the Bishop ere the Dukes company were assembled, secretly disguised, in a night departed and came to Ely, where he found money and friends, and then sailed into Fleander, where hee did the Earle of Richmond good seruice.

(19) When Reynold Bray had declared his mes- sage to the Countesse, no mercuall if hee were glad, wherefore wherefore she devised a means how to breake this master to Queen Elizabeth, being then in Sanctuary at Willesmer, and having in her family a certaine Welshman called Lewis learned in Philisike, now having opportunity to breake her minde vnto him, declared that the time was come; that her sonne should be ioined in marriage with Lady Elizabeth, daughter and heire to King Edward: and that King Richard should out of all honour and estate be dejected, and required him to goe to Queene Elizabeth not as a messenger, but as one that came friendlie to visite her, and as time and place should serue to make her praiy of this deuise. This Philisitian with good diligence repaired to the Queene, and when he saw time convenient said vnto her: Madame although my imagination be very simple, yet for the entire affection I beare to you and to your children, I am lo bold to vnto you a secret conceit, which I haue compassed in my braine. When I remember the great losse which you haue sustained by the death of your louing husband, and the great sorrow that you haue suffered by the cruell murder of your innocent children, I can no lesse doe, then daily study how to bring your heart to comfort, and also to reuege the quarrell of you and your children, on that cruell tyrant King Richard. And first consider what hatred, and what mischance haue risen by the distinction betweene the two houses of York and Lancaster, which two families if they may be ioined one, I doubt not but that your line shall be againe restored to your great joy & comfort: you know Madam, that off the house of Lancaster, the Earle of Richmond is next of blood, & to the house of York your daughters now are heirs. If you could deuise the means how to couple your eldest daughter with the Earle of Richmond in matrimony, no doubt, but that the sharper should shortly be depozed, and your heire againe to her right restored.

(30) When the Queene had heard this friendly Motion, she instantly bewought him, that as he had bene the first inventor of lo good an enterprise, that now hee would not desist to follow the same, requiring him further, that he would refer to the Countesse of Richmond, mother to the Earle Henry, and to declare to her on the *Queene*s behalfe, that all the friends of King Edward her husband, should assist and take part with the Earle of Richmond her sonne, so that hee would take an oath, that after the Kingdome obtained, to espouse the Lady Elizabeth her daughter, &c. M. Lewis so sped his busines, that he made a final end of this businesse, betweene the two mothers: so the Lady Margaret Countesse of Richmond, brought to a good hope of the preferment of her son, made Reinold Bray chiefe solicitor of this conspiracy, giuing him in charge secretly to inuagel such persons of Nobility to ioyne with her, & take her part, as he knew to be faithfull.

(31) This Reinold Bray within few dayes brought to his luer Sir Giles Daubeny, Sir Iohn Cheine Knights, Richard Guilford, and Thomas Ramsey Esquiers, and others. In the meane while the Countesse of Richmond sent one Christopher Fersowike, a Priest into Britaine, to the Earle of Richmond her sonne, to declare to him all the agreements between her and the Queene agree: and with all to shew him that the Duke of Buckingham was one of the first Inventors of this enterprise: she likewise sent Hugh Conway an Esquire into Britaine with a great summe of money, giuing him in charge to declare to the Earle, the great loue that the most part of the Nobility of the Realme bare towards him, willing him not to neglect so good an occasion offered, but with all speed to setle his mind how to return into England, and therewithall aduising him to take land in Wales. When the Earle had received this ioyfull message, he brake to the Duke of Britaine all his secrets, aduertising him that he was entered into a sure & steadfast hope to obtaine the Crown of England, desiring him of help towards the achieving of his enterprise, which the Duke promised, & afterwards performed: whereupon the Earle sent back againe Hugh Conway, & Th. Ramsey to declare his coming shortly into England.

(32) In the meane season the chiefe of the conspiracy in England beganne many enterprises, which being neuer so priuily handled, yet knowledge thereof came to King Richard, and because hee knew the Duke of Buckingham to be the chiefe head, and aide of this combination; he thought it most necessarie to pincke him from that part, and thereupon addressed his louing letters vnto the Duke, requesting him most earnestly to come to the Court, whole graue aduise for counsell hee then stood much in need of: with many words of kind complements to bee vttered from the mouth of the messenger: but the Duke mistrusting those sweet promises proceeded out of a blitter intent, and knowing K. Richard to speake most fayrely when he meant foulest play, desired the king of pardon, excusing himself that he was sickly & not well able to trauel: which excuse the king would not admit, but sent other letters with checking wordes, commanding him without delay to repaire to his presence: vnto which the Duke made a determinate answer that hee would not come to his mortall enemy: and immediately prepared war against him. Whereupon Thomas Marquisse Dorset came out of Sanctuary, and gathered a great band of men in the Countie of York, Sir Edward Courtney and Peter his brother, Bishoppe of Exeter raised another Armie in Devonshire and Cornwall, and Is. Kent, Sir Richard Guilford, and other Gentlemen raised a Company, and all this was done euen in one moment.

(33) King Richard roused from his pleasures in progresse, sent forth commission to muster his men, and with a great preparation from London marched towards Salisbury, thinking it not best to dispartle his power into small parts in pursuing his enemies enery way at once, and therefore committing all others with a great puissance went to set vpon the Duke of Buckingham, the head of the spring. The Duke hearing of the Kings approach, made out to meet him before hee came too farre, accompanied with a great power of wild Welshes, whom hee had enforced to follow him, more by his Lordly commandement then by liberrall wages, which thing indeed was the cause that they fell off, and forsooke him. His march was through the forest of Deane, intending for Gloucester, where hee meant to passe Sewern, and so haue ioined his Army with the Countes, & other Welshmen, which had he done, no doubt K. Richard had been in great leperdile. But before hee could attaine the Sewern side, by force of continuall raine the river rose so high, that it ouerflowed all the countie adioyning, and was not againe bounded within his owne banks for the space of ten dayes, so that the Duke could not get ouer, nor his complices any wife come vnto him, during which time the Welshmen lingering idle, without wages, or victual, sodainly brake vp Campe and departed; whereupon the Duke was wonderously perplexed, not knowing how to recover this vnfortunate chance, and destitute of power, to shew himselfe in field, sought to secure himselfe in secret, till destiny assigned him a better day.

(34) A seruant he had in especial fauour & trust brought vp tenderly by him, and risen to great wealth and eleeeme, his name was Hamfrey Baniaster, and place of residence nere vnto Shrewsburie, whither the distressed Duke in disguise repaired, intending there to remain secret, until he might either raise a new power, or else by some means constay himselfe vnto Britaine to Henry Earle of Richmond: but as soone as the others which had attempted the same enterprise against the King, had knowledge that Buckingham was forsaken of his Company, and could not be found, as men thrucke in sodaine feare flustered enery one for himselfe, many of them taking Sanctuary, but the most of the chiefeest took into Brit-

(35) Richard thus farre proceeded, and no enemy seeing, his hopes were encreased, and feares daily lesse, yet being a Prince politicke and vigilant, he commanded the Ports to be securely kept, & knowing that Buckingham was not fled with the rest, made proclamation for the apprehending of that Duke, promising a thousand pound to the man that could bring him forth, with pardon of his fautes, to enjoy the Kings favour, and if he were a bondman, presently to be made free. Banister minding the present, and forgetting what was past, spread his lappe first to receive this golden shower, and in hope of this guise, made no conscience to betray his own Lord, who had now laid his life upon truit in his hands: hee therefore repaying to the Sheriffe of Shirburny, revealed the Duke, who disguised like a poore Countreiman, and digging in a groue nere vnto Banisters house, was apprehended, and with a great guard of men was brought vnto Salisbury, where King Richard then lay, and where without arraignment or indgement, vpon the second of November he lost his head: whose death was the lesse lamented, for that himselfe had been the chiefe Instrument to set the Crowne wrongfully vpon Richards head: and yet the treachery of Banister was most severely punished, as many have observed, not onely in the losse of his reward promised, which he never had, and infamy received, neuer after shaken off; but also in himselfe and children, as are thus reported; his eldest sonne and heire fell mad, and dyed of distracted in a Boares Steye: his second sonne became deformed in his limmes, and fell lame; his third sonne was drowned in a small pndle of water; his eldest daughter was sodainly stricke with a fonsle prodie, and himselfe being of extreame age, was arraigned and found guilty of murder, and by his Clergy suaid his life.

(36) An other Commotion at the same time was in Kent, where George Browne and John Gifford Knights, Fitz, Scot, Clifford, and Bonning, with five thousand men attempted great matters at Graveend, huc hearing of the Duke of Buckingham surpris'd, disperis'd themselves for that time. But when King Richard perceived how hee was eury where belst, he sent one Thomas Hutton vnto Francis Duke of Britaine, with proffers of gold to circumuent and imprison Earle Henry, who as hee feared was too well friended in those forraigne parts, which thing indeed this Hutton well perceived, and so to the King reported, that the Duke was nothing forward to bite at this bait, whereupon, those that lately fled England, were indited of treason, and other of Henries factions beheaded, whereof Sir George Browne, and Sir Roger Clifford Knights with foure others were beheaded at London and at Excester for the like cause dyed Sir Thomas Sentleger, who had married Lady Anne Dutcheffe of Excester, King Richards own sister, with others; so lealous was the King of his vsurped Crowne; and that nothing should be laide to vnprovident foresight, the coasts hee stored with Armies of men, furnished the Ports with flore of Provision, and made all things ready to withstand Earle Henries arrival. Who now having gotten side of five thousand Britaines, with forty vessels well furnished, set saile from thence the twelfth of October, but was taken with so terrible a tempest, that his Fleet was disparted, some into Normandy, and some compelled to returne into Britaine, only the Earles ship with one other kept the Sea, being fore tossed all night, and in the morning arrived in the mouth of Fenle in the County of Dorset, where hee might behold the Shore full of men shining in armour, to his great amaiement, whereupon hee sent out his shuppe-boat to know whether they were friends or enemies; their answer was, that they were thither appointed by the Duke of Buckingham, to attend the coming of the Earle of Richmond, to conduct him in safety to the Duke, who lay encompassed not far off, that joyning their forces, they might prosecute Richards the vsurper, who being in a manner destitute of men, was fore distracted, and desperate in his owne deligates. These smooth vttruths notwithstanding Earle Henry avoided, and with a forward gale returned to Normandy, whence he sent Messengers vnto young Charles King of France, whose father King Lewis was lately departed this life, to haue his safe conduct to returne into Britaine, which easily was granted with favourable complements returned to the Earle. Lord Henry thus crossed by sea, had present news of Buckingham surpris'd and death, with the flight of the Nobles escaped from Richard: who meeting with Richmond in Britaine, fell forthwith into Connell: where first it was determined that Earle Henry should take his oath to espouse the Lady Elizabeth eldest daughter vnto King Edward, and the immediate heire to the Crowne, which hee solemnly did in the Church at Rhebar; and they for their parts (ware vnto him fealty, doing him homage with no lesse respect then vnto their sole and crowned King.

(37) Of these proceedings King Richard soone heard, which indeed greatly appaled his thoughts, and all penine and sad he returned out of the Weir towards London, where to cut off the hopes of Richmonds further claime, hee caused a Parliament to be assembled at Westminster, and therein attained the said Earle Henry himselfe, and all such as had fled the laud in his behalfe, enacting them enemies to their naturall Country, their goods to be confiscated, and all their lands and possessions to be seised vpon to the Kings vie, which was so forwarded by his lewd Counsellors, and so executed by his fawning followers, that some better affected, set forth the present and oppressed estate in these scolding rimes, to their further disgrace, disuolging their names in manner as followeth;

(38) King Richards bare standing in dangers abroad, and not altogether free from conspiracies at home, hee thought it best policy to enter amitie with Scotland, which hee did for the terme of three yeeres, and the more firme to assure himselfe of that King, hee increased a marriage betwixt the Duke of Ratcliffe the kings eldest sonne, and the Lady de la Pole daughter to John Duke of Suffolke, and to the Dutcheffe Elizabeth King Richards owne sister, whom hee so much favoured, as that after the death of his owne sonne, he proclaimed him Earle of Lincolne, her sonne and his Nephew, heire apparent to the Crowne of England, disaberriting King Richards daughters, whose brothers hee had before murdered.

(39) His feares nothing lessened, but rather daily increased, he attempted once more to stop the Current which led to the spring, to which end hee sent his Ambassadors laden with gold, and many gay promises vnto Francis Duke of Britaine, offering to give him all Richmonds lands, and yearly revenues if he would either send the said Earle into England or commit him there vnto prison. the Dukes Court, could have no communication with him, he lying extremely sicke, and his wits too weak to discourse. Whereupon Peter Landse, his Treasurer, a man pregnant in wit, and of great authority, tooke the motion into hand, vnto whom the English Ambassadors promised all the Earles Reuenues if he could bring King Richard request to passe. He greedy of gaine, and being in place to doe what he would, promised to effect it, conditionally that King Richard would make good his offer. Thus whilst messengers posted betwixt Peter and Richard, John Bishop of Ely being then in Flanders, was certified by Christopher Wysswick of all the circumstances of this purpose, whereupon the Bishop with all possible hast, sent the same intelligence the same day, and by the same man vnto Earle Henry in Brittain, willing him to shift himself and followers into France: who forthwith sent Pyrrick vnto King Charles to haue his licence that he might with his good liking come into his dominioms, which being obtained he caused the other Lords vnder pretence to visite the sicke Duke to escape into Anion, and two daies after changing his Apparell with his seruants, waied vpon him as vpon his Master, and posted thence into France: whose escape when the Treasurer heard of, he sent after to apprehend him, and that in such hast as at his entrance into the French dominioms they were hard at his heeles.

(40) This suddaine flight of the Earle and of the other English Lords, the Duke of Brittain (being somewhat recovered of his dangerous sickness) rooke very greedously, imputing it a great dishonour vnto himselfe, to suffer the least suspect of breach betwixt him and the Earle, and therefore sore offended at Landse whom he suspected to be deepe in the deed, he sent for Edward Woodville and Edward Pennington two English Elquires, vnto whom he deliuered a summe of money which he had promised to Earle Henry, with a conuey vnto all the rest of the English, to depart France, bearing all their charges till they came to their Earle in France. Neither was King Charles backward to forward Earle Richmond against the Tyrant and Vürper of the English Crowne. And the more to loy Henry, John Earle of Oxford imprisoned by King Edward the fourth in the Castle of Hammes, with Captaine Blunt his keeper, and Sir John Fortescue Porter of Calis, came vnto Earle Henry to take their fortunes in following of him. This Earle of Oxford, as we haue seene, was a continuall aide of King Henry the first, against his opposite K. Edward, and had done many seruices in the Lancastrian cause, till destiny had cast downe the hopes of their side. Him therefore Earle Henry made his chiefe Counsellor for warre, as for experience, policy, valour, and faith in that busines, no man was more meete. Whose prowesse further appeared when Earle Henry was the wreath at Redworth field, where, in the Front of that Barrell he led the band of Archers, and euer after liued in great fauour with this King Henry the seventh, and in great honour died the fourth yeere of King Henry the eight. In the like trait for Counsell and fauour with these Kings, was Richard Fox Doctor of Diuinitie, who being then a student in Paris, was found by Earle Richmond to be the chiefeft man for imploiment in his French busines, which he so prudently and faithfully effected, as the Earle being King, acknowledging him one of his principall aduancers, made him of his Princiue Counsell, Lord Priuie Seale, and raised him to very great places in Church and Common-wealth, and lastly to testifie in what decree effeme hee held him, made him Godfather to his sonne Prince Henry, who was after King of England with whom in great reuerence he liued a long time, even till his eyesight failed through age, and did many woekes of piety, whereof Corpus Christi Colledge in Oxford, is and shall be for euer a noble witness and his honorable care of reuerend antiquity, in preferring the bones of many Saxon Kings, and by him bestowed in faire Monuments in the Cathedral Church of Winchester, shall neuer want due celebration amongst all that honour antiquity and glorious studies. But from these worthy Subjects, we returne againe to their soueraigne King Henry.

(41) Whose beginnings thus forwarded by the Duke of Brittain and the French King, drew many English into France, and filled the heart of the Vürper with an extreme feare; therefore to accomplish by policy, what was doubtfull by armes, he sought to baite his hookes yet another way. The tide hee knew stood with the daughters of King Edward (his sonnes being murdered) and among them to Ladie Elizabeth the eldest, whose marriage he well saw must bring Henry the Crowne. But that once diuerted, his streame of itselfe could beare no great floate, nor bring any inondation into the Land, and therefore Queene Elizabeth in Sanctuary must be Courted, that her daughters might come to Court, and there be regarded according to their degrees. This so cunningly was carried, by men that could carry themselves to fit womens affections, that the King was purged of the murder of her sonnes; there made to beleue that her selfe was respected a Dowager Queene, and sister in law to the present King, and that himselfe had a Prince and many Princely Peeres most fit matches for those Princes her daughters; that her sonne Thomas Marquisse Dorset, whilst he followed the Runaway Henry, left his honorable preferment inceded to himward; and lastly requiring a reconciliation with the Queene, forgave all injuries vttered against him out of her womanish passions, with a most willing heart: and indeed these messengers were such Crafts-masters as they brought Queene Elizabeth into a fooles Paradise, and made her beleue that their words were his heart. Whereupon forgetting all things passed before, as the murder of her sonnes, the dishonour of her husband, the bastardy of their Children, and her owne scandal for Sorcery: nor remembering the faithfull promise shee made to Lady Margaret Earle Henries mother, shee deliuered her five daughters as lambes committed to the rauening wolfe, in which act of hers is seene the weakness of that Sexe, and the ambition whereunto by nature they are inclined, for premeely vpon the deliuey of her daughters, shee sent priuily for the Lord Marquisse Dorset her sonne, then residing in Paris, willing him to desert from the Earles Faction, and come vnto King Richard, who promised him preferment, and that her selfe and daughters were in high fauour, all injuries on both parts forgiven and forgotten.

(42) This enurance made vnto the Tragedy intended, to furnish the stage and finish the Scene of her owne life, the next Actour must be Queene Anne, who onely now stood in the Tyrants way, her death he meant should giue life to his intruded regencie, and adde a further Claime and strength to the possession which he already had, by matching with his Niece the next heire vnto the Crowne the Lady Elizabeth, the let onely resting that himselfe had a wife, her death therefore must immediately be sought, yet so as the honorable repure of his name should no waies be impeached, euer carrying himselfe in outward semblance for a good religious honest man, and much delirous that his people should account him so. First therefore he began to lament the barrenness of his wifes wombe, and the great dangers that the Realme was like to sustaine, if himselfe should die Issueles, complaining often thereof vnto his Nobility, but most especially vnto Archibishop Rathem lately released out of prison, whereby the Prelate coniectured Queene Anne had not long to liue. Then restrained he her bed vnder pretext of Penancy, taking her defect as a scourge for his owne finnes, which day and night he sought to expiate by prayers: His next policy was, how her death might be wrought with the least suspect of wrong, and how taken when shee was gone: Therefore as an assay to the Peoples tale, be caused it to be given forth that Queene Anne was dead, which was to commonly divulged, that the rumour thereof came to her owne care, and she having had sufficient experience of her husbands proceedings, feared this to be one of his plots, mistrusting (and not without cause) that her life was in danger, wherupon all dismay with a lamentable countenance, she came to the King, and with weeping teares demanded, what offence shee had done, that the sentence of death was given against her already. Richard made it strange to see her so perplexed, and with loving words and smiling semblance, bad her live to scandalize report, and to thinke that many yeeres were yet added to her life, but whether in conceit for sorrow, or of poison, I cannot say, she died shortly after, and was solemnly buried in the Abbey of Westminster.

(43) The King thus delivered from the bands of Mazimony, and now a widower at liberty to choose where he would, cast glances of love towards the Lady Elizabeth his owne brothers daughter, and began to court her for his second Queene, but the thing was so offensive to the law of nature, and so directly against the Law of God, as all men abhorred the motion, and most of all the maiden her selfe, which Richard perceiving, shee forbore our earnest purluise to gaine his time and all fit occasions; but most especially, having no leisure to woo, his subjects on all sides daily revoluting, and his Nobles more and more had in suspect; among whom one was Lord Thomas Stanley Earle of Darby who had married Lady Margaret Countesse of Richmond, Earle Humes owne mother: him therefore hee most mistrusted, and before he would admit his departure from Court, he commanded him to leave his sonne and heire George Stanley the Lord Strange for his hostage, which he did, though it little auailed to binde Darbys affection unto his side.

(44) In this while King Richard hearing that Oxford had escaped out of the Castle of Hammer, and that he, with the Captaine thereof James Blunt, were fled into France and joined with Richmond; thought it high time to quench the sparkes in those parts, before they should rise to a higher flame; and therefore hee appointed (which was presently accomplished) the Garrison at Calis to sitat the said Castle with a hard siege, being well assured that many wellwillers to the Earles proceedings lay there harboured, who vpon the least advantage would be ready to play. But Henry not vnmindfull of his distressed friends, nor Oxford forgetting his kinde Hostelle Captaine Blunts wife, made vnto the Peerce, and on the sudden put Thomas Brandon, with thirty approved Souldiers into the Castle, who from the wailes plaied vnto the besiegers, whiles Oxford annoyed them vpon their backes, so that presently they offered, and came to a composition, which was, that they within should safely depart, but the Castle to remaine in Subjection to the King.

(45) Hammer thus restored in danger to be lost, and nothing had thence besides a woman and a few suspected perions, King Richard thought himselfe now sure of all, and fearing no insualion at home, imagined that much harme could not bee done abroad; yet being in France (as be thought) found very few friends, and was fully perswaded that the French Kings assistance stood more of words then in deedes. And indeed some occasion of such suspicion was ministred, for King Charles being young, and the Princes at variance, Earle Henry was enforced to make suite vnto them man by man. Besides Thomas Marquess Dorsette sent for by his mother the Queene, suddenly in the night made an escape from Paris, with purpose for England, which stroke great feare among Earle Humes part, chiefly for that all their Counsels were knowne vnto the Marquess, which if he should reueale, their designs were made desperate. To prevent which, hee was posted after, and brought backe againe, though much against his will. These things considered, King Richard to lessen his great charges, discharged his Navy at sea, commanding the rest to watch the shore; Beacons to be built, and armour to be ready at every call; then giuing his affection to leaue to entertaine more security, saw not the sword that hung ouer his head.

(46) But Earle Henry delivered from the feare of the Marquess, thought it not best to prolong time, left others vpon like purposes should he wray his intents; and thereupon obtaining a small aide of the French with a certaine summe of money, for which the Lord Marquess (whom he much mistrusted) and Sir John Bowcher were left in pledge, hee set forward to sea, and prepared his shipping in the mouth of seyn: whether ridings was brought him of Queene Annes death, that King Richard purposed to marry Lady Elizabeth: a feare indeed fitt exceeding the former, these being the Princelies by whom hee must claime, wherupon much distemperance arose, every mans braine working vpon the newes. But after much consultation, it was held the best to make ouer into England, to interpose the proceedings: the march was fully made, wherupon Earle Richmond with two thousand men only, and a small number of ships, set saile from Harfleur the fiftenth of August, and the seventh day following arrived at Milford haue in Wales, where taking land hee came vnto Dale, and thence the next day marched to Hereford well, ten miles into the Maine, from thence hee marched to Cardigan, where he had newes that the Countrey was forsaide against him, but finding that vnture he made still forward, bearing downe such Houlds as held against him: then sending secretly to Lady Margaret his mother, to the Lord Stanley, Talbot, and others, signified vnto them, he meant to passe Severne, at Shrewsbury, and thence to march directly towards London. In his way to Shrewsbury, there mette him Sir Rice at Thomas a man of great command in Wales, with a number of men to side in his quartrell, which Henry afterwards requited in making this his first aide the Governour of Wales.

(47) The Earle more boldly from Shrewsbury, held on his marche to the Towne of Newport, whither Sir Gilbert Talbot with two thousand strong from the young Earle of Shrewsbury gaue him his aide. Then passed he forward to Stafford, and had conference there with Sir William Stanley, and proceeding forward was honourably rescued into the City Litchfield, where Thomas Earle of Darby with five thousand armed men had beene some few daies before, but hearing of Earle Humes approach removed to Anderton to auoid suspicion of the jealous King that kept his sonne Hostage for his further truth.

(48) King Richard at this time helde his Court at Newnham, where being informed that Earle Henry with a small company was landed in Wales, made small account of what he could doe, altogether relying vpon the Lord Walter Herbert, and Sir Rice at Thomas two principall men, in whom hee conceived no little trust: yet left this new risen spring might gather in more heads, he sent to John Duke of Norfolk, Henry Earle of Northumberland, and Thomas Earle of Surrey willing them with a selected power to repress the insolency of this headstrong Earle: moreover he sent for Sir Robert Brakenbury Lieutenant of the Tower, Sir Thomas Bowcher, and Sir Waltemflangford Knights, all of them in great iealousie and mistrust, commanding them with their forces to come and attend vpon his person which accordingly they set forward to doe, meane while sending his Spials to know the way Henry went, had intelligence that hee was past Shrewsbury without any impeachment; whereas storming in chollet and cursing their vntures whom hee had put in trust, craved vengeance from heauen, and instantly stantly intended to revenge it himself; then having notice the Earle was at Lichfield, and his partie increased by daily repair, incontinently hee marshalled his followers; and like a valiant Captaine and politike leader led forward his Battailles five and five in a rancke. In the middell of his troopes he bestowed the Carriages belonging to his Army: and himselfe mounted upon a white Courser, inuited with his Guard, followed by his foemen, and the wings of Horsemen ranged on euery side, with a frowning steme countenance, but yet in great Pompe, entered the towne of Leicester after the Sun was set, being full of indignation and swelling in anger, which tomen hee alwaies with threats of reuenge.

(49) Earle Richmond from Lichfield departed for Tamworth, and in the way met Sir Thomas Bourchier and Sir Walter Hungerford going towards the King, who vpon this vnlooked for occasion, and knowing themselves in what suspicion they stood, secretly leir the company of their Captaine Ardenbury the night following, and wandering in waies vnknowne, with much adoe gotte safely vnto the Earles Companies.

(50) In the like danger through darkenesse of night, Henry himselfe chanced to come, for albeit he was a man both valiant and forward, and by his owne wil dome could manage his weightiest affaires; Yet now hauing notice that King Richard with a strong army was neere, and that his latter in law, the Lord Stanley stood as a Neuter, he was stracke deepe in his dumps, and with twenty fight Horle-men lingering behind, so seriously musing what was to be done, as latly he lost the sight of his Host, and by the darkenesse of night mislead his way; neither durst he for the Kings Scout-watch demand direction to Tamworth, but lay in a small village about three miles distant, to his no little grieffe, and his whole Armies great amazement, the one prognosticating it to be a prelage of an ill beginning, and the other doubting some deuiment of their Lord, but in the dawning of the next morning conducted by good fortune he came to his Host, exulting that his absence was to haue conference with his secret friends; and then priuily departing to the Lord Stanley, had conference with him, and was put in good comfort.

(51) But conseratiuely, King Richard was wrapp'd and perplexed with feare, not onely with the departure of Sir John Savage, Sir Brian Sanford, and Sir Simond Digby, in whom he had reposed great trust, but also in the dreadful dreames which nightly he suffered, wherein to his seeming, terrible diuels so pulled and haled him, as by nomcanes he could take any rest, which fearefull imaginations struck so deep an impression vnto his heart, that the signes thereof appeared in his countenance, howloeuver hee fought to put them off to shew.

(52) But being determined to put himselfe to the mall of battell, or else, (and that rather) enforced by diuine iustice to pull the reuenging hand of heauen against him, in the morning he marched toward the enemy, and vpon a faire plaine called Redmore neere vnto Rasworth about seven miles west from Leicester he pitched downe his Tents, and thence sent a Pursuuant to the Lord Stanley, commanding him to aduance forward with his companie, and to come to his presence, which if hee refused to doe, hee sware by Christs passion, his tonnes head should off before that hee died. The Lord Stanley answered the Pursuuant, that if the King did so, hee had more tonnes alive; but to come to the King hee was not at that time determined. This answer declared, King Richard commanded the Lord Strange incontinent to be beheaded, at the very season, when the two Armies came in sight each of others, but his counsellors tolde him, that the time was now to fight, and not to execute, which might better bee done when the field was fought: wherevpon the Lord Strange was deliuered prisoner to the keepers of the Kings Tents, and the Kings holy vow thus broke, the Lord Strange escaped with life, by this bad tyrants to good a death.

(53) But now the time and houre of Battell being come, he drew out his Army vpon the plaine, whole order for fight he thus placed, the forward he ordered of a marvellous length, to strike the more terror in the Beholders hearts, in whose forefront he placed his Archers, as a Bulwarke to defend the rest, the leading whereof was committed to John Duke of Norfolk, with whom was Thomas Earle of Surrey, his sonne, his owne Battailion was furnished with his best approued men of warre, hauing Horsemen for wings on both sides of his hanel; and being thus ordered for their further incouragement King Richard mounted in place to be heard, thus said to his Souldiers.

(54) "My faithfull followers, friends, and selected Chieftaines, I confesse by your puissant valours I first aspired to the top of this royal estate, in obtaining & wearing this Diademe of Imperial Majesty, and maugre the seditious attempts of all cinkered aduersaries, by your prudent & politike counsels I haue gouerned the Realm, People and Subjects, as I haue omitted nothing I hope appertaining to the office of a lost Prince, nor you pretermitted anything belonging to the parts & duties of most prudent Counsellors. And albeit, that in the getting of the Garb I was prouoked by sinfull Counsell, and seduced by a diabolical contraption to commit a most wicked & detestable Act, yet with salt teares and straight penance I haue, I trust, expiated that heinous offence: which abominable crime, I desire you as clearly to forget, as I daily remember to deplore and lament. If you will now vouchsafe to call to minde in what case we al stand, and in what doubtfull perill wee are intrapped, I doubt not but that you will with me confesse, that if euer amity preuailed betwixt the raised, and the raisers, betwixt the Prince and his Subjects, this day requires as much in vs both. For if wise men say true, that there is oot so much power in getting, as there is pollicy in keeping; the one, meete fortunes chance, the other widows deepe insight, then I with you, and you with mee this day must needs take labour and paines, to keepe that prebeminence & possession by force, which by your prudent labour I haue obtained. The diuel, you know, a continuall enemy to humane society, a disturber of Concord, and a fower of sedition hath entered into the heart of an unknowne Wylisman (whose father I neuer knew, nor him euer personally saw) exciting him to aspire and ouer our Realme and Crowne, to the disherizing of vs and of our posterity: you see further how a company of Traitors, Thieves, Out-lawes, and runnagates of our owne Nation, besides a number of bегgerly Britaines, and faint hearted Frenchmen, are ayders and partakers of this his wicked enterprise, ready at hand to oppress and spoile vs, our lands, our wiues and children; which eminent mischieues, if we then will withstand and resist, wee must time and die together as brethren, fight together as Lions, and scarce not to die together like men; thus resolu'd, belet me, the fearefull Han neuer shed faster before the Greeke Grayhound, the silly Lark before the spar-hauke, or the simple sheep before the Wolfe, then these proud bragging enemies will run out of the field at the sight of your manly visages. For haue we not already manifest tokens of victory and triumphs? Is not the Captaine of the Rebellion Richmond a Welsh milke-dop, of no courage and lesse experience in Marshall teares of war, brought vp by my brothers means, and mine, like a bird to a cage, in the Court of the Duke of Britaine, neuer saw Army, neuer wore Armour, without practise, and therefore without knowledge,

"how to gouerne a field. What are his followers but "a sort of fainting runagates, whose fearefull eyes, "as they could not behold our rates in peace, can "worke abide to see our royal banner displayed against "them in fight; for their owne consciences shall be"wray their guilt; their oathes, their perjury; their "promise, iohndelicty; and the sight of vs their annoi"ted Soueraigne shall either cause them shamefully to "fly, or submissiually to yeld themselves to our mercy.
 "As touching his French and Britaine aiders, their "valours haue beene well knowne to our Noble "Progenitors, often vanquished but neuer vanqui"shed; onely bragging without any great deeds, "drunkards without discretion, Ribaulds without "reason, Cowards without resistance, and (in a "word) effeminate, lasciuious, and neuer seene in "the Front of a Battell, seeking ten times more "meanes to flee and escape, then once to assault the "face of their enemies. Therefore like valiant Cap"taines aduance forth your Standards, and make "knowne your manhood by dint of sword, and be "ye sure that if euery one of you giue but one sure "stroke, the day wilbe ours; for how can a handfull "withstand a whole Realme? Aduance therefore "forward, my Captaines, in whom I well know is "wanting neither courage, policy, wisdom, nor "pulsance. I therefore desire you, for your loue "to meward, the zeale of your native Countrey,
 "and the safety of your Prince and selues, to leue
 "this day your true English valour, and for my selfe
 "I assure you I will this day either triumph in a "glorious victory, or die in this quarrell with Im"mortal Fame; in whose Palace all our names shall "be enroiled, if we preferre the renowne of our "Countrey before our owne liues. Now S. George
 "for vs, and for victorie; hark therefore forward, "and remember this, that I am he who with high "aduancement will preferre the valiant and hardy, "and with seuerer torture will punish the dastard and "cowardly Runaway. The Oration ended, as it
 "gaue courage to some, so gaue it distaste vnto others, "whose hearts carried gall though their mouths "droppd honey, some intended to turn to Earle Henry,
 "some determined to take part with the strongest;
 "and some meant to stand still and doe nothing; so vi-"sured was he of his Subjects loyalty, that had been so "traiterous to his owne Nephews.

(55) Earle Richmond then seeing King Richard "thus embattell'd, sent to the Lord Stanley who stood "hoovering aloofe off, to come helpe him to order his "fight, whose answer was, that Henry should doe it "himselfe, and that he would come to him when he "law time conuenient, which stricke the Earle into a "great dumpe, but now hauing no time for delay, ne"cessary compelled him to order his men. The Fore-"ward he made single according to his small number "of souldiers, and in the Front placed his Archers, o"uer whome John Earle of Oxford was Capitaine, "the right wing was led by Sir Gilbert Talbot, and the "left assigned to Sir John Savage; Earle Henry himselfe "with his vnkle Talbot Earle of Pembroke gouerned
 "the Main-Battell, better replenished with horse, then "foote, whose whole number consisted hardly of five "thousand, the kings doubling the number and more.
 "The Battels thus ordered, Earle Henry armed at all "peeces, gasing his helmet, rode from ranke to ranke, "and from wing to wing, encouraging his men, and
 "the more to encrease their hot spirits, mounted vpon
 "a little banke, the better to be seene and heard,
 "these wordes he vttered in all their hearing.

(56) If euer God giue victory to a iust quar-
 "rell, if euer he aided warre for the reuention of a king"dome or Countrey, or euer fauoured them that
 "fought for the reliefe of poore innocents, oppres"sed by tyranny, then no doubt my friends and fel"low souldiers, but that this day be will giue vs a "triumphans victory. For if we consider for what "and against whom we fight, we may not doubt but "that God himselfe will fight for vs. The thing "which we are bere ready to try by sword, is the li"berty of the Land from vnder the viorpation and "yoke of a Tyrant, and hee, against whom we "draw sword, is the Monster (for I may not call him "man) which feareth neither God, Lawes, Justice, "nor Humanity, an homicide, a murderer of his "owne kindred, a destroyer of the Nobilitie, a Mawle "to his Subjects, and a firebrand to the whole King"dome, whom iust vengeance craveth to haue que-

 "red; and consider I pray you, who be of his hand,
 "euen such as by murder and vntuth to their kin"d and Countrey, haue got wrongfull possession of "our rightfull inheritance, letting your wises weep, "and Orphanes wander, to seeke their liuehood
 "where they can get it, whose teares I doubt not "crie in the eares of the Lord, who will punish these "Malefactors either with pricke of conscience eue-"redly to flay, or deliuer themselves into our hands "without Battell. Consider further, I pray you, "that in yonder great Battell are men brought more "for feare then for loue, by force compelled and not "willinglie assembled, persons that desire more the "destruction, then the life of their Capitaine, and fi"nally a multitude, whereof the most part be our "friends and the least part his that leads them; and "surely it stands in suspence, whether the malice of "the souldiers towards their Generall, or his feare "conceined against them, be the greater, for this is a "rule infallible, that as ill men daily couet to destroy "the good, so God appointeth the good men to con"found the ill, and if it be the true that Clerkes preach "that the one is to be hated, and the other beloved,
 "who then can spare yonder tyrant Richard Duke of "Gloucester vntuly calling himselfe king, that hath "broken both the Lawes of God and man, in the "blood of his brother, the murder of his Nephews, "the death of his wife, the slander of his owne mo"ther, and the bastardizing of his brethren. If you
 "haue not heard, yet I haue read that Targue was "proud, for the rape of Laueria, lost the Kingdome "of Rome; yet was not his fact so detestable as Ne"uer, who slew his owne mother, to behold the "place of his conception; but yonder vilsper is "both these persons in one; a Nere in murder of his "young Nephews, and in defaming the wombe of "his owne conception: and a Targue intending to "defile, and carnally to know his owne Nece vnder "pretext of holy Matrimony, which Lady you are "witness, I haue I worne shalbe my wife. This is the "quarrell for which we are here this day assembled,
 "and for whose equity we craue God to be iudge:
 "a good beginning of his Protection we haue alrea"dy seene, in escaping the treasons laid for vs in *Bril-
 "laine*, the dangers of Scas, and our safe arriuaage vnto
 "this place, not hunted by anie, but rather our selues "hunting after that furious Bore; who this day, and "in this place, is so intrangled in his owne toyke, as his "crooked tuskers shall not be able to gnaw the cords "of his insane alinder, nor himselfe haue power, to "free himselfe from his pursuers, whoe I asseguine (I "doubt not) shall be died in the blood of this filthy "swine, and shall well rid the world of an vgly hog-"backed Monster; which thing to accomplish let vs "remember, that victory is not gotten by multitude
 "but by manhood, but the smaller number we bee,
 "the greater is our glory if we vanquish, if vanqui"shed fretting time shall neuer consume our memo"ry, that died to free our selues, and Nation from "the oppression of an vilsper Tyrant; and thus I "assure you, that for so iust a cause you shall finde
 "me this day rather a dead Carrion vpon the colde "ground, then a Carpet prisoner kept aliu for re"proch. Aduance therefore forward like true hearted "Englishmen, display your Banner in defence of your "Countrey, get the day and be Conquerours, loofe
 "the Battell and be villaines; God and Saint George
 "giue vs a happy successe. Which no sooner was said "but that the souldiers buckled their Helmes, the frushed their feathers attentively listening when the Trumpet should give the sound of Battell.

(57) Betwix both the Armies there lay a great manly, which Earle Henry left upon his right hand, with purpose to have that for a defence, as also the Sannet at his backe, and face of the enemy, which when King Richard perceived, with sound of trumpet and shout of his Army, hee passed the Marsh, when the bow-men on both sides let freely flie their arrows: the rest comming to encounter with strokes: but the Earle of Oxford fearing to be encompassed by the enemy, commanded earey of his raukes to keepe within ten foot of his Standard, which being accomplished, and their fight a while stayed, their opposites mistrusting some fraud or deceit, ceased likewise from there, many of them willing inough so to doe; notwithstanding, the L. Stanley at the same time joyning with the Earle, a cruell battell was againe begunne, and manfully continued vpon eicher part. Till lastly, King Richard hauing intelligence that the Earle of Richmond was but slenderly accompanied with men of Armes, and them also buied in their owne guardes, meant by his incommet to finish the day, as the onely man, vpon whom stood all the hope of his enemies successe, and therefore hauing the markes of Earle Henry, made from the range of his owne battell, and vpon the spar with his Speare in his Rest, ranne violently towards him in a furious spleen; in which rage, at the first brunt, hee bare downe and ouerthrew the Earles Standard, and slew Sir William Brandon the bearer thereof; next matching with Sir John Cheney a man of great might, manfully threw him to the ground, thereby making an open passage by dint of sword vnto the Earle himselfe: Richmond beholding the high valour of Richard, most lion-like coped with this cruell Bore, and beld him manage his iustkes at his sword point, betwix whom the fight was so desperate, that Henries company were stricke in great despair; at which very instant Sir William Stanley came in with three thousand tal fresh Souldiers, who entred the battell with such courage and valour, as they bare down all before them where they went, whereas the Kings side began to faint, and to giue oer fight, bathe more resolute a while maintaining their ground, and now mistrusting treason among themselves, turned their backs and ran away, whereby King Richard perfectly perceived the downefall of his ill raied glory, and the full period of his short raigne; and all hope of resistance now past, a swift horse was brought to escape the field, with comforts that another day might set the victory on his side: but with a mind vnmarchable in hatred against Henry, or rather to haue his death registred in fames honorable tole, whose life had bene blotted with the penne of disloued infamie, hee bathily clofed his helmet, saying, that that day should make an end of all battels, or else in this now in trying he would finish his life, which last was perfectly performed; for thrusting into the middelt of his enemies, and there valiantly fighting among the thickest, hee obtained more honor in this his two houres fight, then hee had gained by all the actions of his whole life.

(58) There died that day with him John Duke of Norfolk, Walker Lord Ferrers of Chartley, Sir Richard Ratcliffe Knight, Sir Robert Brakenbury Lieutenant of the Tower, and not many Gentlemen more: Sir William Catcely one of King Richards chiefe Counsellors with two others, were taken and two daies after beheaded at Leicester, among them that escaped were Francis Viscount Lovell, Hamfry, and Thomas Stafford brethren, which three tooke Sanctuary at S. Johns in Gloucester. Thomas Howard Earle of Surrey though hee submitted himselfe vnto Henry, yet was hee committed to the Tower and therein a long time remained. Vpon Earle Henries part onely ten men were slaine, as Sir Gilbert Talbot wrote the newes from the field, whereof for note Sir William Brandon was the best, in all to the number of foure thousand men. This battell was fought the two and twentieth of August, and yere of Christ Iesus 1485. in the field Redemore, nere vnto Bosworth, in the Coaunte of Leicester; after which Earle Henry gaue thanks vnto God, and commending his Souldiers, with suffrance for them to take the spoiles of the field, dubbed many of the knights which his doings was so acceptable to the whole Army, as with great applaude they all cryed King Henry, King Henry; whose fortwardnesse to him-ward, when the Lord Stanley perierued, hee tooke K. Richards Crowne, found among the spoile of the field, and set it vpon the Earle of Richmonds head, thereby confirming the election of the people, at which instant beganne the raigne of this new King.

(59) The slaine body of the vsporing Tyrant, all tugged, and torne, naked, and not so much as a cloat left to cover his shame, was trussed behind Blanch Saint-Leger (or White Bore, a Parlement at Armes,) like a hogge or Calfe, his head and Armes hanging on the one side of the horse, and his legges on the other, and all besprinkled with mire and blood, was so brought into Leicester, and there for a miserable spectacle the space of two dayes lay naked and vnburied, his remembrance being as odious to all, as his person deformed, and loathsome to be looked vpon: for whose farther despite, the white Bore his cognizance was torne downe from every Signe, that his monument might perish, as did the monies of Caligula, which were all melted by the decree of the Senate: lastly, his body without all funeral solemnity was buried in the Gray-Friers Church of that City. But King Henry his Successor, of a princely disposition, caused afterward his Tombe to be made with a picture of Alabaster, representing his person, and to be set vp in the same Church, which at the suppression of that Monastery was pulled downe, and utterly defaced; since when his graue ouergrowne with nettles and weedes, is very obscure and not to be found. Onely the stone chest wherein his corpes lay, is now made a drinking trough for horses at a common Inne, and retaineth the oarly memory of this Monarches greameffe. His body also (as tradition hath deliuered) was borne out of the City, and contemptuously belowed vnder the end of Brew-bridge, which giueth passage ouer a branch of Stamford on the west side of the Towne. Vpon this Bridge (the like report runneth) flood a stone of some height, against which King Richard, as hee passed toward Bosworth, by chance stricke his spar, and against the same stone as hee was brought backe, hanging by the horse side, his head was dashed and broken, as a wife woman (forsooth) had foretold, who, before Richards going to battell, being asked of his successe, said, that where his spurre stricke, his head should be broken; but of these things, as is the report, so let be the credite. Dead he is, and with his death ended the factions a long time continued betwixt the Families of Lancaster and York in whole bandings, to bring, set & keep the Crown on their beades, eight or nine bloody set battels had bene fought, and no lesse then fourescore persons of the blood-royall slaine, as Philip Communes the French Writer saith; many of them being well knowne to himselfe: after which floemes, and this Tyrants death, a blessed vnion ensued, by joining those houses in Henry of Lancaster, and Elizabeth of York.

(60) Hee was of stature but litle, and of shape deformed, the left shoulder bunching out like a Mole-hill on his backe, his haire thinne, and face short, a cruell countenance, in whose aspect might bee perceived both malice and deceit. When hee stood mauling (as hee would doe oft) his life was, to bite and chaw the nether lip, his hand euer on his dagger, which euer hee would choppe and down in the thertth, but neuer draw it fully out. Pregnant in wit hee was, wily to faigne, apt to dissemble, and haugh-

(61) Anne the second daughter and Coheire to Richard Neut, the first Earle of Warwicke and Salisbury, was first married to Edward Prince of Wales, the sonne to King Henry the sixth, and after his death was remarried to Richard Duke of Gloucester, Anno 1472. afterwards by vsurpation King of England, with whom in great Seue and solemnity shee was Crowned Queene the sixth of July, and yere of Salutation, 1483. (62) Edward the sonne of King Richard, and of Queene Anne his Wife, and the onely childe of them both, was borne in the Castle of Middleham, neere Richmond, in the Countie of Yarke Anno 1473. and being vnder foure yeres of age was created Earle of Salisbury by his Vncle King Edward the fourth; the seuenteenth of his Raigne; but his father King Richard in the first of his vsurpation created him Prince of Wales, the four & twentieth of August, and yere of Christ, 1483; he then being about ten yeres of age, vnto whom also the Crowne was intailed by Parliament; but this Prince dying before his father, and much vpon the time of his mothers decease, saw not the reuenge that followed the Tyrants Raigne, whose bad life no doubt hath made doubtfull the place of this Princes buriall, and other Princely officers done him in his life, and at his death.

HENRIE THE SEVENTH, KING OF ENGLAND AND FRANCE, AND LORD OF IRELAND, THE FIFTIE SEVENTH MO-NARCH OF THE ENGLISH, HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND ISSUE

Monarch 57

CHAPTER XX.

A.D. 1485.
22. August.
The date of his kingdom commencing.

HENRIE of that name the seventh, having by such mixt meanes of valor and praisur as are already described, obtained the possession of England Crown, we must now present vnto you his actions in the person and time of a King, maintained by him with like mixture of courage and skill as it was archie-ued, to the verification of that role, That things are kept by the same Arts whereby they were gained. In describing whereof, wee meane nothing lesse, then for humoring the vaine admirers of phrase and conceit, to mount vp into Panegyricall flourishers, in honor of the man, though his excellent vertues would worthily beare, if not duly also exact them: yet may wee not omit to obserue, that as in his attaining to the Crowne, there was (through diuine providence) a concurring disposition of all important Circumstances, without which his attempt might haue proued disastrous; so hee, having now possessed the Soueraigne power, and mastered the State in the maine pointes, easily made circumstances waite vpon his wisdom, and to take their forme from his directions: Of the first kind, where in his felicity deserves to be celebrated, were these. That he by the Male-line a meere stranger to both the roiall houses, as descended from the Welsh and French, and by the female springing out of such a family of Lancaster (the Beauforts) as by the same law which enabled it to inherite in ordinary states, was made incapable of succession in the Regalitie, should so safely be conuained away into forraigne parts, there to continue an head of expectation and reuolt, duuations concern-

ring the intestine troubles and dangers, to him inevitable here at home. Secondly, that the Realme of England should bee so auctored from Richard, (though a very honorable, wise, iust and necessary Prince, after hee was somewhat settled) as for his like, to neglect (in a fort) so many naturall heires of the house of York, some of them in right preceding Richard, such were the children of Edward the fourth, and George Duke of Clarence, Richards elder brethren, and all of them iust barres to the Earle of Richmond, who scarce had any thing of a legal title, or of a warrantable intention; but his purpose to remove an usurper, and marry the Lady Elizabeth, the rightfull inheritor. Thirdly, a long and fatal backesse of Richard in his warlike preparations, through the meer contempt of his enemy the Earle, which was the cause, that both hee landed securely, and Richard was druen to fight in a manner with tu-multuaries, rather then trained forces. And finally, that a principall, potent, noble, and yet a deeply inspected Conspirator, (as being Father in law to the Earle) should have charge, vnder Richard, our chiefe portion of his Army at the very instant of ioining battell.

(2) These considerations (among many other) had in them such an aptitude to his designe, as no humane wit could fashion, and without the which a man of equall stature and parts to Henry, or Henry himselfe, might in vaine have become wise, in vain, industrious and valiant. Circumstances of the other fort shall plentifully occur in the whole carriage of his ensuing actions. In both which are verified two contrary rules; for the state of the first obseruations teacheth vs with Plautus, that Centum doctores hominum conficit hoc vno vincto Deo, Tunc nec God-desse can efficitur nec vna vincta Dea, Tunc nec God-desse can efficitur nec vna vincta Dea speaking as an Heathen man of that famous Idole Fortune; and in the second, that which Iuuenal excellently noteth,

Nullo nomen adeo si sit prudentia, sed te Nesciam Fortuna Deum, proleque locum.

No Goddesse wert, where Prudence guide, though Chappes A Goddesse deerd found Actes to Heaven aduance.

(3) Now for the Character of this famous wise Prince (which with reason ought to bee set in front to his actions, as certaine lightes of the mind, by which to discern the fountain of counsels and causes) a learned, eloquent Knight, and principal Lawyer of our time, giues vs many things, of which these selected, are very regardable. This King (saith he) attained vnto the Crowne, not onely from a private fortune, which might endue him with a moderation, but also from the fortune of an exiled man, which had quenched in him all the furies of ambition, and an industry. His wisdom (speaking thereof, as it was in his ruine) seemed rather a dexterity to deliuer himselfe from dangers when they pressed him, then any deepe foresight to prevent them a farr off.
Heauen hee was ouer the Greatnesse of his Nobility, as remembering how himselfe was set up. Great and de-uout reuerence hee bare vnto religion, as hee that employed Ecclesiasticall men in most of his affaires. In his gouernment hee was led by more, fearfully by his lawes, and yet hee was a great reformer of iustitias in all his proceedings, which withstanding was no impediment to the working of his will. In his warre (meaning domestique) hee was rather confident then enterprising, by which also hee was commonly not the poore. Generally, hee seemed inclinable to line in peace, and in the queching of the Commotions of his subjects, hee was euer ready to achieve these wars in person, sometimes referring himselfe, but neuer retiring himselfe. Of nature hee was to accumulate treasure; in expending whereof hee neuer feared charge that his af-fares required, and in his foundations was magnificent enough. Hee chose commonly to employ cunning persons, as hee that knew himselfe sufficiently to make use of their uttermost reaches, without danger of being abused with them himselfe.

(4) Another hauing a purpose to write in English the history of this Henry (an argument which for the worthy doing thereof, requires as wise a man as Henry himselfe,) hath among many extraordinary praises (most what framed out of his strong affection) truly noted concerning his achievement of the Crowne: that the Almighty hand of God brought him over the toppe of the highest and most dangerous abysses, to sway this Scipio, when neither Title, Power, nor great Probability could giue him so much as one found path to sit him forward. And of the man himselfe, That hee entertained that, as fortune, as soueraine change of fortune, with such moderation, and contrasted discretion, as it well appeared hee had throughly conquered himselfe, before hee subdued the usurper his enemy. What could bee added greater to so true a prayse? nothing certainly; for that he (as else-where that Writer saith) was the Saluame, who brought peace to this Kingdom, long before oppressed by warre and tyranny: it was onely an excellent effect of that excellent moderation. Other Authors of our times concur in the same iudgement of him, whom they prayse "for singular wisdom, excellent temperance, and moderate frugality; for policy, iustice, and clemency: which princely vertues caused him to bee highly reuerenced of forraigne Princes. These honourable Eulogies after so many yeeres from his death, iustly countenance their relations, who writ-ting, in or about his owne dayes auctore so lesse; among whom, Bernard Andrew of Tholome is most flowing and abundant. This Andrew (as himselfe writes) was afterward entrusted with the instruction of Prince Arthur (eldest sonne to King Henry) in good letters, though hee was blind, and hauing afwell the title of Poet Laureat, as of the Kings Hysto- grapher, (how hardlie scarce those two faculties meet with honour in the same person) meant to haue historized and poetized the Acts of this king, but (for want of competent and attended instructions in many places of chiefe importance) left his labour full of wilde breaches, and vniuallied; yet in such points as hee hath professed to know, not wa-worthy to bee vouched: for there is in him a great deale of cleare elocution, and defecated conceit about the ordinary of that age. Here, among other verses in honour of this our Henry (whom hee entyleth the most sapient King) hath hee not hyperbo-lically, but proper, wherein hee laudes him.

Principis ingenium miraris proham, Fama, religio, comitate, Sensu sanguine, gratia, decore.

A peerlesse Prince for wisdom rare, I am, pity, courteous, chearfull, Knowledge birth, grace, and feature faire.

Whereby also, after these portraicts of his inward faculties and gifts, may be guessed that a body they had for their mortall mansion, no way vnfitable and it seemes by that Mausole (so they call the Images of our Kings, which are carried for prebelen-ce in their funerall chariots) which at this day is "extra, that hee was of stature tall and slender, somewhat round visage, and though in "his childhood sickly, yet of aspect so all his outward lineaments, so noble and gracious, as well prised, and afterward fitted the most fortunate height to which he was now ascended. But notwithstanding these great praises, there want not some who think him to haue been an heauy Father to the common wealth, which by fardly courses hee greatly laboured to bring under as a seeming ground-works of his owne, and his posterities security. And in his last dayes a mauer, (the naturall maladic of age) tooke him strongly, the enuy whereof he partly diuerted from himselfe by the splendor of some few public buildings, which they gave the people cause to take of their brauerie, so they also infinitely wrought in their light minds a mitigation of their burthen.

(1) Let vs now behold his vertues as they are shiningly deduced into action. After the Battell he hauing truly first ascribed the whole good of his successe to God, commanded, that to the body of * his enemy King Richard, a honorable interment should be giuen in the Friars at Leuesler, where notwithstanding * hee was with little reuerence buried. From thence the King made speed to Londoun, as to the chiefe seat and Epitome of the English Monarchie, whithunto which vpon Prince found himselfe heere secure enough : he entered the Citie vpon a * Saturday, as vpon a Saturday he obtained his triumphall and Crowning victory. The Mayor of Londoun and his fellowship, * recieued him in violet at Harley Parke, but his entrance (which was at * Shoreditch) was honoured with a very great troope of the Peeres, and Nobles in his traine, at which our Poetical Historian Andrew was present, and saluted the victorious Prince with certaine Latine Supplikes, which he sung vnto him as himselfe writeth. But Henry staied not in Ceremonious greetings and popular acclamations, which (it seemes) hee did purposely eschue, for that (Andrew saith) hee entered * covertly, meaning belike, in an Horse-litter or close Chariot. His lodging was in the Bishoppe of Londons Pallace, where (after publicke offerings and solemne thanks giuen to God in the Cathedral Church of S. Paul) the businesse of his Coronation was seriously consulted of; which was afterward (vpon his remoues to the Tower, where hee created his vnckle Tasler Earle of Pembroke, Duke of Bedford, and other Estates) with due pompe and rituall magnificence * accomplished at Westminster.

(6) But the naturall solder and indissoluble cement, which must make this Kingdome stand, was his marriage with the Lady Elizabeth, eldest daughter of the late Edward the fourth. This as a point of most importance was with great matuery and iudgement againe thought vpon, when Henry was now already crowned. The remoter danger, supposed to reside in the person of Edward Earle of Warwick (only sonne and heire, euen in his infelicitie, to that unfortunate Prince George Duke of Clarence) was preuented; for he had bene, by King Henric direction, brought vp prisoner from the Manour of * Sheriff-botton in Yorkshire, (where as well he, as the Lady Elizabeth were kept by King Richard vnder guard) and immediately that vp within the Tower of Londoun.

(7) Francis * Duke of Britaine had offered Henry before his departure to match him with the Lady Anne his eldest daughter and sole heire, but hee was otherwise affected, as placing his loue where it might afford him greatest & present strength. Andrew addeth, that King Edward himselfe designated his eldest daughter vnto Henry then Earle of Richmond, and fought in his lifetime to bane effected it; but his meaning being (belike) suspected, as bot a drift to get Henry into his hands, the motion tooke no hold as referred till God had cleared the way of all such impediments, as might hinder the consolidation of both the Royall families, Turke and Lancaster, (after their so mortall and confusue massacres) in the person of one Soueraigne.

(8) The Lady herselfe, besides youth and beautie (precious Ornaments of that Sexe) had in her from her * infancy a wonderfull care, and care to please God, and a like deuotion and humble carriage toward her parents her brothers and sisters she did exceedingly love, and as well toward the poore, as all the seruants of Christ, she bore a singular affection. * Her Vnckle (the late vniuerser) in contempt of God and man (whose Lawes he was so long accustomed to violate, till the iust reward thereof did at length overtake him) incontinently meant to haue defiled her, vnder the abused name of Matrimonie. When therefore the newes of his death came to her eare, the ioy of her heart brake forth into these words. * *So yet at the last thus hath God, rewarded the humble, and not despised their prayers. I will remember, whether shall I at any time be worthy to remember, that my most noble Father of famous memory meant to haue bestowed me to marriage vpon this most comely Prince. O that I were now worthy of him, but my Father being dead, I want such good friends as should motion so great a matter: and perhaps hee will take a wife from forraigne parts, whose beauty, age, fortune, and dignity shall bee more then mine. What shall I say? I am all alone, and dare not open my minde to * any. What if I acquainted my mother with this? Bastardie forbids: What if some of the Lords? Indelicacy forbids. O then that I might but confer with him! perhaps in discourse I might let slippe such a word as might discover my intention. What will bee? I know not: thus I know, that a mighty God cannot tell how to defend himselfe from them who trust in him. Therefore I make an end of thinking, and repose my whole hope vpon thee, my God, doe with mee according to thy mercy. Shee secretly thus reuolving all matters, and reioicing of them in her minde, was heard from above; for King Henry hauing vnderstood the honour, chastity, and singular vertues of the maiden Princesse, the rather inclined to make her the Soueraigne of his affections: assigning therefore * a day, wherein (for the vniuersal abolishment of all Hostilities betweene the two Royall houses of Turke and Lancaster) to establish an vniou of Families by conclusion of their two persons in marriage.*

(9) The meane while hee wisely goes on to secure the maine, which consisteth in setting the generall state, and securing his owne person, hee, for the one, * holds a Parliament at Westminster, and for the other, induticates a certaine number of choise * Archers, with allotment of fees and maintenance, which vnder a peculiar Captaine, and the name of Yeomen of the Guard, hee assigned to that service, for him and his successors, Kings and Queenes of England. In the Parliament was attained Richard late Duke of Gloucester, slaying himselfe by vniuersal, King Richard the third; and with him by name many other of the Nobility and Gentry. And yet wishall to lay a foundation for his green Government in loue and clemencie, hee, during the Parliament proclaimed free pardon and entire restitution of their fortunes, to all such as submitted themselves to his mercy, and made oath of Fidelity. A seasonable and necessary Act; Whereby hee greatly weakened malicious humors, and wanne to himselfe no small accession of friendship and seruices; for many forsooke Sanctuaries, and tooke vp their refuges in his goodnesse and most gracious labour. And to remoue all feardall and danger from his friends, hee reuered and reuoked all former Acts, hurtfull either to himselfe, or to them for his cause, the whole house of Parliament, * concerning finally in establishing by a solemne Act, the Crowne vpon him, and his heires for ever.

(10) After dissolution of which Parliament, the King redeemes such pledges, as hee had left in France for money borrowed, and allows into his Council these two renowned agents in aduancing his fortunes, John Astor and Richard Foxe, as the most necessary piers and supports of his State; the former of which, notwithstanding (Thomas Burce dying) was elected and enthronized Archbishop of Canterbury; the latter, was forthwith advanced to be Lord Keeper of his Priuy Seale, & successively preferred to the Bishopricks of Exeter, Bath and Wells, Durham, and Winchester.

(11) The most wished and most welcome * day of marriage betweene King Henry and the Princesse Elizabeth being now come, was celebrated by them with all religious and glorious magnificence, and by the people, with * fires of ioy, dancing, songs and banquets through Londoun, all sorts and sexes beleeching ching Almightie God to send the King and Queene most prosperous success, and an infinite increase of the common weal by bestowing upon them a young Prince, and other issue at his good pleasure: Which prayers (saith Andrew) our Lord Iesus Christ vouchsafed to heare; the Queene within a while after, pronouncing with Child, of whom shee was happily delivered in the month of September following at Worcester, which to the most fortunate King was a new happiness, to the Queene a great rejoycement, to the Church a soveraigne delight: to the Court an exceeding pleasure; and in briefe to the whole Kingdome an incredible contentment. Not that without reason, as it afterward appeared; for (if God had beene pleased to haue granted longer life) not England onely, but the whole world should in such a pledge have had cause of eternall rejoycement. But God who governes all things, and in whose hand are aswell the Scepters of Princes, as dates of their lines, disposed otherwise.

(11) Meane while there were not a few who did enuie to King Henry this unexpected height of felicity; but they who first discovered themselves, were certaine remaines of the late overthrow at Bosworth, whose diffidence, or euill will, was greater then to relye vpon King Henries clemencie, or to behold the dazzling brightnes of his new attained glorie; and for that cause refused to forsake the Sanctuaries which they had taken at Calcester. These were the Lord Lowell, Sir Humphrey Stafford, and Thomas Stafford his brother. Who, while the King, secure of dangers behind him, was in his Progresse at Turke, meaning by affability, bountie and other his wisest courtesies, to gaue the good will of the 20th other people, (with whom the memory of King Richard was very deare) and so to weaken the strengths and hopes of all future conspiracies, forsooke their refuge, and secretly in secret places gathered forces, therewith to surprize and dethrone the King. The Lord Lowell raised his forces with such speed, that the King who at Lincolne first heard of his escape, and lightly regarded the same, was no sooner tierled in Turke, but certaine intelligence came that he approached fast with an Armie; and withall, that the Staffords had assembled forces in Worcestershire, meaning to assault the City of Worcester. The extremity of the King (who neuer dreamt of such a darling) was not small, for neither had he any sufficient numbers about him of his sure friends, nor could iustly repose confidence in the Northerne men, whose loye to King Richard their late (saine) Lord, made them still suspected. But danger quickeneth noble courages, and therefore vpon due recollection of himselfe, hee armed about three thousand men, (if tanned leather, whereof the most of their beards-pieces, for want of other stuffe, were framed, may be called armour) and sends them vnder the leading of Jasper Duke of Bedford, with commission to pardon, or to fight. The Duke offering pardon, the Lord Lowell fled by night to Sir Thomas brought into Lancashire, where he lurked certaine monthes; the headlesse multitude yield without frowne, and the felicity of King Henry pretayles in every place; for the Staffords hearing what had hapned to their Confederates, disperse their Cloude of rebels, and speedily take refuge at Calaham, a village about two miles from Abingdon in Oxfordshire. But the priuiledges of that place * being iudicially scand in the Kings Bench, they were found vnable to afford protection to open traitors, whereupon they were forcibly taken thence, and conueighed to the Tower of London, from whence Sir Humphrey Stafford was drawne and executed at Tisbury, but his brother Thomas by the Kings mercy had his pardon. These short dangers and troubles, by reason of their suddainity did worthily make the King wakefull euen over smaller accidents; this blaze being kindled from so neglected sparkles. But there followed deuises, which in their owne nature were so strangely impudent, and in their way so strongly bolstered, that if Lowells enterprise made him suspicious, these other might iustly fill him with innumerable ialousies.

(12) The records are immortal, which testifie, that the erection of Idols and Counterfeits, to dethrone them who are in possession, is a verie olde Stratagem. What troubles a Pseudo-Nero wrought, by support of the Parthians (who wonderfully fauoured Nero being,) the Romane writers teach vs. Neither hath the Diuel (Father of Imposthories) any so solemn practise, as Personation and Resemblances of true, whether men or things. Inasmuch that some Diuines have thought, that as he can, and often doth transfigure himselfe into the forme of a Celestiall Angell, so that he also deceiued our first mother vnder that resplendent but assumed habite. And what mischief he wrought, in this very kind of thralling out into the world false pretenders, the speech of wise Ganahel testifieth, who rehearseth the names of Theodas and Indas Gablous; but the world hath since had more worfull experience hereof, in that execrable Impostor Mahomet, pretending to bee the Messiah. In England it selfe (before the time of this Henry) what strange practises and conspiracies were set on foote vnder the title of a Pseudo-Richard in the reigne of Henry the fourth, the former Histories haue sufficiently opened, so that this Prince encountered nothing new in the Generall, howsoever pestilent and extraordinary in the particular. Indeed his raigne (more perhaps then any other of his predecessors) afforded plentiful matter for such deuises to worke vpon, there being many then, who hauing bene * constrained (as it were) on the bowels of Sedition, and nourished with the bitter and pernicious milke of dissension, were not onely apt to embrace, but also, where they were not offered, euen there to beget occasions of confounding all. Men, who could neither endure warre, nor peace long nor any leuies in either, as defaults to enioy the licentious violence of ciuill warre; a * misery, which all our dayes (how wide soeuer) want compass to expresse. The strange attempts of which kind of men (or rather Monsters) we shall see exemplified in the subsequent tragedies. Richard Symond, an ambitious and imposthous wretch, and withall a Priest, neither vnlearned, (the sacred shadow of which name the rather countenanced his practises) in hope to make himselfe the principall Bishop of England, plotted the aduancement of Lambert Symond (being his pupill in the Vniuersitie of Oxford) to the Crown of England; iunglited thereto by the diuell, and suborned by such as fauoured the White-robe faction, vpon this occasion. There went a rumour, that Edward Earle of Warwick, sonne and heire to George the late vnfortunate Duke of Clarence, second brother of King Edward, * was either already murdered, or should shortly be. This Architect of guile, Symond hauing this Symond in tuition, (the * issue of a Baker, or Shoemaker, but a well-faced and Princely-shaped youth, of no * very euill nature, but as it was corrupted by his Tutor,) meanes out of this rumour arrie inhibition, to produce an apparition and prodigie, which in Title, behaviour, and artificiall answers (inspired by his Tutors practises) should resemble * one of King Edwards children. Here we must confesse that our authors leade vs into a perplexitie: Some * affirming, that this counterfeite was exhibited to the world vnder the name of Edward Earle of Warwick, sonne of the Duke of Clarence, by the most turbulent and fatal Earle of Warwick slaine at Barnet-field. But hereunto reason seemes repugnant. For what ground of claime could that Gentleman haue, nor onely for that his Father was attainted, but much more for that the Queene of England then in being, was the iudithate eldest daughter and heire of King Edward the fourth, and sister and next heire to Edward the fifth? Neither waies there ancient authority then any of the others, affirming that this Idoll did viurpe the name of one of King Edwards sonnes; many arguments concurring to buttresse this affirmation. For, that the same time (as Polydore writeth) it was brated, that the James of King Edward the fourth had not been murdered under their purport Pie Richard, but were escaped, and lived in obscurity beyond the Sea; how can that be true, which Stew and the rest (who follow Polydore therein) affirm, that Lambert was crowned King of England at Dublin in Ireland, as heire to George Duke of Clarence? For with what iniurie to the toiall brethren (ained to be alive) was that? Verily there seems no coherence in the circumstances, nor appearance of truth in the substance. And how much stronger to the purpose of the Conspirators was the fiction of an Edward, the Kings sounce, and him selfe once proclaimed King, then of an Edward, who was but an Earle, and a Duke of Clarence heire? But you will aske, what was the poore Earles part in this tragedie? what other? then that by rumoring his murder, they might bring the person of King Henry into common detestation for his crueltie; for clearing whereof the King publicke afterwarde shewed the Earle to the view of all. And albeit the vulgar fame is, that Lambert was called Edward, yet *one who thou lived, saith directly, that this Cypher was dubbed & monisted from his owne meane ranke to the title of a King, vnder the name of the second brother, who for certaine was called Richard: but what Record there is to the contrary, is to vs as yet vnkowne; for our vulgar Bookes extant can hardly passe with a lury of ordinary Criticks and Censors for vachallengenble evidence.

(14) This aery Thyphon (which grasped at the embracement of the two Kingdoms of England and Ireland) thus thoroughly schooled and instructed, is secretly conveyed by his Sionian Tutor to Dublin, the chiefe City of the Irish, where he was confident of partrakes, as amongst the hereditary Clients, and adherents of the house of York; which affection was first breathed into them by the cunning popularities of the Lord Richard Duke of York, the first of that line, who publicke claimed the English Crowne, His hopes deceived him not, for the Lord *Chancellor of Ireland, Thomas Fitz-Gerald, of the noble Familie of the Geraldines presently professed himselfe for the plot, and by his authority and persuasions drew the generality of the Irish after him into it. Messengers are herupon dispatched, vpon all hands both into England, to such as they had hope of, and into low Germany to the Lady Margaret, sister of King Edward the fourth, Dutchesse Dowager of Burgundy, a most mortall enemy of the Lancastrian familie. In both places the lighted matches of sedition found powdry spirits, and wonderfull correspondence. There is flocking from all parts to support the quarrell, and the Irish (to haue the glory of gining England a King) proclaim & reuerence this painted pulke, & flying bubble with royall Style and honors.

(15) Henric seeing the fire so strangely kindled round about the walls of his belit house & strength, saith seriously to counsell at the Monastery of Carthusian Monks neere Richmond, where after exact deliberation it was decreed, & it was general pardon to stay the minds of as many as it had possible should without any exception be proclaimed to such as from thenceforth should continue dutifull. Which was principally done to temper and assure some private persons, as Sir Thomas Broughton and others, whose forces, willes, and wealth were held moost in suspicion. 2. That Elizabeth late wife to Edward the fourth, and mother in law to Henry now King of England, should forfeit all her lands and goods for that (conitory to her faith giuen to them, who were in the plot for bringing in King Henry) she had yielded up her daughters to the hands of the Tyrant Richard. 3. That Edward Earle of Warwick then Prisoner in the Tower, should be openly shewed alive in London. All which was accordingly executed, but without any great fruit, for still the plot went on.

(16) The condemnation of Elizabeth Queene Dowager, rather moued enny towards Henry, then relieved his cause; for to many the iustice of that sentence was doubtful, the circumstance of a mother in law inferred a breach of pietie, and the judgement it selfe did also want example. The iustice was doubtfull both in regard of the cause, and of the proceeding. Of the cause, for how could there haue defended her daughters by the priuilege of sanctuary from such a Wolfe and Tyger, as would haue infringed it for her sons, had they not been quietly deliuered to his bloodie hands? The same Tyrant doth now demand her daughters as to honour, not to slaughter; but if it had bene to slaughter, what helpe? she, terrified with the motion, after much deliberation yields them to him, when she neither could, nor durst detain them. But you say she violated her faith, and hazarded thereby the liues and hopes of all that were in the plot for her cause. A great crime certainly. But Richard was in title, and power a King, and hung ouer her head with inuincible terrors; when Henry of Richmond was but an Earle, and he farre off, and in banishment, and without any appearance of preuailing, and her selfe a friendlesse widow. The manner of proceeding was no lesse strange; for by what law or triall was shee condemned in a Præmunire? Shee neuerthelesse is put out of all, and confined to the Monastery of Bermondsey in Southerke, where finally she ended her dayes, borne to be an example of both fortunes, hating from a forlorne widdowes estate bene raised to the bed of a Bachelon Monarcke; and in his life time bene reduced to the seeming of a priuate fortune, when her Lord was driuen to flee the land; and afterward saw those turnes and varieties as few Queenes euer felt, or saw so many, or more contrarie; whether we regard the height of worldly felicity, when shee did behold her sonne a King, or the depth of misery, when the Tyrant invaded his Crowne and life, or now her daughter being Queene, and her selfe a miserable prisoner. The consideration whereof, as it may worthily mortifie ambitious affections, so the strangenesse of the sentence verifies that collection among others, which that learned Gentleman makes of such Kings range in these words. Hee had (saith hee) very strange kind of interchanging very large and unexpected pardons with seuer executions. Nevertheless, (his wisdom considered) it could not be imputed to any inequality, but to a discretion, or at least to a principle, that hee had apprehended what it was not good, absolutely to pursue one course, but to trie both wayes. Howouer that was; certainly, shee being lo iust an object of his commiseration, who had married that daughter, by which hee enioyed a Kingdome, and gotten that vertie power, wherewith hee ruined her; it cannot be reasonably thought, but that there were other moost important motives, perswading such a sharpe course, or otherwise, that it must be reckoned among the chiefe of his errors. But as in the times of her flourishing estate, shee founded and endowed a faire Colledge for Students in Cambridge, which of het is called the Queenes; so we will leaue to those her Beneficiaries the farther search of this Argument, and deploeration of her fortune, which seems such to vs, as if King Henry affected to leaue somewhat in this example, wherewith to oppose & amale the world. Velleis perhaps it were, that hauing proclaimed a general pardon for all offenses without exception to such as in future should remaine loyall, and foreseing that some, who might be willing to lay hold of that benefite, might also be cunningly practised with to fall away, vpon distrust of his word, when once hee had ferud his present vies, hee therefore meant (by so cleare a demonstration, as the vtter vndoing, and perpetuall imprisonment of his wiues owne mother,) to giue them assurance, that hee, who vpon her prison had bene so seuer a punisher of faith breach, would

(17) Yet neither could this device take its good effect, but that John Earle of Lincoln (sonne of John de la Pole Duke of Suffolke, and Elizabeth King Edward the fourths sister) secretly fled into Flanders to the Duchesse of Burgundy, whither Francis Lord Lovell was likewise not long before escaped. Sir Thomas Bracken (another principal Confederat) temporized in England, there to remaine a stay to the businesse, as well for mutual intelligence, as receiv of an Army when it should arrive. This Earle of Lincoln, besides that he could not with any patience behold a Lancastrian wielding the English Scepter; was also of a "sharp wit, and high reach, and therefore not without an ambitious sensibility, that in countenancing King Henry, hee wronged that expectance, and relation to the Crowne, which hee had in right of his mother, sister to King Edward the fourth, and to King Richard the third, who had

* deligned him for heire apparent, & contracted his sister the * Lady Jane de la Pole, to James Prince of Scotland: was also the rather animated by letters received from his aunt the Duchesse of Burgundy, earnestly calling upon him for his preference. This Duchesse was the second wife of Charles Duke of Burgundy, * slain by the Swits at the battell of Narvay, by whom though hee had no issue, yet by reason of her great dowry, & wife behaviour among the Dutch, shee was strong in money and friends; all which shee was willing to convert to the utter subversion howsoever of the Lancastrian line. Though therefore, shee well knew that shee Lambert was not an Idoll,* hammered out of the hote braine of that

* bratefrow Richard Simus, yet the embraceth the occasion, countenanced the Imposture, and leaves nothing unaid or undone, which might give life and successe to the enterprise. The Earle, the L. Lovell, and others shee furnished abundantly, and joyntly vnto them a renowned Cornell Martin Swart, a Gentleman of * honorable birth, exemplary valour, and singular experience, and certain selected companies, to the number of about two thousand

Almaines, which looneafter arrive at Dublin. Lambert, who before was but proclaimed, is now in Christs Church there solemnly by them crowned King of England, & feeding and triumphing, wearing mighty showes and cries, carrying him thence to the kings Castell upon call mens shoulders, that he might be seene and noted; as hee was surely (saith Stow) an honorable boy to look upon though nothing lesse was meast, then that hee should enjoy that honour if they prevailed; as meaning then to erect Edward Earle of Warwick. Poterity might worthily doubt of the truth of these so desperate impudencies, and ridiculous Pageants, practised in the highest affairs of mankind, but that the thing is so universally testified, and also that the highest affairs of the world (when once they are passed) are little better then such like Pageants.

(18) K. Henry (on the other side) though he had by most diligent espials endeavored to know the truth of Lamberts quality, to diuert the streame of affections, which hee saw inclined that way, so that the practise was carried with little wonderfull art, as that very many (otherwise discreet and sober men) were induced to beleue that hee was indeed King Edward sonne; and although the generall pardon proclaimed by King Henry, did undoubtedly stay very many from open revolt, but much more the careful watch which was kept at the Ports, to hinder the escape of Malecontentes or factious Fugitives: yet hee manifestly saw, that it wold in the end come to a field: for which cause hee takes order for the levie of an Armie, resolving to give his enemies battell with the first opportunity, it being the ancient and manfull fashion of the English, (who are naturally most impatient of lingering mischiefs) to put their publike quarrels to the trial of the sword. Lambert attended with John Earle of Lincoln, Francis Lord * Vicount Lovell, Thomas Fitz-Gerald, or rather Maurice Fitz-Thomas (belike his sonne) and Cornell Swart, with an Army of desperate and pickt soldiers, well English, Dutch, as Irish (all fired with insidie hopes and promises to bee employed upon the overthrow of King Henry) come on shore at Lancashire at a place called the pile of Fenside, where they joine with their assured confederat Sir Thomas Bracken, and his squire, and after some short refreshment in those partes, march with crested courages against King Henry, taking their way through Yorkshire (the hoped nursery of their furell friendship) and gloriously publishing their new King where, though without any in creale of force by concurrence, for King Henries widome had mated their errand,) their journey was directed toward Newburie upon Trent.
